Editorial Preface

One of the major achievements of the Second Vatican Council was to set the liturgy of the church firmly at the center of Christian life and mission. "The liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed; it is also the fount from which all her power flows" (S.C., 10). The liturgical reform which the council set in motion, as well as the refreshingly new way in which it spoke of the liturgy in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, both reflect and are guided by this seminal vision of the church at prayer. The aim of the reform, as indeed the aim of the council as a whole, was clearly stated: "to impart an ever-increasing vigor to the Christian life of the faithful; to adapt more closely to the needs of our age those institutions which are subject to change; to foster whatever can promote union among all who believe in Christ; to strengthen whatever can help to call all mankind into the Church's fold" (S.C., 1). The council called for both the reform and the promotion of the liturgy to help achieve these goals.

A little more than twenty-five years after the council, the effects of this promotion and reform already far exceed the hopes and dreams which led up to, and were captured in, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. And these effects reach far beyond the Latin rite of the Roman Catholic church which was the constitution's primary concern. The Anglican, Lutheran and Reformed churches of the West, and many churches of the East as well, have been inspired to their own liturgical reform and renewal by the council's vision and call. Where once the church was divided over issues of sacrament and worship, a new convergence, indeed a new koïnonia, of worship is gradually and graciously coming about.

This dictionary of sacramental worship arises both to celebrate and to serve the ongoing task of liturgical reform and renewal. Represented in its pages is the vision which was framed by Vatican II now enfolded in its many faces at the hands of dedicated men and women who have given their professional lives to the service of the worshipping church. While most of the contributors come from the Latin rite of the Roman Catholic church, the voices of almost all the sacramental churches are present here speaking from the ecumenical church to the ecumenical church.

The dictionary was guided in its aim and its purpose by The New Dictionary of Theology (eds. Komonchak, Collins, Lane [Glazier, 1987]). This present work likewise emerges from the conviction that theology must be carried out locally. Contributors have therefore been invited from all over the English-speaking world, and it is to the concerns of the English-speaking churches that these essays are primarily addressed. In addition, because it emerges in the wake of Vatican II and seeks to assess the impact of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, its primary focus is on the revised Roman Catholic liturgical texts and questions which implementation of those texts involves. Even within this strong Roman Catholic perspective, however, the range of concerns can be no less than the range of influence which the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy enjoys. Thus the churches of the East and the various churches of the West rightly belong in its pages.

The dictionary is structured as a theological and pastoral resource, covering a wide range of activities that are constitutive of a sacramental church. The entries include the strictly theological, the practical liturgical, the pastoral and the social. There are thus many "genres" of writing here. This reflects an additional conviction, that the worship of God in the church embraces these many dimensions, and that these ought to be housed, as it were, under the same roof.

Authors were invited to address an issue from their own sense of what the issue is. Though in many cases some editorial guidance was given, the bottom line request was simply this: "if you were to go to a theological and pastoral resource to get some input on the issue, what would you want to find there?" The tone of a particular piece, whether doctrinal, catechetical, liturgical or pastoral, as well as its ecumenical scope, is determined both by the topic and by the sense of the author. The dictionary thus represents as well the collective vision of theologians, liturgists and pastors alive and serving well in the church of the late-20th century.

In order to facilitate use of this volume, three editorial devices are offered. At the end of most entries there are the usual cross references, offered to guide the reader to entries obviously linked to the one at hand. In addition there is a simple alphabetical index that lists all the entries, with the corresponding page references, as they appear in the volume. Finally, there is a topical index which arranges all the substantial entries under seven (a fitting number for a sacramental dictionary) major headings: the worshipping church; the heritage of the church; the sacramental life of the church; the praying church; the church and the arts; the reflecting church; and, the pastoral mission of the church. It is hoped that one or all of these devices will make the dictionary more useful to its readers, be they pastors, theological and divinity students, lay men and women engaged in ministry in the church.

Credit for the idea of this dictionary, as well as much gratitude and a special dedication, is given to Michael Glazier, to whom the world of religious scholarship is deeply indebted. His imagination, his boldness and above all his kindness have become in the eyes of many his second trademark. In addition, the gratitude of the editor must also be given to Eileen Daney Carzo, Elizabeth McLaughlin, Joseph Quinn and Diane Barrett. Their varied labors are too numerous to list, yet much too valued to let pass unsung.

ABSOLUTION

Absolution is the ritual action which completes the sacrament of penance. Through the words and gestures of the priest who has the faculty to absolve sins (and censures), "God grants pardon to sinners who in sacramental confession manifest their change of heart" (Rite of Penance, 6d). In traditional sacramental terminology, absolution is the "form" of the sacrament of penance.

It consists of three elements on the part of the priest: imposition of hands over the penitent (or at least the extension of the right hand) in an epicletic gesture invoking the Holy Spirit; proclamation of the formulary of absolution; and tracing the sign of the cross over the penitent. The essential words of the formulary are: "I absolve you from your sins in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

The complete formulary which must be used in its entirety, except in the case of imminent danger of death, contains both the deprecatory and declarative prayer forms. The deprecatory form is much older in the tradition of the Church. It prays to God for forgiveness very much like the response to the Confiteor and the penitential rite of the Mass: "May almighty God have mercy on us. . . ." The declarative form dates only from the 13th century and states authoritatively: "I absolve you. . . ." Although the ritual of penance emphasizes the pastoral, paternal, Good Shepherd image of the minister, it does not deny the need for prudence, wisdom and discernment of spirits guided by the teaching authority of the church and fervent prayer. To balance between judge and healer, between justice and mercy, is the challenge of the minister (C.I.C., 978). The formulary reflects this balance: "God, the Father of mercies, through the death and resurrection of his Son has reconciled the world to himself and sent the Holy Spirit among us for the forgiveness of sins; through the ministry of the Church may God give you pardon and peace and I absolve you from your sins in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

Though somewhat long, the formulary expresses the ecclesial sense of forgiveness: coming from the mercy of the Father; connected with the paschal mystery of Christ; stressing the role of the Holy Spirit; showing the ecclesial aspect of forgiveness since reconciliation with God is given through the ministry of the church (Rite of Penance, 19).

Absolution takes place in different ways in the different celebrations of reconciliation. In his post-synodal Apostolic Exhortation "On Reconciliation and Penance" Pope John Paul II states: "The first form—reconciliation of individual penitents—is the only normal and ordinary way of celebrating the sacrament, and it cannot and must not be allowed to fall into disuse or be neglected."

The second form—reconciliation of a number of penitents with individual confession and absolution—even though in the preparatory acts it helps to give greater emphasis to the community aspects of the sacrament, is the same as the first form in the culminating sacramental act, namely individual confession and individual absolution of sins. It can thus be regarded as equal to the first form as regards the normality of the rite. The third form however—reconciliation of a number of penitents with general absolution—is exceptional in character. It is therefore not left to free choice but is regulated by a special discipline (32).

A priest who has the faculty may also absolve from canonical censures (excommunication, interdict, and suspension of an ordained minister). When this takes place in connection with the absolution of sin, no change is to be made in the formulary but the confessor should intend to absolve the properly disposed penitent (Order of Penance, Appendix I, 1). Absolution of a common censure outside sacramental penance has the following formulary: "By the power granted to me, I absolve you from the bond of excommunication (or suspension or interdict). In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

JOSEPH L. CUNNINGHAM

ABSOLUTION, GENERAL

Absolution, or the effective proclamation of the forgiveness of sin, is considered "general" when it is pronounced over a number of penitents simultaneously. It may follow a general confession of sins, as in the Rite for Reconciliation of Several Penitents with General Confession and Absolution (Sacramental Form III of the revised Rite of Penance of the Roman Ritual, 1973) where the request for absolution is made by some kind of sign, such as kneeling, bowing the head or standing. Or it may follow individual confessions made separately to confessors and be pronounced as a communal act of forgiveness in response to confessions made privately (though no approved Roman Catholic ritual offers this possibility). It may be employed positively, to celebrate the communal nature of the sacrament, or negatively, due to the scarcity of priest-confessors or in an emergency situation. Its primary characteristic is its address to several persons together.

The revised Rite of Penance offers this possible form of the sacrament together with two other forms: the Rite of Reconciliation of Individual Penitents (Form I) and the Rite for Reconciliation of Several Penitents with Individual Confession and Absolution (Form II). It is presented in the Rite of Penance as one of three sacramental options, and appears to be, along with the other two forms, an ordinary mode of celebrating the sacrament.

In fact, however, the current discipline of the Roman Catholic church severely restricts the use of general absolution, and clearly promotes the private mode of celebration, with individual confession and absolution (as in Forms I and II), as "the only ordinary way by which the faithful person who is aware of serious sin is reconciled with God and with the Church..." (C.I.C., 960). Three canons devoted to general absolution (961-963) delineate the restrictions which apply to it.

Can. 961 establishes the conditions under which general absolution may be imparted: (a) in danger of death where time does not allow for individual confession; (b) serious necessity, where the number of penitents is too large for the available priests to provide individual confession and where such inability would force people to be deprived of the eucharist for a long time. Numbers alone do not warrant the use of general absolution. It is up to the diocesan bishop to determine whether these conditions apply.

Can. 962 requires of the penitent both a proper disposition to celebrate the sacrament and the intent "to confess individually the serious sins which at present cannot be so confessed." An act of contrition is to precede general absolution, if there is time, even in emergency circumstances.

Finally, can. 963 advises individual confession after general absolution (a) as soon as there is opportunity to do so and (b) before receiving general absolution again, provided no just cause dictates otherwise.

On the restrictions imposed on this form of absolution, F. McManus notes Rome's constant concern lest private, auricular confession, already fallen into disuse among Catholics, be even further diminished in the life of the church (see The Code of Canon Law: a Text and Commentary, p. 675). If this assessment is correct, one can understand why, though nonetheless lament that, a factor extrinsic to the liturgy itself is here brought in to determine a liturgical decision.

On the other hand, it must be acknowledged that a difficulty presents itself within the Rite of Penance itself, and especially in the introduction that explains the sacramental rite. There are two different theological visions within this introduction which lead to two different assessments of this form of absolution and sacramental celebration. The one announces the celebration of this sacrament as "an act in which the Church proclaims its faith, gives thanks to God for the freedom with which Christ has made us free, and offers its life as a spiritual sacrifice in praise of God's glory, as it hastens to meet the Lord Jesus" (7b). This view focuses on the sacrament as a liturgical act of the church in assembly. The other sees the sacrament in more remedial terms: "God grants pardon to the sinner who in sacramental confession manifests his change of heart to the Church's minister" (6d). This view focuses on the individual penitent, his or her personal conversion and repentance, and the presentation of one's sins to the ordained minister of the church. The two are in fact complementary; they yield, however, a conflict on the value of general absolution.

Those who stress the sacrament as a liturgical act will cite the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy: "Whenever rites, according to their specific nature, make provision for communal celebration involving the presence and active participation of the faithful, it is to be stressed that this way of celebrating them is to be preferred, as far as possible, to a celebration that is individual and, so to speak, private" (S.C., 27). Accordingly, priority of place should be given to Form III as the fullest celebration of sacramental reconciliation, with more private forms, dictated as they may be by personal need, to be understood and evaluated in relation to the communal form. On the other hand, those who stress the personal nature of the sacrament will consider as essential the individual presentation of one's sins to the confessor and an appropriate individual response on the part of the confessor to what is thus presented. They will give priority of place to Form I, with the more communal forms of value only to the extent that they serve the private. Form III, in this view, will remain reserved for emergency situations. Clearly the bias of the Catholic church's current discipline is toward the former.

Nonetheless, pressure continues to mount to shift this disciplinary bias towards the communal. For some the pressure is for practical reasons. Except for large urban areas where a large number of priests from neighboring parishes may be readily available for the celebration of Forms I or II, Form III presents the only realistic option for celebrating the sacrament in many parish communities. The non-availability of priests presents a more serious situation than the Code seems to acknowledge. For some it is rather an issue of pastoral recognition and pastoral concern: people seem to enjoy more communal forms of the sacrament and partake of them in large numbers, even while continuing to shun the individual form. The private form simply is not attracting the faithful to its doors. For others, finally, the issue is theological. The recovery of the communal, liturgical dimension of all our sacraments is seen as too important to be compromised in the case of this one sacrament alone.

In many ways, the current situation is not unlike an earlier moment in the history of this sacrament when the process of evolution was the opposite, i.e., when the personal form was resisted as an abuse and the communal form considered the only way of enacting the sacrament. When the canonical form of penance fell into disuse, the private, Celtic form arose to fill in the gap and eventually to take its place.

The guiding norm for future development and discipline remains that given in the liturgy constitution: "Finally, there must be no innovations unless the good of the Church genuinely and certainly requires them; care must be taken that any new forms adopted should in some way grow organically from forms already existing" (S.C., 23). The Rite for Reconciliation of Several Penitents with General Confession and Absolution certainly fulfills the latter condition; whether or not it fulfills the former, only time will tell.

ABSTINENCE

The practice of refraining from an otherwise wholesome activity for reasons of penitence or anticipation. This may be part of a process of repentance for sin or of purification in anticipation of a festal celebration or joyful event. The practice of abstinence from certain foods has traditionally found its way into the various liturgical calendars of the churches, especially during seasons devoted to repentance (e.g., Lent) or expectation (e.g., Advent).

ADAPTATION, LITURGICAL

As the expression implies, "liturgical adaptation" refers to the process by which the liturgy is modified in such a way as to render it "more suitable," "more appropriate," "more meaningful" to a given group of worshippers in a given context. While the term "adaptation" has been criticized as connoting an overly timid and even paternalistic attitude toward this process, the documents of the Second Vatican Council and the revised liturgical books use this word in a variety of contexts to express a range of nuanced ideas: from the most superficial kinds of rubrical changes to the creation of new liturgical forms springing from the genius of a particular culture. A careful reading of these documents, especially S.C. 37-40, will reveal that the term "adaptation" when applied to the liturgy variously refers to concepts borrowed from the social sciences such as "localization," "acculturation," "contextualization," "indigenization," and "inculturation," as well as the more theological expression "incarnation."

Examples from the History of the Liturgy

Liturgical adaptation, however, while a relatively new expression in the liturgical lexicon, is not a new phenomenon in the history of the liturgy. As the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy itself points out, the liturgy "is made up of immutable elements, divinely instituted, and of elements subject to change" (S.C., 21). Even a cursory review of the history of Christian worship illustrates that the church both consciously and unconsciously adapted these "elements subject to change" not only from one generation to the next but also from one culture to another in order to express and celebrate the mystery of Christ in a meaningful way.

Given the Jewish background of the first generation of believers, it is not surprising that the earliest forms of Christian liturgy were profoundly rooted in the ritual patterns of first century Judaism. The most obvious case in point is the reinterpretation (one could say "adaptation") of the Passover meal from a domestic memorial of the exodus of Israel from slavery and oppression to the Christian eucharist: the memorial of the "passover" of Christ celebrated in homes by small groups of believers. Just as the Hebrew scriptures were reinterpreted by the early church in a christological light, so basic Jewish ritual actions such as the laying-on of hands, baptismal washing, and anointings were given new meanings in the context of the Christ event. Both the New Testament and extra-biblical witnesses to early Christian worship patterns such as the Didache (9, 10) and the First Letter of Clement (59-61) betray a marked indebtedness to Jewish forms of prayer and blessing rooted in the Hebrew scriptures, though now refocused on Jesus, the servant of God. This characteristic influence of the Hebrew scriptures and the cultural world-view expressed by them would never be totally lost by the church as it moved from one culture to another down through the centuries.

As the new church attracted more and more converts from paganism, it also entered into a dialogue with the dominant Greco-Roman culture which affected its worship. While this dialogue was often polemical, characterized by a total rejection of cultural expressions based on polytheism, practices which were not intrinsically linked to pagan worship were incorporated into the Christian liturgy and usually interpreted typologically in light of the Hebrew Scriptures. Thus we find in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus that after the newly baptized received the eucharist for the first time, they were given a drink of milk and honey. Hippolytus explains the significance of this action as "the fulfillment of the promise God made to the patriarchs, that he would give them a land flowing with milk and honey" (Apost. Trad., 21). Yet, this type of drink would not have been unfamiliar to a Christian neophyte since it was ancient Roman custom to give a similar drink to newborns as a sign of welcome into the family and to ward-off evil spirits (Chupungco, Cultural Adaptation, p. 16). Clearly, what is at work here is an adaptation of a "welcoming" rite practiced in the surrounding culture to illustrate the significance of full initiation into the church imaged as the "family of God."

Once Christianity was made a legal religion in 313 by Constantine and then the official religion of the Empire during the reign of Theodosius (379-395), the church's dialogue with Greco-Roman culture became progressively more positive. This was a period of great creativity and the era which saw the gradual birth of the liturgical families of rites in East and West. Each one of these developing rites was marked not only by the theological controversies and political instability of the age, but also by the pastoral concern to adapt the church's worship to the needs of the huge influx of new converts through the assimilation and reinterpretation of cultural symbols drawn from the religious and political usages with which the new Christians were already familiar.

One aspect of this adaptation can be seen in the worship space of the Christian assembly. The simple house-church or "house of the assembly" (domus ecclesiae) which was able to accommodate only a small number of worshippers was transformed into an imperial basilica, capable of holding vast throngs of the faithful. While maintaining the image of the church as the "household of God," this image became progressively more stylized in the appointments of the new Christian basilicas: the apse where the emperor or magistrate was enthroned to hold court became the place where the bishop presided from his cathedra or chair surrounded by his council of elders or presbyterium. Not surprisingly, the liturgy itself became more stylized and formal. It began to reflect the new position of the church vis-à-vis the political and social order, borrowing elements of imperial court ceremonial from the now Christian emperor whose functionaries the bishops partially became. Liturgical vesture in East and West, which has undergone numerous changes down through the centuries, still reflects the formal dress of imperial officials of the late empire. It is also important to note that while the liturgy is still very deeply rooted in the scriptures, the patristic authors of this period began to legitimate the now more formal liturgical practices through recourse to the cultus of the Jerusalem Temple as described in the Hebrew Scriptures and the NT, especially the letter to the Hebrews. A "sacralization" of both the persons ministering to the community and the place where it gathers to pray, gradually took place which paralleled religious attitudes toward the sacred found in both Judaism and paganism.

Significantly, it was during the 4th century that the very language of worship of the Roman church was adapted to a changed cultural situation. It must be remembered that the Roman church, until the 3rd century, was predominantly Greek-speaking. It was just before the reign of Pope Damasus in the middle of the 4th century that Latin, now the language of the majority of the Christians of Rome, definitively found its way into the liturgy of the City. While this change was essentially a pastoral one, to enable the faithful to understand what was being prayed, the form of the Latin adopted for Christian worship was in many ways stylistically similar to that employed in the pre-Christian, Roman cultus. The litanie responses Libera nos, Domine and Te rogamus, audi nos both derive from the pagan Roman practice of invoking the gods with a series of intercessory acclamations. The typical Roman concern for juridical precision through the piling up of synonyms in sacrificial formulas also became a feature of the liturgical prayer of Christians. A recent Roman convert from paganism would have been very familiar indeed with the stylized expression specifying the gifts presented at the eucharist such as haec dona, haec munera, haec sacrificia illibata appearing in the Te igitur section of the Roman Canon and which reflects the hieratic language of the pagan Roman cultus.

This adaptation extended beyond just the verbal. A gesture of reverence still prescribed today in the Roman liturgy, kissing the altar and book of the gospels, also finds its origin in the pagan Roman custom of venerating the sacred with a kiss. Moreover, the development of some aspects of the liturgical year would be incomprehensible without a knowledge of previous pagan celebrations such as the Mithraic celebration of the dies natalis solis invicti celebrated at the winter solstice and reinterpreted by the Christian church into the annual celebration of the birth of Christ, the "sun of righteousness" spoken of by the prophet Malachi. These and many other examples illustrate the church's constant (and sometimes unconscious) attempt to adapt its worship to its changed cultural context through the reinterpretation of religious, social, and political customs already extant in the world in which it lived.

This era of the "classic Roman liturgy" which extended from the 4th to the 7th centuries is a crucial one from the point of view of liturgical adaptation since the reforms of the liturgy which took place after Vatican II, being very much influenced by the liturgical movement of the this period as a kind of blueprint which was to guide the liturgical renewal of the Roman rite throughout the world. The great English liturgical historian Edmund Bishop, writing at the beginning of the century, lists the characteristics of the classic Roman rite which, in effect, describe the cultural values or "genius" of Roman culture as: "simplicity, practicality, a great sobriety and self-control, gravity and dignity" ("The Genius of the Roman Rite," Liturgica Historica, Oxford, 1918, p. 12). These values have served in subsequent periods of liturgical reform as a kind of yardstick by which such reforms were measured. These values played a key role in the liturgical renewal of Vatican II: "The rites should be marked by a noble simplicity; they should be short, clear, unencumbered by useless repetitions; they should be within the peoples' power of comprehension and as a rule not require much explanation" (S.C., 34).

As Frankish and Germanic peoples

entering the areas of what was the old Roman Empire were evangelized, it was only natural that their worship, too, was influenced by their particular culture. In the period prior to the 9th century when the Roman rite was imposed on the Frankish Kingdom by Pepin and Charlemagne, Western liturgical rites developed quite independently from the Roman, and reveal very different approaches to Christian worship. One can easily see in the style of the prayers found in the various non-Roman sacramentaries of this period a reflection of the challenges which beset these local churches expressed in styles proper to the particular national "genius" of these people. In Ireland, where the harp of the wandering troubadour still functions as a national symbol, the prayers of the Celtic rite excelled in lyrical compositions and hymnody. In the face of serious Arian opposition to orthodoxy, the former thoroughly Romanized province of Spain produced the so-called Mozarabic or Visigothic rite centered around the cities of Toledo and Braga which combined a refined Latin erudition with a special concern for orthodoxy of expression. The more "barbarian" province of Gaul produced prayers which tended to be prolix, moralizing, and emotional, but which liberally incorporated quotations from the scriptures. Though all of these rites employed Latin in worship, their style is unmistakably different from the more restrained and abstract Roman "genius."

The See of Rome, however, commanded enormous respect in the West, being the center of pilgrimage to the shrines of the apostles Peter and Paul and the only Patriarchate in the West. Many of these pilgrims returned home to incorporate liturgical practices that they had witnessed at Rome into their own worship. It was also to Rome that Charlemagne turned in an astute political move to unify his kingdom by means of imposing uniform liturgical observances on his dominions. While the liturgical unification he promoted used the liturgy of the city of Rome as its base, his borrowing of Roman liturgical forms was not wholesale. Under Charlemagne's auspices a supplement to the Roman sacramentary he had received from the pope was composed which included the blessing of the Easter candle (our present Exsultet) as well as ordination prayers, blessings, formulas for consecration of churches and exorcisms—all of which reflect the characteristic Franco-Germanic verbosity coupled with a love of scripture. This "supplement" was eventually incorporated into the Roman section of the sacramentary and was brought back to Rome and became, with a few alterations down through the centuries, the "Roman" missal used by the Roman rite until the reforms of Vatican II.

It was also about the same time, during the reforms of the papacy undertaken by the Ottomian emperors in the 9th and 10th centuries, that we see the influence of the early medieval culture on liturgical practice. The Roman-Germanic Pontifical of the 10th Century, a fusion of the ancient Roman Ordines (guides to liturgical celebrations) with material from the north of Europe, contains dramatic evidence of the influence of feudalism; for example, six sections of the book are dedicated to the Iudicia Dei or "trials by ordeal." While these "barbaric" ceremonies were dropped by subsequent pontificals, feudalism continues to influence the liturgy. The gesture of fealty used by a knight to his liege was introduced into the ordination rite for presbyters by the end of 13th century in Rome. When the ordinand places his hands between the hands of the bishop to promise obedience, he is imitating that feudal gesture of "hommage" given by a vassal to his lord.

Although there was an attempt under Gregory VII (1073-1085) and Innocent III

(1198-1216) to return to what was perceived to be the traditions and practices of the ancient Roman "fathers," these reforms were impeded by a lack of documentation and historical sophistication. The Roman liturgy therefore evinced not only the sobriety and gravity of ancient Rome, but also the allegorism, moralization, verbosity and flair for the dramatic which characterized the peoples of northern Europe. It was this essentially hybrid liturgy, purified of abuses by the Council of Trent, which is contained in the Missal of Pius V promulgated in 1570.

The Reformers of the 16th century approached the problem of adaptation from another point of view. Instead of adapting the liturgy in light of what was perceived to be the ancient practices of the Roman church, they made a conscious attempt to look at worship as presented in the scriptures. One of the problems they perceived in medieval worship was that it was monopolized by the clergy and was unintelligible to the people because it was celebrated in Latin. It therefore needed to be translated into the vernacular, purged of what they regarded to be Roman error and superstition, and firmly based on the word of God. Luther, Zwingli, Bucer, Calvin and later Cranmer all produced new vernacular liturgies which attempted to return to the worship of the early church. While these revisions were successful insofar as they once again made the words of worship comprehensible to the people, they were unable to "turn the clock back" to the 1st century because the NT contains no formal worship services and hence no pattern to emulate. As with the attempted reform of Gregory VII in the 11th century, historical study and theological reflection was not sufficiently developed in the 16th century to do anything more than to create worship services shorn of direct references to Catholic doctrines problematic to the reformers such as eucharistic sacrifice.

While they were assiduous at translating both the scriptures and prayers used in church, the reformers produced liturgies which very much reflected the cultural ethos of Northern Europe during the late Middle Ages. Although their services emphasized the primacy of the word of God interpreted by every Christian, a word which was now accessible to a much broader section of the population through the invention of the printing press, their liturgies also reflect the strong penitential emphasis and interest in subjectivity already present in the late Middle Ages in such spiritual movements as the devotio moderna.

The apparent rejection of centuries of liturgical tradition by the reformers, as well as what was perceived to be their deviations from doctrinal orthodoxy, led the participants in the Council of Trent to reaffirm what it regarded as ancient tradition. The rite of the Mass inspired by this council was protected from any change or modification by canonical regulations which legislated absolute compliance to the most minute rubrical detail under pain of sin. The four hundred years between the promulgation of the Missal of Pius V in 1570 and that of Paul VI in 1970 is a history of rigid liturgical centralization and uniformity in the Roman Catholic church, largely immune to any attempts at adaptation. It was during this period that, having no outlet to modify the liturgy as such, that both popular devotions and a manifest theatricality increasingly began to "frame" the eucharistic liturgy and other rites of the church. Medieval practices such as processions and expositions of the Blessed Sacrament, novenas to the saints, the rosary, and the dramatizations of biblical stories performed both inside and outside the church were maintained, especially in the Spanish part of the Catholic world. While the rite of the Mass itself could not be changed, its celebration was peripherally embellished by full orchestras and choirs performing complex musical compositions. The churches built during this period resemble theaters where the faithful, like an audience, "attended" the various ceremonies of the church "performed" in a dramatic setting designed to inspire feelings of devotion and awe. During this age of "divine right monarchs" it is also not by chance that many churches resembled throne rooms where the great king of heaven present in the Blessed Sacrament held court, enthroned in an ornate tabernacle on the main altar, surrounded by candles, flowers and incense.

Ironically, these four hundred years also corresponded to a period of great missionary outreach by the church to peoples of different cultures in the Americas, Africa, Asia and Oceania. One notable exception to this Roman insistence on uniformity was an experiment promoted by Matteo Ricci, a Jesuit missionary in China, which became the object of controversy from 1610-1742. Ricci obtained important indulgences from the Holy See to adapt the Mass, liturgical vestments, and language of the liturgy to Chinese culture. Moreover, he also urged that the practice of the Chinese, derived from Confucianism, to honor their ancestors by bowing before "ancestor" tablets not be interpreted as idolatry or superstition, but be permitted to Chinese converts by the church as a cultural expression which was an integral part of Chinese identity. These attempts at rooting the gospel and the worship of Chinese Catholics in their own culture were met by serious opposition from other missionaries, notably the Dominicans, who accused Ricci and the Jesuits of promoting idolatry. In a very interesting instruction to the Vicars Apostolic of the Far East, issued by Propaganda Fide in 1659, the idea of transplanting Europe to China as necessary for evangelization was labelled as absurd. The instruction clearly draws a distinction between the faith and its European cultural expression, and states that the faith does not demand that rites and customs of non-Europeans be repudiated or destroyed in order for them to become Christian; that indeed, the faith wills that these rites and customs be preserved intact in order to serve as vehicles for evangelization, provided they are not "depraved" ("Instructio Vicariorum Apostolicorum ad Regna Synarum Tonchini et Cocinnae Profiscentium," in Collectanea Sacrae Congregationis Propaganda Fide, I, Rome, 1907). This instruction, therefore, lays down the principle of liturgical adaptation which would be echoed in Pius XII's encyclical Summi Pontificatus of 1939, (Acta Apostolica Sedis 31 (1939):429) and in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II, 37.

Unfortunately, the insights of both Matteo Ricci and Propaganda Fide were lost in the intervening years. Chinese performance of ancestral rites was condemned by the bull Ex quo singulari in 1742 which "spelled the loss of China and Indochina to the Church" (Chupungco, Cultural Adaptation, p. 38). It became clear to many potential converts outside of western Europe that to become Christian meant to become European.

Vatican II and Liturgical Adaptation

The fifty years prior to Vatican II witnessed a renewed interest in matters liturgical and in making the liturgy truly the prayer of the church. Prompted by both the liturgical movement and the liturgical reforms of Pius X, Pius XII, and John XXIII, the liturgy once again became the object of serious study by theologians, historians, and missionaries. Since it was also during this period that the church was wrestling with the modernist controversy which discouraged the open questioning of any aspect of church life which was considered traditional, it is not surprising that these studies most often revolved around a return to the sources of the Roman rite as it was practiced in the city of Rome from the 4th to the 7th centuries. The effort was to recapture the valued "Roman genius" of the liturgy and clearly distinguish the classical forms from the medieval and baroque accretions which, in the mind of many in the liturgical movement, tended to blur the true nature of liturgical celebrations.

Thus, it was on the basis of historical precedent that a call went out to adapt the liturgy to the needs of the day. Like the liturgical reform attempted by Gregory VII in the 11th century, one could characterize both the papal reforms of the liturgy and the approach of liturgists during this period as a "repristinization" of the Roman rite; a return to the simplicity, sobriety, and clarity of expression characteristic of the classic Roman genius in order to render the worship of the church more accessible to the faithful, especially to those in mission lands. It was on the basis of historical precedent, then, that the restoration of the Easter vigil (1951) and Holy Week (1955) by Pius XII was undertaken and the participation of the assembly in the liturgical action through "dialogue" Masses was promoted by some in the liturgical avant-garde both in Europe and the United States. It was also on the basis of historical research into the liturgy that the period just prior to Vatican II began to hear more and more calls for the use of the vernacular in worship.

Because of the ground-work done by liturgists and historians in the years prior to Vatican II, the Preparatory Commission on the Liturgy established by the pope in 1959 was in a position to quickly draft a schema of the document on the liturgy. It reflects the advanced state of the research on the liturgy prior to the council that this schema became the first order of business of Vatican II.

The norms for liturgical adaptation to the customs and traditions of peoples are outlined by Vatican II (S.C., 37-40). These articles clearly move beyond what many critics had labeled an "archaeological" approach which characterized much of the pre-conciliar research on the liturgy and open the way for real adaptation of the liturgy based on a reformed Roman rite characterized by a "noble simplicity, brevity and clarity" (S.C., 34) and which is now seen as the starting point, not the goal of liturgical renewal. While the council proposes the Roman rite as a "universal" rite, it does so fully aware that there will have to be important differences in the way in which it is celebrated in cultures as diverse as those found in Africa and Asia.

Article 37 of S.C. announces the general principle governing liturgical adaptation and is based on Pius XII's encyclical Summi Pontificatus. This article opens the door to true liturgical pluralism within the Roman rite by stating that "the Church has no wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters which do not affect the faith or the good of the whole community; rather the church respects and fosters the genius and talents of various races and peoples." Clearly, the principle enunciated in this article reflects the historical reality lived by the church down through the ages, except for the anomalous period after the Council of Trent; that it is the faith itself which constitutes ecclesial unity and not a rigid uniformity in the cultural expression of that faith in the liturgy. The article further establishes two general criteria for admitting elements of a particular people's way of life in the worship of the local church. One is negative: "that anything not indissolubly bound up with superstition and error" may be admitted into the liturgy. The other is positive: that these elements be "in harmony with the true and authentic spirit of the liturgy." Both of these criteria require interpretation that is not exhaustively provided by S.C. and will become the object of subsequent debate after the council.

Having stated these general principles of adaptation, S.C. 38-39 then moves to more concrete proposals regarding their implementation and to what could be termed the first level of adaptation of the Roman rite. It provides for "legitimate variations and adaptations to different groups, regions, and peoples" in the revision of the liturgical books. These revisions and adaptations are to be done "especially in mission lands" although the sense of the word "especially" (praesertim) as explained by the conciliar commission, while emphasizing the need for adaptation in mission lands, does not mean to exclude the possibility of adaptation in countries where Christianity and the Roman rite have known a long history.

S.C. 37 sets a limit to these adaptations with the expression, "provided the substantial unity of the Roman rite is preserved." The expression "substantial unity of the Roman rite" is nowhere defined by S.C., but is most probably referring to article 39 which speaks of adaptation within the limits set by the editio typica of the liturgical books. This means to say that the unity of the Roman rite is safeguarded when the norms for adaptation, written into the official liturgical books issued by Rome are observed; norms which give some limited freedom to the "competent territorial authority," i.e., a national conference of bishops, to adapt the liturgy to local needs. It should be noted that if the liturgical books provide for it, the bishops' conferences may institute modifications in the liturgy which go beyond simple cosmetic changes, and which even restructure the rite itself. Article 39 further states that this kind of adaptation is to be applied "especially in the case of the administration of the sacraments, the sacramentals, processions, liturgical language, sacred music and the arts." This mandate is reiterated in article 63 which calls on the bishops' conferences to prepare new rituals adapted "to the needs of the different regions."

Thus, the approach to adaptation taken by these articles (S.C. 38-39) could be described by the term "acculturation" defined as an initial encounter between the Roman rite and the local culture. While maintaining the nucleus of the Roman rite, a translation of those elements which are contingent on western culture would be re-coded or re-interpreted into the particular forms and expressions of the "receiving" culture in order to make them more expressive of the faith.

Article 40 deals with a more radical form of adaptation which can be rightly called "inculturation." While the norms proposed for acculturating the liturgy as found in the revised liturgical books might be sufficient for renewing the liturgy in a European country like Italy, for example, the council wisely foresaw that in areas of the world that are not heirs to an exclusively western European cultural tradition the need for adapting the liturgy would require not only more profound modifications of the Roman rite, but a real inculturation of the liturgy which can be defined as an ongoing process of a reciprocal, critical interaction and assimilation between the Roman rite and the local culture. Although the initial draft of the first part of this article specifically mentioned the missions, this reference was dropped in the final redaction of the document in order to allow the application of this article to other "places and circumstances" not considered "missionary" (Schema Constitutionis de Sacra Liturgia, Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis 1962, 27).

S.C. 40 spells out the nature of these adaptations and the procedure that is to govern their implementation in three paragraphs. The first paragraph stipulates that the "competent territorial ecclesiastical authority" is "to carefully and prudently weigh what elements from the traditions and culture of individual peoples may be appropriately admitted into divine worship." The adaptations judged opportune should then be submitted to the Holy See for approval. The second paragraph deals with the Holy See's granting the bishops' conferences the authority to direct "preliminary experiments" for a specified length of time and within certain groups so that "the adaptations are made with all the circumspection they demand." Finally, the third paragraph speaks of the technical assistance of experts, "particularly in mission lands," where the problems associated with this kind of adaptation would presumably be more complex.

While articles 37-40 of S.C. mark a revolutionary departure from the centuries-old Roman resistance to any kind of liturgical adaptation, they should also be read in the context of other articles which speak of more general principles of liturgical reform such as article 24 which emphasizes the importance of the liturgy being thoroughly grounded in Sacred Scripture. Also, article 23 reflects a more cautious attitude toward both liturgical adaptation and the unity of the Roman rite. It states that even after careful "theological, historical and pastoral investigation" as well as a "study of the experience derived from recent liturgical reforms" that "... there must be no innovations unless the good of the Church genuinely and certainly requires them; care should be taken that any new forms adopted should in some way grow organically from forms already existing." The same article warns against "marked differences between rites used in neighboring areas." While these caveats might seem today to be overly cautious, they reflect the "compromising nature" of a conciliar document drafted to assuage the anxieties of some of the more traditional conciliar participants who feared not only ill-considered innovation but the wholesale destruction of the Roman rite.

Articles other than 37-40 of the same document, however, speak in very specific terms of the possible need for the radical adaptation or inculturation of the liturgy in "mission lands"; especially in the celebration of the sacraments of initiation and marriage. Article 65 proposes that "besides what is part of Christian tradition, those initiation elements in use among individual peoples, to the extent that such rites are compatible with the Christian rite of initiation" be allowed. In much the same spirit, article 77 which speaks of the revision of the marriage rite states that "the competent, territorial ecclesiastical authority . . . is free to draw up . . . its own rite suited to the usages of place and people."

This call for adaptation expressed by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy becomes even more insistent and sophisticated in subsequent conciliar documents which treat of the relationship between the church and culture, especially the Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church (A.G., 9, 10, 11, 21, 22) and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (G.S., 44, 58). These documents, along with the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (L.G., 13, 17, 23) and the Declaration on the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (N.A., 2), being the product of a more mature degree of conciliar thought on the question of adaptation, help to describe in more detail the relationship of the church to culture and hence clarify some of the ambiguity noted in the liturgy document relative to liturgical adaptation.

One of the most important theological constructs proposed by the council to describe the relation of church to culture is found in the Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church (A.G., 10). This article proposes the incarnation of Christ universal church relates to local cultures. The Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World defines this relationship as reciprocal; it is not simply a question of the church "translating" into another cultural idiom the datum of the faith whose western European expression is considered somehow normative. Rather, citing the historical relationship between the church and culture, it belongs to the church itself to again profit from the "riches hidden in different cultures" and "to learn to express the Christian message in the concepts and language of different peoples" through fostering a "vital contact and exchange between the Church and different cultures" (G.S., 44). Moreover, "the Church has been sent to all ages and nations and, therefore, is not tied exclusively and indissolubly to any race or nation, to any one particular way of life, or to any customary practices, ancient or modern" (G.S., 58).

These teachings of the council clearly have implications for the more radical adaptation or inculturation of the liturgy as described in S.C. 40 in groups and nations which are not heirs to the western European cultural tradition.

Post-conciliar Developments

The period just after the council saw intense activity on the part of the various commissions established to revise and translate the new liturgical books into modern languages. It should be pointed out that the very translation of the official Latin editio typica versions of the liturgical books constitutes an adaptation. The Instruction Comme le prévoit of 1969, on the translation of liturgical texts for celebration with a congregation (D.O.L., 838-880), clearly enunciates principles and norms which emphasize that the text "as a ritual sign, is a medium of spoken communication" (D.O.L., 842) and discourages a literal fidelity to the Latin text, opting for the principle of "adamic communication" where the concepts expressed in the Latin text are rendered in a modern language by proposing an equivalent concept drawn from the culture where the language is used. Realizing the complex nature of this enterprise, the Consilium also wisely notes that "after sufficient experiment and passage of time, all translations will need review" (D.O.L., 838). Finally, the document takes into account the limitation of translations by noting that the mere translation of texts is "not sufficient for a fully renewed liturgy. The creation of new texts will be necessary" (D.O.L., 880).

Looking at the introductions and ritual directions in the revised and translated liturgical books, the word "adaptation" is applied to the liturgy in two distinct ways. The first kind of adaptation concerns the alternatives provided by the liturgical books themselves to be selected by those who prepare the liturgy so that the celebration might "correspond as fully as possible to the needs, spiritual preparation, and mentality of the participants" (General Introduction to the Rite of Mass, 313). The Instruction Actio Pastoralis, on Masses for special groups and the Directory for Masses with Children issued by the Congregation for Divine Worship makes further provision for this kind of adaptation of the eucharistic celebration based on the number, age, and spiritual needs of those who make up the assembly. The revised rites of initiation, for example, also contain articles which provide guidelines for the presider's adaptation of the celebration (R.C.I.A., 67, Rite of Baptism for Children 27-31, Rite of Confirmation 18).

A second kind of adaptation proposed by the post-conciliar documents already enunciated in S.C. 38 and 39 falls within the purview of national bishops conferences deputed by S.C. 63 to compose their own rituals "adapted to the needs of their specific regions" and which were to be confirmed by the Holy See. Elements from the local culture can be incorporated into the liturgy which substitute or illustrate the Roman Ritual. This "acculturation" of the liturgy parallels to some degree the principle of "dynamic equivalence" at work in the translation of verbal texts. Much of the post-conciliar work on adaptation, especially in Africa and Asia has used this method. The recent "Roman Missal for the Dioceses of Zaïre" approved by the Congregation for Divine Worship in 1988 ("Le Missel Romain pour diocèses du Zaïre," Notitiae 24 (1988):454-472), is a good example of the use of this approach. This missal "interprets" the Roman Missal in the cultural idiom of this region of Africa, restructuring the rite, adding local gestures, and proposing alternate prayers that reflect deeply held values in Africa such as respect for ancestors.

The third and most radical form of adaptation, inculturation, is not provided for by the liturgical books except in the case of marriage. The Introduction to the Rite of Marriage speaks not only of assuming elements from the local culture to illustrate what is contained in the Roman Ritual (O.C.M., 13-16), but for the creation of a whole new rite based on the culture of the place, as long as the presence of the minister who witnesses the vows is safeguarded and the nuptial blessing is given. In this case, the Rite of Marriage seems to be asking for a genuine dialogue with the local culture; a dialogue that presupposes a real reciprocity by encouraging the use of marriage customs and traditions originating in the pre-Christian culture. However, in general, there seems to be a marked hesitance on the part of the Roman authorities to implement fully the possibilities inherent in article 40 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy.

On the one hand, there seems to be a fear that inculturation would lead to a total disintegration of the Roman rite whose theological and formal characteristics are deemed worthy of retention, even in very different cultural contexts. On the other hand, not very much time has elapsed for true inculturation to take place. As we know from history, it took several centuries for the "Christianization" of the Roman Empire to get to the point where the church felt comfortable in adopting formerly pagan customs into Christian worship. Although conciliar documents like Nostra Aetate (2) spoke of a real openness and respect for non-Christian religions, it seems that a similar process needs to take place in non-European areas before the liturgy can truly be described as having inculturated elements from non-Christian religions which are an integral part of the cultural identity of these countries.

Conclusion

As the previous pages have demonstrated, liturgical adaptation is not a new phenomenon. Since the liturgy is the self-expression of the church, it has and must continue to adapt itself to the different and changing cultural environments in which it finds itself or risk becoming irrelevant. Much more is at stake than simply making people feel more "at ease" in worship; the very mission of the church to preach the Gospel to all nations is compromised when adaptation does not take place. As Anscar Chupungco notes, "the refusal to adapt amounts to a denial of the universality of salvation" (Chupungco, Cultural Adaptation, p. 87). The challenge that faces all local churches at present, especially those in non-European settings, is essentially one of evangelization: to proclaim and celebrate the message of the gospel and the mystery of Christ in a way that is meaningful to the many cultures of the human race. This can only be done if local churches are allowed to continue on the road to true liturgical inculturation indicated by the Vatican II. As Paul VI intended out. "Evangelization loses much of its force and effectiveness if it does not take into consideration the actual people to whom it is addressed, if it does not use their language, their signs and symbols, if it does not answer the questions they ask, and if it does not have an impact on their concrete life" (Evangeliū Nuntiandi, 63).

ADORATION, THEOLOGY OF

The theology of adoration is really a part of a broader question: communion and worship of the eucharist outside its celebration. The purpose of this article is to give a brief historical sketch of communion practice and the origins of eucharistic devotions outside the celebration of the eucharist. From these we hope to draw the theological roots of eucharistic adoration and the challenges it presents today.

To start with, the early Christians had celebrated their eucharist in the context of an ordinary meal. The emphasis was on the action of eating and drinking, of sharing a meal with the risen Christ and with one another. They were especially concerned with the purpose of all this, namely, nourishing the Christ life already within them through baptism, unity with each other in Christ and eternal life through a share in Christ's resurrection (cf. Jn 6:51-58; 1 Cor 10: 16-18; Acts 2:42-47).

As time went on, the eucharist was separated from the ordinary meal.

probably because of abuses (cf. 1 Cor II: 17-34). This was the case by the time of Justin Martyr (d. 165) who describes the eucharist in terms of a "stylized" meal, i.e., one in which the bread and wine alone serve as food and drink. Justin makes the point that "... the gifts over which the thanksgiving has been spoken are distributed, and everyone shares in them, while they are also sent via the deacons to the absent brethren" (Deiss, L., Springtime of the Liturgy, trans. by M.J. O'Connell, Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1979, p. 93-94). All who are present receive and communion is brought to the sick so that they also can share the Sunday celebration. Thus the first evidence of communion outside of Mass links it intimately with the celebration itself and this holds true until the end of the 4th century (cf. Mitchell, II, 28).

The stress also continued to be on the receiving of communion and its purpose. Augustine (d. 430) put it so well: "If you receive well, you are what you have received.... Since you are the body of Christ and his members, it is your mystery that is placed on the Lord's table; it is your mystery that you receive.... Be what you see, and receive what you are" (Megivern, 68). This same point was made by Pope St. Leo the Great (d. 461): "The partaking of the body and blood of Christ has no other effect than to make us pass over into what we receive" (Ibid. 72).

Up to the 4th century, the rule was that all the faithful partook in communion. But then with unexpected rapidity, at least in some countries, the number dropped off sharply. The reasons are numerous and complex and were to give rise to a shift in attitudes which would provide the setting for eucharistic devotions outside the Mass. First, there were the christological controversies. Arianism's attempt to play down Christ's divinity led to an overemphasis of that divinity almost to the exclusion of his humanity, despite Chalcedon's effort in 451 to strike a balance. The risen Jesus became a distant God. This eventually led to the liturgy and clergy becoming distant as well. Second, the eucharistic action and eucharistic food were disengaged from communal acts of dining. This in turn led to a new interpretation in which "... the ancient human symbols of dining together were reinterpreted as ritual drama, vivid symbolic reenactments of Jesus' life, death and resurrection" (Mitchell, 5). From there it was a short step to dramatic allegorizations like those of Amalar of Metz which emphasized recalling the past rather than present participation through communion as Augustine and those before him had stressed. Third, the gradual limiting of the knowledge of the language of the liturgy (in this case Latin) to a select few widened the gap between the people and the celebration. The inability of the ordinary people to understand the language of the liturgy and thus to participate in it led them to seek an alternate language. Eating and drinking the eucharist would gradually give way to "ocular communion," the desire to see the host. Finally, the growing distance and awesomeness of Christ and the liturgy was eventually to lead to a demand (9th century on) for sacramental confession before each communion and for longer fasts in preparation for communion (Jungmann, 56-70, 498-502; Mitchell, 4-5, 116-119; Megivern, 63-66, 73-74, 81).

These factors probably account, at least in part, for the widespread use in the 9th century of unleavened bread, a tube or straw to drink from the chalice, communion on the tongue instead of the hand and communion in church outside the celebration of eucharist. The same factors plus controversies in the 9th, 11th and 12th centuries over Christ's presence in the eucharist and the "moment of consecration," focused more attention on the elements of bread and wine and miracles in their regard, e.g., bleeding hosts. An ever decreasing number of communicants followed. No longer able to participate actively in the language of the liturgy and out of extreme reverence or fear hesitating to partake in communion, the faithful were ripe for other forms of expressing their belief in Christ's presence in the eucharist. The attitude that the eucharist was something to be looked at and adored rather than eaten was to become characteristic of medieval eucharistic piety (Jungmann, 89-92; 502-512; Megivern, 29-33, 43, 78-84; Mitchell, 5-6).

Reservation of the sacrament had obviously been a practice from the start so that communion could be brought to the sick and dying. In addition, in earlier times people were allowed to bring communion home for use during the week. The origin of prayer before the sacrament seems to be the priest's prayer before communion (11th century). This evolved into the people's praying after the elevation (late 12th century) and visits to the Blessed Sacrament (early 13th century). Reservation near or on the altar in the 13th century tended to focus the devotion in that area (cf. Jungmann, 522-23; Mitchell, 164-70).

Eucharistic processions appear as early as the 11th century, at least in England. As devotion to looking upon the host grew, these became a way to honor Christ in the Blessed Sacrament and to gaze at the host even longer. On the continent, the bishop of Liège approved the feast of Corpus Christi for his diocese in 1276. It soon spread and included a procession of the Blessed Sacrament (cf. Mitchell, 170-76).

The earliest form of exposing the eucharistic species was just before communion with an expression like, "Holy things for the holy." Until the beginning of the 13th century this was the only place that the people were invited to gaze upon the sacred species and reverence them.

With the introduction of the elevation, which in the 14th century came to be regarded as the supreme moment of the celebration, the people were invited to adore our Lord immediately after the words of "consecration." Earlier it had been an invitation to partake of communion. Now, however, the invitation was to contemplation or "ocular communion." So far exposition had been from within the liturgy itself—at communion, at viaticum or communion to the dying, or Corpus Christi. In 1380 a popular custom arose in some parts of Germany to expose the sacrament in a monstrance. This eventually led to exposition in a monstrance apart from the liturgy (cf. Mitchell, 176-81).

The origin of Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament was also from within the liturgy of the hours and of Corpus Christi. In the early 13th century it became popular to sing Marian hymns at the end of evening or night prayer. In the 14th century the trend was to do so in the presence of the Blessed Sacrament to enhance this devotion rather than to increase honor to the sacrament. On Corpus Christi as early as 1301, there were stations or pauses where the priest would bless the people with the sacrament and at the end of the procession they would be blessed by a monstrance or similar vessel (cf. Mitchell, 181-84).

All these devotions to the eucharist outside of Mass had their origins, then, in the liturgy. In addition, many of them seem to have appeared first in communities of religious.

As is often the case, the main theological lines of these attitudes and devotions emerge from history. Their roots lie in the belief that the risen Christ is really present in the eucharistic celebration and in the desire to extend that celebration to those who were sick or dying, in danger of persecution or absent for some other good reason. This is anthropologically as well as theologically sound and leads to what Piet Fransen describes as the "law of extension." Symbolic realities, when they have central importance in our lives, tend to extend themselves in similar, if only analogical, expressions. A married couple, for instance, find many ways of expressing their love in addition to the marital act, e.g., kisses, touches, gazes. It is important not to disparage these extensions simply because they are not the central act or were not there from the very beginning, e.g., eucharistic processions. It is equally important, however, to recall their original source and background and to relate them to that central celebration (cf. P. Fransen, Intelligent Theology, Vol. I, Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1969).

The origin of all eucharistic devotions outside Mass lies, as history tells us, in the liturgy itself. To lose sight of this is to lose sight of their purpose. Underlying all of them is belief in Christ's presence, first in the sharing of the meal and then, by extension, in the remaining bread and wine. If Christ is present in the bread and wine, it seems legitimate and beneficial to adore him there. The difficulty, historically and theologically, is that this worship outside the celebration of the eucharist sometimes seemed to be loosed from its moorings. That is its weakness. Its strength rests in its ability to give people time and quiet to reflect on what it means to receive the body of Christ—the whole body, as Augustine would say, head and members—into one's heart. There were good elements in the "elevation" or "tabernacle" piety, namely, personal devotion to Jesus, an awareness of the sacrificial character of the eucharist and an awareness of the power of the eucharist to draw one to imitate Christ's self-sacrifice. Perhaps more attention to these elements today would help us appropriate more deeply the paschal mystery of Christ which we celebrate in the eucharist (Jungmann, 90-91; cf. also E. Diederich, "Notes on Liturgy" and

"The Eucharistic Mystery in All Its Fullness," Review for Religious 42 (May-June and Nov-Dec, 1983) 363-380, 914-927).

Pastorally, the future is challenging. Is it possible to return to the center without losing the values of eucharistic devotions outside of Mass? "The celebration of the Eucharist in the sacrifice of the Mass is truly the origin and goal of the worship which is shown to the Eucharist outside of Mass" (Instruction on Eucharistic Worship, May 25, 1967, Washington, D.C.: 1967, art. 3e). Is it possible to rediscover the value of eucharistic devotions outside of Mass without letting them again slip loose from their moorings? Mitchell's quote from T.S. Eliot's "Little Gidding" is on target: We shall not cease from exploration. And the end of all our exploring will be to arrive where we started and know the place for the first time (Mitchell, 8).

All the eucharistic devotions, even the most elaborate, have as their purpose or end to bring us back to the beginning—to Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, sharing this meal and his paschal mystery with his people.

ADULT COMMITMENT, RITUAL FOR

A ritual for adult commitment is a ceremony in which adults express their assent to the beliefs of their church. It is appropriate for those who joined the church when they were too young to make their personal assent, or those who have long adhered to their church's teachings but find themselves at a stage of life's journey when they feel moved to recommit themselves to that faith.

Rituals of this nature have grown in popularity in the last part of the 20th century due to advances in psychology, anthropology, and sacramental theology. Since human life expectancy has grown longer, psychologists have identified several "stages" through which human beings pass from childhood throughout their adult life. With the guidance of anthropology, theologians have argued for marking those stages of development with appropriate rituals. Since people seem to go through stages of faith as well as psychological development, rituals have followed to help the faithful express their new level of commitment to the church.

An example may be found in the Lutheran Book of Worship. There is found the ritual for "Affirmation of Baptism," a service which may take place in three different forms: confirmation, reception into membership, and restoration to membership. Each service marks a time in the life of the member who is ready to restate his or her commitment to the local church. In the first instance, after careful study, one comes before the bishop for prayer. In the second, one transfers membership from one congregation to another. In the third, one who has been away from membership is restored.

Another example is in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer. Here, too, the rite of confirmation is expanded to include two similar services, reception for those joining from another baptized communion and reaffirmation for those making a personal recommitment to the church.

A difficulty has arisen in the Roman Catholic church since it has no ritual for adult commitment in the same way as other Christian denominations have. The Catholic liturgy approaches adult commitment from other sources.

The example par excellence in the Catholic liturgy is the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. Here one finds a complex of liturgical rites to accompany change of heart. Whether the adults in question have never been baptized or are joining the Catholic church from another communion, they make a ritual commitment to the Catholic church with the assistance of these rites.

Another example is the sacrament of reconciliation. A believer who has sinned may seek to heal the separation from the church through a ritual of reconciliation with the church's minister. The act of reconciliation to the church is especially evident when the rite is celebrated in common. Although not properly a rite of "commitment," reconciliation implies a recommitment of one's life to the gospel and to the church community.

Still another example of adult commitment in the Catholic liturgy is the celebration of Easter Sunday. Both in the vigil Mass and the Masses of Easter day, Catholics renew their baptismal promises in place of reciting the creed. Each year the celebrant asks the congregation to renounce Satan and express its belief in Christ, and each year the assembly recommitments to its baptismal creed.

In recent years the pastoral practice in many dioceses around the world has been to use the rite of confirmation as a ritual of adult commitment. In this case, Catholics who were baptized as infants delay their celebration of confirmation till young adulthood. Catechesis surrounding the confirmation of young adults has encouraged them to make personally the commitment others made for them when they were young.

This practice has its problems. The difficulty is reconciling how one rite which is initiatory for adults and children of catechetical age becomes a rite of commitment for those baptized in infancy. In any event, confirmation has been made to fill the gap in a church which has no ritual for adult commitment as other denominations have developed.

A ritual for adult commitment may be simply devised: The faithful who have expressed a desire to recommit to their faith may present themselves to the assembly. The liturgy of the word may be celebrated with texts drawn from the rite of baptism. Then those who wish to recommit themselves could do so through the renewal of their baptismal promises and the prayer of the celebrant and assembly. Blessings and dismissal may conclude the celebration. Such a ritual would be repeatable, and faithful could be encouraged to celebrate it as they felt so moved at different stages of life's journey.

ADVENT

The season of preparation for Christmas, known also in some Eastern churches as the season of Annunciation. The Prayer of this season "looks forward" in relation to the triple coming of the Lord: in history, in grace, at the end of time. Its tone is of anticipation, expectation, yearning.

AESTHETICS, LITURGICAL

The term "aesthetics" derives from a Greek root meaning "of or pertaining to things perceptible by the senses, things material (as opposed to things thinkable or immaterial)" (O.E.D.). Since the 18th century the term has come to designate the theory and interpretation of the beautiful in art and in nature. Liturgical aesthetics comprehends both the modern and classical ranges of meaning of the term. Thus the scope of this article includes the concept of beauty in relation to prayer and ritual as well as reflection on the sensible signs and various "languages" of worship such as time, space, sound and silence, movement and gesture, sacramental sign-acts, and the artistic environment.

Relations between beauty, the human senses and the worship of God are both obvious and difficult to trace in their complexity. Liturgical worship requires corporately shared forms into which a community of faith enters, and through which it is formed in and gives expression to adoration, praise, thanksgiving, and petition. Because liturgy is more than texts and rubrics governing the correct performance of ritual acts, the "poetics of liturgical celebration" is of primary importance. The study of literary qualities of texts is only one strand in such a poetics. Since the mystery of God's self-communication in word and sacrament is always in and through specific forms, the poetics of liturgical celebration constitute a simultaneously theological and anthropological inquiry. Poetics as the study of how living discourse utilizes the powers of language is here applied to the broad range of liturgical utterance and to the arts of ritual enactment.

Liturgy possesses great formative and expressive power over human imagination, thought, emotion and will. Speaking theologically, we may say that, over time, Christian liturgy forms persons in the paschal mystery which it signifies, and at the same time brings to communal expression the lived experience of the gospel. From a phenomenological or anthropological point of view, liturgy may be said to form human persons (and communities) in specific symbol systems and fundamental ways of being in the world. At the same time, liturgical rites become the means of expressing primary identity and passionate self-understanding. Both the formative and expressive dimensions of liturgy require structure and particular elements—words, actions, symbols, music and related art forms. But what gives such elements and the structure of the rites life is style—a particular way of celebrating the rites. As Aidan Kavanagh has observed, “... the artful symbolism which is the liturgy is never secured in the abstract or in general. It is accomplished in specific acts done by people in certain places at given times” (“The Politics of Symbol and Art in Liturgical Expression,” in Maldonado and Power, 39). Liturgical aesthetics investigates what is signified and experienced and how it is so signified and experienced in actual worshipping assemblies.

If Christian liturgy is understood as a complex of communal sign-actions and texts brought together in symbolic patterns about the scriptures, the font and the table, then liturgical aesthetics studies the perceptual elements and the art of ritual enactment which render these human activities alive with significant form. If Christian liturgy is understood as an epiphany of the mystery of the divine self-communication, then liturgical aesthetics must address the question of how the style of celebration opens access to understanding and participation in that which theology cannot explain but can only comprehend in wonder and adoration. Both conceptions of liturgy and both methodologies are necessary.

Liturgy and Aesthetics: Historical Ambiguities

The matrix of artistic creativity for pre-Reformation cultural life in the West was the Christian liturgy. Liturgical art was, to a great extent, the fountainhead of popular art, and the cultural imagination was permeated with biblical stories and liturgical images. Such an historical period furnishes ample evidence of the power of liturgy to shape and to receive cultural modes of perception. By contrast, the prophetic side of Christianity has from the beginning been suspicious of human imagination, voicing objection to the disassociation of the aesthetic from the ethical or the holy. The words of Amos echo in other historical periods: “Take away from me the noise of your song; to the melody of your harps I will not listen. But let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream” (Amos 5:23-24). Furthermore, the iconoclastic impulse to resist the uses of art emerges in the name of holiness to guard against idolatrous confusion of images with the divine reality they are to represent or express.

At the outset Christianity had considerable reservations about the arts and a relatively unadorned liturgy. The immoralities of songs in the context of pagan rites provided good reason for such suspicion. The pattern of life which was associated with music and the other arts of the theatre was cause of great concern to the church. There was an asceticism in the earliest monastic movements which regarded the ease and even the sensuality of the post-persecution church as apostate. While the prophetic biblical traditions feared idolatry, the use of music, for example, seemed at home in the chanting of psalms. But the traditions springing from the philosophy of Plato also influenced the early church. Aware of the enormous emotional power of music, poetry and dance upon the human psyche, such traditions regarded artistic endeavor as traffic with the ambiguities of sensuality. The strictures against flute-playing in Plato's Republic emerged in the Christian assembly's initial resistance to the use of instruments in worship. The mistrust of matter and images itself led to a chaste role of iconography in the early buildings. Gradually, especially in the East, the idea of the icon as an image which mediates but does not contain the sacred, emerged.

The theological and philosophical suspicions of art and of the aesthetic power of liturgy surfaced virulently again with some of the Reformers of the 16th century. The systematic destruction of images and religious art in places such as Zürich in 1524 at the hands of the Zwinglian town council testify to the fear of external rites, material form and visible symbols. The suppression of all music in the liturgy seems even more extreme, especially at the hands of such an accomplished musician as Ulrich Zwingli. Yet such a reduction of the aesthetic dimension of Christian worship among the Reformers resulted from an enormous drive to purify and to spiritualize worship forms in a period when the aesthetic and symbolic profusion of the Roman rites seemingly overwhelmed the central mystery of God's gracious acts and the primary symbols of faith. The 16th century simplifications were partly a result of a new stress on scripture as a primary source for liturgical norms arising in that period; but they also depended upon an opposition between reason and emotion, alongside a dualism of spirit and the physically sensate. Luther was not such a liturgical purist. In fact, as the liturgical iconoclasm of the Reformation grew more extreme, he spoke, even while defending simplification of the rites, of his eagerness to "see all the arts, especially music, in the service of him who gave and created them." The liturgical aesthetics of the three magisterial Reformers—Luther, Calvin and Zwingli—show a remarkable range of differences among themselves respecting the material forms which worship employs. None of them refers substantially to the earlier traditions which struggled with these same tensions, namely those of the early patristic figures, most especially St. Augustine.

It was St. Augustine who asserted that, despite human sin and limitation, divine providence could yet work through the human experience of beautiful things to illuminate the ground of all human perception and understanding in God. For Augustine the recognition of truth and beauty in and through the created order (the physical and the sensual) revealed a divine lure turning human beings away from desires linked with sensuality and mortality to love of God. Before him, Basil, in his treatise On the Holy Spirit had argued that honor given an image would move on to its origination in God. In contrast to the early theological suspicion of the arts and to the more extreme Reformation, there has been an alternative tradition from Augustine to Aquinas, rediscovered in later historical and cultural periods—as with the 19th century Oxford Movement and neo-Thomist revivals associated with J. Maritain and E. Gilson—which regarded aesthetic activity and its liturgical bearing as defined in light of the relation of God to all human perception and to the goodness of the created order itself.

The history of styles of celebration and the "ceremonial" employed in liturgical rites has shown wide extremes in the history of the church, especially in the West. This fact shows that the aesthetic dimensions of Christian worship are ingredient in any change, whether of complex elaboration over time, or of dramatic reform and simplification. The last third of the 20th century is witnessing one of the most extraordinarily complex periods of reform and renewal in the history of the Western churches. The emergence of liturgical aesthetics as a discipline is partly a necessary outcome of these developments.

Liturgy as Art: Symbolic Form and Mystery

Any consideration of liturgical aesthetics must begin with the acknowledgement of this ambiguity in the long history of Christian faith and artistic expression. Still there remains the fact that liturgy itself employs cultural forms in imaginatively powerful ways. Liturgical action does not simply use art, it IS art—dialogue with God in symbolic form. To speak of liturgical aesthetics, then, is to refer to that which is ingredient in the enactment of the rites, both sacramental and non-sacramental. There is an intrinsically aesthetic character to all liturgical celebration and environment. This fact is at the heart of what liturgy is, according to the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of the Second Vatican Council. The liturgical assembly is the articulation and expression of the saving mystery of God in Christ, and of the nature of the church. The symbolic action of the liturgy is also an experience and manifestation of the church and a participation in the mystery of the triune life of God which animates the world. Such manifestation and participation is always in and through specific cultural forms: language, symbol, ritual sign-acts, music, gesture, visual and tactile environments.

Explorations in the domain of liturgical aesthetics, therefore, seek to interpret and to understand the various relations between beauty and holiness in particular liturgical contexts. Bearing in mind the ambiguities of the human imagination per se and the possibilities of mistaking the symbol for the reality symbolized, liturgical aesthetics proceeds on the assumption that there is an ultimate connection between beauty and the reality of God. Liturgical aesthetics is based on the fact that liturgy is a complex art form and that right praise and thanksgiving to God require the engagement of the full range of human emotion, intellect and will. Liturgical worship employs corporate, shared forms which invite and engender a fully human participation, neither exclusively cognitive (mental) nor exclusively emotive or volitional.

The symbolic value and the beauty of the various elements of the liturgy derive from the material and form of each, while the sacredness or holiness derives from the mystery of the events celebrated “in, with, and through” Jesus Christ. These principles are based on the claim that God has created all things and called them good and has become incarnate in Jesus Christ, gathering an historical human community—always culturally embedded and embodied—for worship and service in the world. Liturgical aesthetics is thus rooted and grounded in the doctrines of creation and incarnation. All things are rendered holy by virtue of creation and the redemptive action of God, and are to be so regarded and brought to expression in communal worship of God. Liturgical worship respects the difference between creature and Creator, employing the things of earth to signify the glory and mercy and justice of God. This calls for a fundamental religious sensibility oriented to splendor and to appropriate sobriety and awe in the use of language, symbol, gesture, and the various languages of the rites.

Yet there is also a permanent tension involved in the use of material objects, the domain of the senses, and the imaginative powers of human art. This is because human beings are not in full harmony with the created order, nor is any human community or culture congruent with a fully transformed world. Our liturgies remain “east of Eden” and captive to the limits of human cultural perception as well. In short, Christian communities remain sinful and culturally bound. This means that whatever significant form is realized in liturgical celebration conveying the self-giving of God, we still “see through a glass a dark

Hence liturgical aesthetics must always point to an eschatological self-critique of the use of forms. This permanent tension in liturgy as art is but a reflection of the situation of faith—we live in a good but fallen creation, between the initiation of redemptive history and its consummation. Any given liturgical aesthetic belonging to a particular time and culture requires a counterpoint in a religious sensibility oriented to that which transcends culture, to that “which eye has not seen, nor ear heard,” which God has prepared for the children of earth.

The eschatological reservation concerning the cultural embeddedness of all aesthetic dimensions of Christian liturgy will be made more explicit at the end of this essay. To a discussion of various languages and the aesthetic dimension of all liturgical rites enacted we now turn.

Time and Space

From the beginning, Christian liturgical celebrations involved the use of cultural modes of communication, language itself being a primary instance. The words and texts employed in the liturgy operate within a complex of non-verbal phenomena. The sense and force of the words employed in worship depend radically for their range and depth upon the non-verbal features of the rites and how they are enacted. The meaning of a sung text, for example, has a greater aesthetic range than the same text recited. The same text or ritual gesture—or their combination—has a different connotative range in different seasons or feasts during the church year.

Among the primary non-verbal languages which constitute the poetics of liturgical celebration is time. Because liturgical rites are temporal, unfolding the juxtaposition of text, symbols, and ritual acts over time, participation is itself a temporal art. Within the duration of a single liturgical rite, for example, a eucharistic celebration, the meaning of and dramatic rather than self-contained. Each text or gesture or liturgical sub-unit may possess its own determinate sense, but the significance and the broader radiations of meaning can only be discerned in light of the whole pattern. Worship may be impoverished, of course, by lack of coherence or structural dislocation, illustrated by the proliferation of sequences in the Renaissance period. Thus the poetry of an entrance hymn or a festival Gloria may be fully grasped only after its connection with the praise and thanksgiving of the eucharistic prayer is sounded. The remarkable complexity and aesthetic power of images in the Exsultet at the Easter vigil does not fully unfold until the temporal process of reading and hearing the whole sequence of readings is completed and the baptismal covenant is sounded. Liturgy is a temporal art and is, in this sense, properly analogous to music, to drama and to dance. This is why liturgical participation requires a sense of the “dance” and the “drama” of the rites, even when these art forms do not appear explicitly. The temporal art of liturgical celebration is in this respect intrinsically musical and dramatic.

The language of time also works in the accumulative associative power of specific elements within a rite. Thus, the aesthetic range and significance of eating and drinking together takes time. In everyday life we come to understand the multiple levels of meaning of such acts only after we have had meals together on birthdays, after funerals, on anniversaries and through the changing seasons of human lives in a wide range of ordinary circumstances. Symbols deepen as human beings mature with them. The source of the inexhaustibility of primary symbols is located here. At the level of texts the same is true. The same antiphon or full responsorial psalm, when used in different seasons of the year, yields a different range of potential value and force in texts

The language of time also involves discipline in the cycles of the week, the day and the year. The aesthetic depth of liturgical participation is related to the experience of feasts and seasons. The liturgical year is a treasury of the church's memories of who God is and what God has done. The temporal cycles of day, week and year intersect with the sanctoral cycle of holy men and women to form a powerful hermeneutical pattern.

A second non-verbal language is that of space. Because the liturgical assembly occupies a place and arranges the furnishings in that space, a pattern of acoustic, visual and kinetic perception is set up. The places form environments which house the action of the liturgy. Each space and its interior arrangement may be said to possess specific aesthetic properties, encouraging specific kinds of actions and discouraging others. Some spaces invite a static and sedentary approach to God, in fixed auditoria for example. Others invite freedom of encounter and movement, or uncluttered contemplation. The visual focus of the room has a profound effect upon the poetics of textual images and the function of vestments, vessels, gestures and the uses of light within the liturgy.

There is also the history of the use of the building and the interior spaces which influences the tone and style of the liturgical celebration. So in a space where families have gathered for generations, where weddings, funerals and rites of passage have taken place, where the very sound of sung prayer has given association to the action itself, the aesthetic values of the space may dominate or even conflict with the actual style of celebration. At the same time, how we arrange furnishings—altar, ambo, font, musical instruments, presider's chair, the paschal candle—bears strongly upon what can potentially be brought to expression within the assembly.

Sound and Sight

acoustic and the visual domains come into play. The art forms of music, whether congregational, choral or instrumental, depend in larger measure on the properties of the building and the arrangements of the space. The relationship of sound and silence is crucial to music; but it is also part of the intrinsic music of the rites themselves. So all liturgical utterance has pitch, rhythm, intensity and pacing. The silences between words spoken and sung are as important as the sounds themselves, for together they create the primary acoustical images of praise and prayer. Analogously, the pace, intensity, rhythm and tone of ritual actions are part of the hidden music of the rites enacted.

The aesthetics of sound and sight are not ornamental to liturgy, but are intrinsic to the very nature of liturgical celebration. Thus music is not to be conceived primarily as something "inserted" into the rites. Rather, the explicit music should seek to bring to expression the implicit music of the rites. The implicit music is at one and the same time related to the juxtaposition of texts, ritual acts and symbols, and to the specific rites in their context. The actual acoustical experience of prayer or of preaching may carry more force than the semantic context of the actual words. Thus fully articulate musical liturgy is more festive and generates a greater range in levels of participation. At the same time, the style and quality of music must be judged appropriate to the nature of the rites and the nature of the assembly.

Following the Vatican II, the United States Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy published documents pertaining to the aesthetic dimensions of Christian liturgy. Music in Catholic Worship (1972, 1983) and Liturgical Music Today (1982) present complementary sets of guidelines concerning music in the liturgy and provide a theological groundwork for integrity in liturgical music. The earlier both instrumental and choral/vocal in various rites, while the latter proposes criteria for planning and conducting liturgical celebrations.

The whole liturgical environment is to be served by the arts—this is the primary concern of a third document, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (1978; English/Spanish edition, 1986). Particular emphasis is placed upon the liturgical assembly as a servant to God's created world, and its calling to be "sign, witness, and instrument of the reign of God" (par. 38). Precisely because the assembly seeks to remember and to cultivate the redemptive power of God, it must nurture a climate of wonder, awe, reverence, thanksgiving and praise. Therefore liturgy must seek what is beautiful in its total ethos as well as in the specific objects, gestures, sign-actions, music and related art forms employed.

In these documents the acoustic, visual and kinetic dimensions of liturgical celebration are integral to one another. The confluence of these arts in liturgy enables the assembly to discern the presence of God in the whole of the symbolic action. The materials and the form are to reflect the beauty and dignity of the rites they intend to serve. Special focus is devoted to the climate of hospitality, the experience of mystery, the reality and the efficacy of the range of symbols through word, gesture, and movement. A paragraph in E.A.C.W. concerning the concept of the beautiful in Christian liturgy is especially noteworthy: "Because the assembly gathers in the presence of God to celebrate his saving deeds, liturgy's climate is one of awe, mystery, wonder, reverence, thanksgiving and praise. So it cannot be satisfied with anything less than the beautiful in its environment and all its artifacts, movements, and appeals to the senses . . . the beautiful is related to the sense of the numinous, the holy. Where there is evidently no care for this, there is an environment basically unfriendly to mystery and awe, an environment too casual, if not careless, for the liturgical action. In a world dominated by science and technology, liturgy's quest for the beautiful is a particularly necessary contribution to full and balanced human life" (par. 34).

Liturgical Aesthetics and Human Emotion

The relation between liturgy and human emotion is complex, but it is evident that Christian worship forms and expresses particular patterns of emotional dispositions in human beings. Music, poetry, dance, symbolic action—all these have to do with the affective capacities in human life. Liturgy may be regarded as a time and place where the language, sign-action and symbols concerning the divine shape and express human persons in such deep emotions as gratitude to God, hope, repentance, grief, compassion, aversion to injustice and delight in the created order. The Christian life itself is characterized by the having of such emotions and their having become well-springs of attitude and action in life. The language of scripture, prayer and the sacraments has to do with elemental features of human existence: emotions linked to birth and death, suffering, sin, and oppression as well as with desire, joy, hope and happiness. These deep emotions are not simply named or described in the language of liturgy, they are evoked, portrayed, sustained and refined in the rites.

Coming to have and to exercise gratitude to God, holy fear, repentance and amendment of life depend upon sharing deeply in the mystery of prayer and ritual action as in the shared meal of the eucharist. The language of the liturgy in descriptive, ascriptive and performative force shapes us in particular affectional ways of being by addressing God and being open to God. So eucharistic participation points toward a life of gratitude and self-giving. The very four-fold action of taking the bread and cup, blessing God over them, breaking the bread, and giving the gifts presents the pattern which the eucharistic community is to live out in daily life.

To learn gratitude to God or awe or love of God and neighbor one must learn to pray with the church. The graciousness, the holiness and the love of God create the possibility of authentic worship. But the experiential power and range of liturgy is required in turn for the deepening of such dispositions. The integrity of the art of common prayer and ritual action requires that such gratitude, awe and love is not confined to the liturgical event itself. That is, these religious affections are not simply aesthetically held states of feeling. Yet without the aesthetic dimension of participation in and through the forms, no sacramental self-understanding in life can emerge. As Environment and Art rightly observes: "In view of our culture's emphasis on reason, it is critically important for the Church to reemphasize a more total approach to the human person by opening up and developing the non-rational elements of liturgical celebration: the concerns for feelings of conversion, support, joy, repentance, trust, love, memory, movement, gesture, wonder" (par. 35).

Christian liturgy which seeks emotional and symbolic authenticity and depth must always pay attention to the material and the forms employed. Language which is only clear or cognitively precise with no overplus of poetic meaning will diminish the power of the symbols to hold together multiple levels of meaning. If the ritual actions are perfunctory or merely efficient, the texts and symbols will be diminished. If the music is always immediately accessible and without surprise or tension or durability, the texts wedded to such music suffer reduction in imaginative power and metaphoric range. The quality of texts, gestures, movements, and the form of the symbols is critical to levels of participation. Attention to each element and to their interrelation in the whole pattern of the liturgy is necessary to the power of liturgy to draw us, as church, into the gospel proclaimed and the saving mystery enacted. This is what leads Joseph Gelineau to say, "Only if we come to the liturgy without hopes or fears, without longings or hunger, will the rite symbolize nothing and remain an indifferent or curious 'object.' Moreover, people who are not accustomed to poetic, artistic, or musical language or symbolic acts among their means of expression and communication find the liturgy like a foreign country whose customs and language are strange to them" (98-99).

Liturgical Style and Culture

The question of style is not a matter of mere technique. If it were so we could produce awe-inspiring liturgical rites by manipulating lighting and symbols. But the aesthetic dynamism of authentic liturgical celebration is the opposite of manipulation and magic; it is the opening of the mystery of the realities signified, proclaimed, and ritually participated in. This "opening" is a matter of faithfulness and attentiveness to the whole environment of worship. Each unit or element of the liturgical assembly, and each "sub-rite," invites a particular quality of disposition which is appropriate to the nature of the rite and its context. This goes together with honesty and integrity of materials and the aesthetic adequacy of the forms. Both the leaders and the assembly as a whole share mutual responsibilities for the art of the liturgy. The presider and other specific ministers become focal points and representations of the prayerful participation of the assembly. Activities of gathering, singing, praying, reading, listening, bowing, touching, eating and drinking all require a heightened sense of receptivity and active participation as a community of mutuality. The cultural variables here are many, since different cultures exhibit differences in behavior in the course of such activities.

The church's teaching and catechetical approach to preparing the worshippers—both long term and immediately in the room of celebration—cannot neglect the aesthetic dimensions of specific cultures. The study of liturgical forms and teaching the primary symbols of faith must create a hospitable environment. Assisting the worshippers to participate fully in the musical forms, for example, requires sensitivity to the range of musical styles available to the people. Giving the assembly a model of good "performance practice" in responsorial psalmody, the hymns or sung responses can open up new dimensions of the cultural heritage. The problems of musical participation raise all the issues of liturgical participation. Creating appropriate spaces of silence for reflection on the readings and in relation to the sign-acts and symbols is part of the non-manipulative art of the liturgy.

The poetics of celebration requires examination of the specific cultural context of the assembly. In our post-conciliar period, new emphasis is being placed on the modes of expression indigenous to the social/cultural history of the people. If the liturgy is to signify the divine/human interaction, then modes of appropriating and sharing the basic symbols must be mediated in and through the language, music, visual, and bodily style of the people. The aesthetics of liturgy thus demands that we know the differences between, for example, patterns proper to a North-American cultural tradition formed principally in Northern Europe and patterns that are Afro-American or Hispanic.

At the same time, the symbolic action points to realities which are in tension with all inherited cultural assumptions and patterns of behavior. The permanent tension in the poetics of liturgy is between the necessity of local cultural modes of perception (expression and interpretation) and the common culture of Christian faith and life. Only by maintaining this tension can we also assert specifically Christian faith and life over against the assumptions of much post-modern and technological culture. Though each sub-culture has its own integrity, there is a manner of celebration which is Christian, stemming from the particular claims of the paschal mystery. There is a way of enacting the rites which is ultimately the human reception of what God has done in creation and in Jesus Christ. This has been referred to by Gelineau and others as the "paschal human in Christ"—a manner enacted in particular cultural languages which evidences "both reserve and openness, respect and simplicity, confident joy . . . and true spontaneity . . ." (113).

Afterword

Liturgy belongs to the created world and thus is an art, for the created order belongs to God. The aesthetics of authentic liturgy concerns the intrinsic means, not simply the external decoration, or the rites themselves. Without such aesthetic considerations such as honesty of materials, quality of craft and performance, appropriateness, proportionality and integrity within the liturgy of the art forms and the people, the whole of the liturgy is diminished in its symbolic power.

Yet, lest we take delight only in the beautiful forms we have managed, and not discern the enabling grace of God in and through the forms, the final word must be eschatological. All artistic effort is itself proleptic as well as participatory in God's creativity. The mystery celebrated is never exhausted nor fully contained in the liturgy. Liturgical rites authentically celebrated point beyond themselves to the eschatological vision and the "heavenly liturgy" of Christ of which all earthly celebrations are but hints and guesses. This way all attention to the aesthetics of Christian liturgy is but a servant of the vision of a created order transformed and reconciled to the life of God. There all that is creaturely will be permeated with light, dance and song. Insofar as we experience the prefigurement of that reality in particular times and places, the aesthetics of liturgical celebration become congruent with the holiness and the beauty of the triune life of God, at once incarnate in the world and yet transcendent in glory beyond all created things.

AGAPE

The love feast was shared by the early Christians as a common fellowship meal. Sacred meals were common features of pagan and Jewish cults in antiquity. Regulations for a communal meal are found in the Manual of Discipline of the Qumran community by the Dead Sea. Gregory Dix argued that the meals shared by Jesus and his disciples were typical of the chaburoth, the formal fellowship meals shared by pious Jews. This need not stand in opposition to the last supper also being a Passover meal. Such a chaburah could also share the Passover meal.

The early Christians continued to have meal fellowship. A distinction between the agape and the Lord's Supper is not easy to make because the Lord's Supper was also celebrated in the context of a communal meal (see 1 Cor 11:17-34). J.-P. Audet has contended that Didache 9-10 describes an agape meal while ch. 14 refers to the eucharist. This view must contend against the fact that the text in ch. 9 is headed with the description, "Now concerning the Eucharist," and that if the prayers in chs. 9-10 are not for the eucharist, there is no detailed description of this central Christian rite in a manual which otherwise includes all areas of church life. It is possible that a distinction between the agape and the sacrament cannot be made, and that ch. 14 concerns church discipline more than the eucharist.

Acts mentions "the breaking of bread" as a distinctive Christian activity. Jude makes the only clear use of the term agape with reference to a meal in the NT (v. 12).

With the loss of the Jewish chaburoth background, communal meals in the predominantly Gentile churches took on the less restrained characteristics of pagan banquets. Paul's admonitions in 1 Corinthians indicate that such abuses were already taking place, and that the table fellowship was marred by drunkenness and gluttony as well as the class distinctions which undermined the Lord's Supper as a sacrament of unity. Nevertheless, it is not likely that this kind of situation alone caused the separation of the Lord's Supper from the communal meal. An imperial ban on evening meetings of clubs and associations might have caused Christians to meet in the morning for the eucharist. Later, when evening meetings could be resumed the sacrament continued to be celebrated in the morning and a community meal was held in the evening. This might be indicated in the letter of the Roman governor Pliny the Younger to the Emperor Trajan (A.D. 111-12), although Pliny's scanty comments are subject to various interpretations. Nevertheless, Justin Martyr, in Apology I, 67 (ca. A.D. 150), reports a unified service of the word and eucharistic meal on Sunday mornings. This meal makes use only of the eucharistized bread and wine mixed with water.

The Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (ca. A.D. 215) makes a clear distinction between the eucharist and the agape meal, or love feast, although the unbaptized are excluded from both. The agape was celebrated in private homes with the clergy invited. The guests could eat their full, but leftovers were given by the host to other members of the church. It is possible that the agape was merged with the funeral meal, which was also an occasion for feeding the poor. The possibility of abuse, combined with a more formal approach to church life, led to conciliar decrees from the 4th century on discouraging these meals. The agape died out in the West first and lingered on in the East, but by the 8th century it was virtually defunct. One example of survival of the agape was among the Mar-Thomas Christians in southern India.

In the 16th century there were efforts among radical groups such as the Mennonites, Dunkers, and Moravian Brethren, to revive the NT agape, along with the kiss of peace and the washing of feet. It flourished in the 18th century in Germany and The Netherlands and was brought to North America by more zealous members of these groups. John Wesley encountered the agape among the Moravians in Georgia and at Herrnhut, and in 1738 brought it to Britain. It was celebrated as the climax of the Methodist band (later class) meetings. These agapes were held monthly at first, later quarterly, and finally annually. Methodists brought the agape to America, where it became a substitute for the Lord's Supper since it could be led by deacons in the absence of ordained elders. The ordination of additional preachers in the early 19th century did nothing to reverse this practice because the agape had become popular and the unchurched could be included in it. The love feast died throughout world Methodism in the latter 19th century as the Methodist societies became more conscious of themselves as a church.

There has been something of a revival of the agape meal in the 20th century in the form of parish fellowship meals. A more intentional revival has occurred in ecumenical circles as a way of providing table fellowship along Christians who cannot celebrate the eucharist together. It has been included as the last meal of courses at the Ecumenical Institute at the Château de Bossey, Switzerland, and as a way of expressing unity between Roman Catholics and Protestants in The Netherlands.

ALL SAINTS, FEAST OF

The Solemnity of All Saints, a celebration of the unity of the church across time, is celebrated on Nov. 1.

History

This feast, originally a celebration of all the nameless martyrs of the persecutions, arose first in the East, where it was celebrated on May 13, or on the Sunday after Pentecost (Antioch), or the Friday after Easter (East Syria), or in the fall (Armenia and among the Copts).

In Rome, the day was first celebrated under Boniface IV in 609 on May 13, when the Pantheon became a Christian church honoring Mary and all martyrs.

Under Gregory III (731-741), a chapel in honor of the Savior, Mary, the apostles, martyrs and confessors was opened in St. Peter's Basilica. It seems that the chapel may have been dedicated on Nov. 1. This date and feast spread throughout the West, at first particularly in England, and then the northern countries. The feast had a vigil from the beginning, and in the Middle Ages an octave was added. Both were abolished in the 1955 simplification of the rubrics.

Theology of the Celebration

The eucharistic liturgy for the feast is a celebration of sanctity and holiness in the church. This manifests itself in a variety of ways.

It is joy-filled (entrance antiphon, preface, prayer after communion). The people who live the lives of saints are happy, blessed, bearing the characteristics of the Beatitudes (gospel, Mt 5:1-2).

Holiness entails forgiveness and love (opening prayer, prayer over the gifts).

This holiness is rooted in the fact that each person is created by God and thus becomes a manifestation of God's love and saving plan. We are God's children, and will one day live in the light (alternative opening prayer, prayer after communion, second reading: 1 Jn 3:1-3).

To arrive at this life of holiness is a journey of pilgrimage. We are nourished by the eucharistic bread and sustained by those who have gone before us and even now accompany us on our journey (preface, prayer after communion [the pilgrimage motif does not get translated into English]).

The goal of this journey is the new and eternal Jerusalem. Jerusalem is the site of God's throne and where the hosts of God's court sing songs of endless praise. It is the place where all God's people are in communion with one another (preface, prayer after communion).

The liturgy of the hours presents three themes. The first is the idea, found also in the eucharist, of the fundamental unity of heaven and earth, of those in heaven and those yearning for heaven while still on earth. The basis of that unity is Jesus Christ, the Lamb that was slain (Office of Readings: Rev 5:1-4; Bernard of Clairvaux). The second is that the heavenly Jerusalem is our goal. It is the place where God's children are gathered in praise and rejoicing (Evening Prayer I: Heb 12:22-24; Daytime Prayer: Isa 65:18-19; Rev 21:10-11a; 22, 3b-4). The third is that the church, God's temple made up of his faithful ones, is a holy place, and building towards holiness: towards likeness to God in Jesus Christ (Morning Prayer Eph 1:17-18; Daytime Prayer: 1 Pet 1:15-16; Evening Prayer II 2 Cor 6:16b; 7:1).

The solemnity of All Saints is both a look back at those who have gone before, as well as a commitment to what we must become: a holy people united together by a common life in God. It is a hope of our future glory in the new and eternal Jerusalem.

ALL SOULS, FEAST OF

All Souls Day, the commemoration of the faithful departed, is celebrated on Nov. 2, and intimately connected with the Nov. 1 celebration of All Saints. It has the rank of a solemnity, but is not officially listed as such in the Roman Calendar. When it falls on Sunday, the Mass texts are from All Souls, and the texts for morning and evening prayer are taken from the Office for the Dead. The rest of the liturgy of the hours is taken from Sunday.

History

While the idea of remembering all the faithful departed seems to have arisen from the ordinary Christian customs surrounding death and burial, the first evidence for this celebration comes from Isidore of Seville (d. 636) whose monastic rule includes a liturgy for all the dead on the day after Pentecost. Various dates in various places were common till Odilo of Cluny in 998 prescribed a celebration on Nov. 2 for all Cluniac houses. The custom spread rapidly throughout northern Europe, but was only accepted in Rome in the 13th century.

The custom of celebrating three Masses began with the Dominicans of Valencia before 1500. The custom was extended to the whole of Spain, Portugal and Latin America in 1748 by Benedict XIV. The universal church was granted the privilege of three Masses on this day by Benedict XV in 1915, during the carnage of World War I.

Theology of the Celebration

The readings for the celebration of the eucharist can be chosen from among those for the Masses for the Dead (Lectionary nos. 789-793). For a fine commentary on each of these readings, see Fuller (cited below): "Since death holds us in bondage, we are in need of redemption, and this is what the gospel offers us in Jesus Christ. He, the new Adam, has broken through the gate of death and opened up the way to eternal life . . . Only in Christ, the second Adam, will all not merely survive but be 'made alive'" (p. 594).

The prayers offer a variety of themes for reflection and praise. The primary datum of faith, the basis for all Christian prayer and reflection about death, is that through the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, the hope is given to us that all who die in faith will share that life (virtually every prayer and preface in the set). The underlying basis for this understanding of Jesus and ourselves is God's creation of and ongoing care for his people (opening prayer III, solemn blessing, preface IV).

The prayers affirm the reality, power and sadness of death (prayer over the gifts and prayer after communion III, prefaces I, IV). That reality is a reminder that we are all in need of forgiveness and purification (prayer over the gifts and prayer after communion II, solemn blessing, prefaces III, IV). There is a conviction that death is not an end, but a moment of transition: "Lord, for your faithful people life is changed, not ended" (preface I). They entered this transition already at baptism (prayer over the gifts II, prayer after communion III).

The final goal is new life, eternal life, a life that is lived to God alone (most prayers). This life is characterized as a place of light and peace (prayer after communion I, prayer over the gifts II, prayer after communion III, solemn blessing), joy (opening prayer II, prayer after communion III, solemn blessing), glory in the presence of God (prayer over the gifts I, opening prayer II, prayer over the gifts II, opening prayer III).

For us who remain, these statements of faith are an expression of hope and a source of consolation (opening prayer I, solemn blessing).

The celebration of the liturgy of the hours is taken from the Office for the Dead. While not a common celebration in most parishes, its presence in the revised version of the Rite of Christian Funerals indicates that it may become more frequent. It too is a profound expression of the Christian hope in the resurrection.

The celebration of All Souls day is an opportunity to reflect on our own future and to celebrate those who have preceded us in death. It is a great profession of faith in the resurrection, not just as a reality for Jesus Christ, but as the promise of our own future glory.

ALTAR

As usually understood in Christian liturgy, the altar is a table whereon the church ritually re-enacts the Last Supper (a paschal meal which pre-figured the crucifixion) as well as the post-Resurrection meals of Jesus with his disciples (e.g., on the shore of the Sea of Galilee or on the way to Emmaus). According to Josef Jungmann in Pastoral Liturgy the altar was in its origins a place to set the bread and wine, a merely necessary piece of functional furniture. It has been, however, given many archetypal significances over the centuries. Early in Christianity the altar's predecessors were, for instance, both the four-cornered ("horned") stone in the Temple in Jerusalem and the altar of symbolic sacrifice in the Greco-Roman theater. The altars for incense, immolation, and sacrifice all had Levitical prescriptions which played a part, often times, in later design decisions.

In the latter centuries of early Christendom the relationship of the members of the universal church suffering, militant, and triumphant, was symbolized by the presence of pieces of relics of dead Christians. After Helena of Constantinople, small pieces of the "true cross" were also incorporated. Eventually, the relics were made more aesthetically palatable; they were imbedded into the altar itself, in more recent centuries, in a small square "altar stone," whose blessed presence would "consecrate" the altar. The altar's shape began to reflect its reliquary function by appearing more sepulchral.

There are two seemingly contrary concepts about the symbolic meaning of the altar. On the one hand, it is a table for the ritual meal—a re-enactment of the paschal meal shared by Jesus and his disciples in the upper room of Holy Thursday. On the other hand, it is a stone of sacrifice whereon the "unbloody sacrifice" of the eucharist re-enacts the "bloody sacrifice" of Calvary. During the periods of imperial accoutrements, (e.g., under Constantine, Charlemagne, Otto) the altar also served as a symbolic throne for the imperial deity. The Carolingian intellectuals developed a special "showing" place for the host and the altar became a base for the monsternce.

Since Vatican II the reclamation, almost exclusively, of the meal imagery of the eucharistic liturgy has resulted in what is tantamount to a universal preference for the table archetype in the altar. This is timely, of course. But it is vital to remember with historical retrospect that the aberrations of the past are often countered by aberrations of equal vigor in the present. Although there is no need for an altar to make liturgy on some enlightened plane of objective reality, the need for a church building itself arises from more subtle human needs. Gerardus van der Leeuw, in Sacred and Profane Beauty: the Holy in Art tellingly judges that God needs no house, but humankind needs God to need a house—like our own. The archetype of altar, like the church building itself as its wide backdrop, represents for us the Christ representing himself, making himself present among us, for us, with us, over and over again, whenever we are gathered in his name in this way. Mircea Eliade's Illud Tempus or Rudolph Otto's mysterium tremendum is here-and-now "present" after the fashion of Odo Casel.

It is because of all the different presences that he can have that we must not allow the altar to be reduced to the service of absolute dicta which are unfortunately bound up in one particular time. Christ eternal, Christ born and needy, Christ dead, buried, Christ suffering, Christ resurrected; the many faces of Christ must be allowed at the altar.

That having been said, we can look at the present understanding of what an altar is, what it represents, what its universal requirements are.

The altar is the focus of the sacramental presence of Christ. This piece of furniture is the place where the worshipping community calls for the promised presence of Christ, high-priest of the mystical body, who offers himself to the Father for the total community united for this ritual meal by the Holy Spirit alive in the Bride. So many things are going on at this table, all focused in the ritual gifts. The bread and wine representing the people-gathered are brought to the altar. God is praised for the very gifts-which-we-are at the very moment that the gifts representing us are placed on the altar. The prayers asking the grace of the Holy Spirit are said over those gifts and the narrative of consecration is told while the liturgical drama is fixed on a separate consecration, symbolizing, for those with eyes for it, in the separation of body and blood, the death of Christ, into which we all must step. Finally, the body and blood are raised to the Father, together, symbolizing further that the communion is in the rejoined species, the resurrected Christ is present within the mystical body. The gifts are then shared among the members.

Where is the altar for all of this oblation-immolation? It is merely the place-where. What does it represent? Naturally, it represents all of this drama of the eucharist. It is a very special place-where. The conflict about how to treat this holy object is easily polarized. At the height of the Middle Ages Bernard of Citeaux and the Abbot Suger of Abbey St. Denis couched the argument in terms of response to the immensity. Suger's approach to church furnishing was to realize that in our giftedness we must give the very best we have in thank-offering; his authority for such an opinion rests in the OT offering of the unblemished lamb, and the descriptions of the Davidic/Solomonic temple. Bernard, on the other hand, suggests, for us priestly people a response of complete austerity, simple beauty, no extravagance, no extra windows, no decoration. This is an ages-old conflict, found even in the "J" and "P" traditions, interwoven, woof and warp, into the tapestry of the Temple-building descriptions, contrary motivations blended to amicably describe the actualities of Hebrew history.

These conflicts are, of course, resolved in practice by the community. The fact is, however, that the altar has an important place in the church and its dignity must be accorded in such a way that it does not play second-fiddle to any other symbolic piece of furniture. The Vatican Council has emphasized, even more than did Trent, the significance of the single altar. [Before Trent, it will be remembered, there was an almost superstitious reverence for the altar which resulted in a multiplication of altars within the confines of one church building.] The single altar represents the place where Christ himself steps into time and space among us. It thus represents him, himself, and deserves utmost reverence even outside the liturgy.

For particular communities, the varieties of climate, wealth, pictorial sensitivity, national heritage, etc. all impinge on the kind of church that exists, breathes, lives. But the altar as the symbol of Christ's presence must be a focal point of worship. Should it be decorated, or stone, or moveable? These are appropriate questions for particular communities according to their particular needs.

However, should the altar seem anything less than the ambo or the presider's seat, or the tabernacle, or baptismal fountain? Here is the central variable: in what context must the central importance of this congregation's altar find itself? The answers found in various national bishops' conferences are essentially to accord the single altar in a church the esteem befitting God's presence in this place, at this time, according to material and placement and decoration appropriate to the specific worshipping community, in aesthetic relationship to the ambo, presidential seat, ecclesial accommodations, and the domus, house, itself.

AMEN

A Hebrew word meaning "so be it" which, when appended to prayers or proclamations (e.g., "the body of Christ") marks the giving over of the person or the assembly to the truth of what is prayed or proclaimed. It is not simply "agreement," nor even simply a statement of belief. It is a word of personal and communal commitment and surrender.

This Greek word is practically untranslatable in English. "Memorial," "commemoration," "remembrance" all suggest a recollection of the past, whereas anamnesis means making present an object or person from the past. Sometimes the term "reactualization" has been used to indicate the force of anamnesis.

In Semitic thought memorial is a "recalling to God" of a past person or promise. J. Jeremias suggests that the words of Jesus, "Do this in remembrance of me" (1 Cor 11:26), mean that his disciples should pray "... that God may remember me." The point of re-calling to God the sacrifice of Christ is that its benefits may be made present to the faithful here and now. In the eucharistic tradition the formal remembering before God of the sacrificial life and death of Christ is therefore connected with the offering of the bread and wine, through which the benefits of Christ's sacrifice will be received in holy communion.

A formal anamnesis came into the eucharistic prayer in connection with the institution narrative. In the Anaphora of Hippolytus the institution narrative is the climax of the thanksgiving for the wonders of God in salvation history. The words "Do this in remembrance of me" serve to introduce the anamnesis: "Remembering, therefore, his death and resurrection ..."; and the anamnesis, in turn, introduces the oblation. Eucharistic traditions which lack an institution text, such as the Didache, the Acts of Thomas, and the Mar Esaya text of the Anaphora of Addai and Mari, also lack a formal anamnesis. In the West Syrian anaphoras the anamnesis serves as a reprise of the thanksgiving in remembrance of God's saving work in Christ and introduces the supplicatory part of the prayer, including the oblation, epiclesis, and intercessions. Cesare Giraudo points to the transition in the Jewish todah tradition from remembrance to supplication by way of a succinct recall of what has been commemorated. He calls this a move from memores to memento, or from the faithfulness of the people in keeping the memorial that has been commanded by God to the prayer that God will remember his covenantal promises. While caution must be maintained in drawing comparisons between the Christian eucharistia and the Jewish berakoth, we may at least observe a similar pattern in this connection.

The Roman tradition places the institution narrative and anamnesis in the supplicatory section of the prayer (the post-Sanctus "Canon") rather than at the end of the thanksgiving in remembrance of Christ. In this tradition the institution text and anamnesis serve more as a warrant for the church's oblation than as a recapitulation of salvation history. It is noteworthy that the sacrificial aspect of the eucharist is more prominent in the Alexandrian and Roman traditions than in traditions which lack a formal anamnesis, such as the Didache and Addai and Mari. Because the words of institution acquired consecratory force in the Western church, associated with the transubstantiation of the elements, medieval theologians misunderstood the anamnesis-oblation to be an offering of the body and blood of Christ. While the text of the Roman Canon speaks only of the "holy and spotless" oblation in reference to the bread and wine, although they are called the "bread of life" and the "cup of salvation," Roman eucharistic prayer IV in the current Roman Sacramentary has, for the first time in the history of the eucharistic prayer, referred to the oblation as the body and blood of Christ. This can only exacerbate the controversy over the eucharistic sacrifice which has plagued Western Christianity since the 16th-century Reformation. A study of the ancient anamnesis formularies would show the polysemous nature of offering-language in the eucharistic prayers and bring to light images of redemption other than that of sacrifice.

ANAPHORA

From the Greek anaphero, "I offer up." This is the standard Greek name for the eucharistic prayer; hence the Anaphora of Addai and Mari, the Anaphora of St. James, the Anaphora of St. Basil, the Anaphora of St. John Chrysostom, the Anaphora of St. Mark, etc. The name anaphora suggests the connection between the eucharist and sacrifice.

Didache 14 compares the Christian eucharist to the OT prophecy of the pure offering of the Gentiles in the messianic age (Mal 1: 11, 14). This OT allusion associates the eucharist with the concept of sacrifice, but also provides the safeguard against possible misunderstanding. The eucharistic sacrifice is not just an outward ritual performance, but an interior disposition, which is why a purifying act of confession precedes the celebration of the eucharist. The "pure offering" concept of the eucharist is expressed in the invitatory verse, Sursum corda ("Lift up your hearts"); or alternately, "Lift up your mind" (Apostolic Constitutions, Book VIII) and "Lift up our minds and our hearts" (Anaphora of St. James).

The early Christian apologists were at pains to point out that they had no temples, no altars, no sacrifices. Minucius Felix wrote in the 2nd century, "How should I offer as sacrifice to God what he has given for my use, and return to him his own gifts? That would be ungrateful

A genuine sacrifice, on the contrary, is a good soul, a pure mind . . ." (Letter to Octavius 32). Where Christians employed the vocabulary of sacrifice it was applied to prayer and the grateful life. The martyred Apollonius declared before his judge at the end of the 2nd century, "A sacrifice bloodless and pure, I too and all the Christians bring to almighty God . . ." (Acta Apollonii 8). The Letter of Barnabas 2:6 also points out that material gifts are not offered to God because sacrifice is spiritual and pertains to prayer. The Christian sacrifice is the prayer of thanksgiving (eucharistia).

It was not until the end of the 2nd century that the material gifts of bread and wine were also "offered." Irenaeus of Lyons gave prominence to the material gift-offerings in reaction to the exaggerated spiritualism of the Hellenistic gnosis. It is at the beginning of the 3rd century that we have the earliest evidence of the offertory procession of the faithful. The gift-offerings or oblations became the focus of the eucharistic prayer in the Anaphora of St. Hippolytus (Apostolic Tradition). The offering of the bread and cup occurs in conjunction with the remembrance (anamnesis) of the redemptive sacrifice of Christ. "Remembering therefore his death and resurrection, we offer to you the bread and the cup, giving you thanks because you have held us worthy to stand before you and minister to you." In this earliest anaphoral text (ca. A.D. 215) the polysemous character of the eucharistic sacrifice is articulated: it is the self-offering of Christians, the material offerings of the church, and the memorial of the redemptive sacrifice of Christ.

ANGELS, FEASTS OF

Certain apocryphal books, and the literature of some heterodox sects, reveal an exaggerated fascination with angelology. Orthodox Christianity, on the other hand, has always sought to keep the subject in perspective (Col 2:18). The Nicene Creed affirms that angels ("all that is . . . unseen") were created by the one God, and are not themselves divine beings. The Roman Canon (Eucharistic Prayer I) affirms the belief that angels somehow assist our prayers and offerings to God (Rev 8:3-4), while the Prefaces, in introducing the Sanctus (Isa 6:3), explicitly join our earthly worship to the eternal praise rendered by the heavenly hosts: "May our voices blend with theirs as we join in their unending hymn . . ." This is because "In the earthly liturgy we take part in a foretaste of that heavenly liturgy which is celebrated in the Holy City of Jerusalem toward which we journey as pilgrims, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God" (S.C., 8). The early 6th-century writings of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, the first Christian author to present a fully-developed angelology, describe all of Christian liturgy and sacraments as an imitation of the eternal worship that the angels render to God. "We imitate as much as we can their abiding, unwavering, and sacred constancy, and we thereby come to look up to the blessed and ultimately divine ray of Jesus himself" (Ecclesiastical Hierarchy 1:1).

The Bible repeatedly shows God communicating with humans by means of angels—indeed the Greek word (ánggelos) and its Hebrew counterpart (mal'akh) both mean "messenger." Thus the angel with the most important role in salvation history is Gabriel, who brought the message of the Annunciation to the Virgin Mary (Lk 1:26-38). In the East his feast is traditionally observed on March 26, the day after the Feast of the Annunciation. A feast of Gabriel on March 24, the day before, was introduced into the Roman rite in 1921. In the same year an October 24 feast was established for Raphael, a miraculous healer in the deuterocanonical book Tobit, who is venerated as a promoter of health and a patron of medicine. The Coptic and Ethiopian churches have long celebrated Raphael's feast on 3 Nesy, the Egyptian equivalent of August 26.

In general, however, Christians have had the greatest devotion to Michael, captain of the heavenly armies, who protects the true Israel against the forces of evil (Dan 10:21, Jude 9, Rev 12:7). A good example is the prayer "St. Michael the Archangel, defend us in battle," which was normally recited after low Mass from 1884 to 1965. Some feasts of Michael commemorate miracles or apparitions, such as September 6 in the Byzantine rite (the Miracles at Colossae) and May 8 in the Roman rite (the Apparition at Monte Gargano). The great French abbey Mont-St. Michel marks the site of another apparition. Other feasts are the anniversaries of the days particular churches were dedicated to him, including the Roman feast on September 29 (the Dedication of the Basilica of St. Michael on the Salarian Way) and perhaps also the Byzantine feast on November 8. In the Coptic and Ethiopian churches the same day is 12 Hatur in the Egyptian calendar. Because the devotion to Michael is so intense, his feast is also commemorated on the twelfth day of every Egyptian month (Christmas and certain feasts of Mary and other saints are also commemorated monthly).

The feasts of Michael have tended to become occasions for honoring the angels more generally. Thus the Byzantine feast on November 8 now honors "The Archangels Michael and Gabriel and All the Heavenly Powers." The day after 12 Hatur (November 9) is celebrated by the Copts and Ethiopians as the Feast of the "Myriads of Angels." The Roman feast of the Guardian Angels (cf. Mt 18:10) was introduced in 1670 on October 2, the first free day after September 29. In the Anglican Book of Common Prayer, September 29 is traditionally the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. The new Roman Calendar of 1969 took this same approach by making this day the combined Feast of Sts. Michael, Raphael, and Gabriel, Archangels.

The Coptic and Ethiopian churches also have feast days for other heavenly spiritual beings, located close to Michael's feast. The Four Bodiless Creatures of the Apocalypse (Rev 4:6-8) are honored on 8 Hatur (November 4) and the 24 Elders (Rev 4:4, 9-11) on 24 Hatur (November 20). Because the Greek word for elder (presbyteros) is translated as "priest," the latter feast has come to focus on the mystery of the priesthood, by which earthly and heavenly worship are united.

ANNULMENT

A juridical process employed in the Latin Catholic church to establish the freedom to marry for those whose previous marriage is found to have lacked the proper conditions for validity. It is not required of those churches which recognize divorce outright, or, as in some Eastern churches, which see the dissolution of marriage as a penitential, rather than juridical, procedure.

ANOINTING

To anoint is to touch someone or some thing with a substance to bring about some effect, either within the person or thing or in the way others perceive that person or thing. While oil has been the substance frequently used in anointings, other materials such as water, blood, mud, fat, and saliva have also been used. Oil, which was used as soap, was employed most widely whether in athletic events, religious rites, or civil ceremonies.

The practice of anointing, whether in the context of ritual or not, is an ancient one. It did not originate with Judaism or Christianity. Anointing with oil, especially olive oil, can be traced back to certain customs in the Near East. Sometimes the anointing took place in the context of a ritual and sometimes not. When anointing had a liturgical context, it often was the way in which a culture dealt with such life crises as suffering, sickness, and death. Religious anointing in many of these older societies was one of the many ways in which they attempted to give meaning to situations of human fragmentation. Often the anointing was connected with something that seemed to be out of harmony with the universe, a liminal situation. Because ancient peoples had difficulty explaining the origins of sickness, they often created myths to explain what appeared to be unnatural or even evil. Since ritual is a combination of mythic content and external activity, a rite of anointing would easily be used to express a belief in an order which transcends the limitations of sickness and death.

It would be impossible to distinguish which of these ancient rituals were directed to physical healing and which were concerned with spiritual effects. Because these cultures took a more holistic view of the person, anointings were both occasions of providing meaning in situations of human brokenness, and a form of medicine to restore a person to physical health. Such anointings very easily possessed a sacramental character in that they were symbolic actions by means of which one reality existed in another. There was no clear dichotomy between material and spiritual dimensions of the rites. Although there has been considerable ambiguity regarding the proper effects of the anointings, it can be said that they at least inserted the persons anointed within the larger system of meaning in their particular communities. This more holistic perspective was as characteristic of ancient Israel as of its pagan neighbors. It is an approach which should not be considered naive. Today anointing is again seen as a way of engaging the whole person, a way of healing the body/mind split.

Anointing in the Bible has both a religious and a secular purpose. In a land characterized by dry weather it was only natural that anointing with oil would have a cosmetic and therapeutic intention. The secular use of oil is clear from Ezek 16:9 where it is the completion of the bathing process. Isa 61:3 speaks of the "oil of gladness instead of mourning," which indicates a more symbolic experience of anointing. 2 Sam 14:2 makes it clear that the absence of anointing is the sign of grief. There are many other instances of anointing in the Bible which operate in a religious context: anointing the heads of guests as a sign of respect (Mt 26:7), anointing the feet of visitors (Lk 7:46), anointing those freed from captivity (2 Chr 28:15), the wounded (Isa 1:6), and the dead as part of the preparation for burial (Mk 16:1).

There are many biblical examples of anointing in a religious context, especially in the Hebrew Scriptures. To anoint a person or an object was to bless that person or thing and set them apart for religious purposes. For instance, Moses anointed the ark, the altar, and lamp stand as well as Aaron and his sons. Exod 30:22-29 records the anointing of sacred furniture and vessels. For the most part only priests and kings were anointed in the Bible. Exod 28:40-42 describes the consecration of priests, although the anointing may have been usually restricted to the high priest. Prophets were also anointed, but this practice may have been connected with the anointing of kings (1 Kgs 19:16). Clearly, kings were anointed. It was an anointing done both by prophets and priests and it had the special meaning of designating the king as anointed of Yahweh (1 Sam 10:1; 16:13; 24:6). The anointing of the king is a good example of how often the civil and religious meanings of anointing blended together. The ceremony may have been civil, but the meaning was religious. Even the secular meaning of kingly anointing is being consecrated to God's service. Through anointing the king was removed from ordinary life and was made directly responsible to God.

While the NT is rich in the healing ministry of Christ and his followers and in the designation of Christ as the Anointed One, there is little about the practice of anointing with oil beyond those found in the Hebrew scriptures. Because healings took place in the name of Christ, often no specific symbolic action was involved, although there is evidence of human gesture connected with healing situations. Anointings are recorded in the NT as in Mt 26:7 which tells of Jesus being anointed in Bethany shortly before his death. Here anointing was a sign of honor. Anointings were also employed in conjunction with exorcisms such as indicated by Mk 6:13, "And they cast out many demons and anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them." And, of course, there is the celebrated text of Jas 5:13-16 which includes

"Is any among you sick? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

The title of Jesus is the Anointed One. He comes in the line of Hebrew prophets who were sometimes recognized as charismatic persons through anointing. This signaled that their mission was under the power of the Spirit of God. Christ inserts himself in that tradition when he quotes Isa 61:1, "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord has anointed me." The Christian church has interpreted Mk 1:9-11, which depicts the baptism of Jesus by John and the descending of the Spirit on Jesus, as the "Messianic anointing of Jesus" by the Holy Spirit. It was only logical that the therapeutic use of oil by the Jews and the theologizing of the early church on the baptism of Jesus would lead to anointing becoming part of the sacramental activity of the church, especially in the rites of initiation, ordination, and healing.

The biblical practice of anointing, which may have originated from an Egyptian and Canaanite context, continued on into post-biblical times. It was especially significant in the Middle Ages in connection with the enthronement ceremonies of kings, popes, and emperors. There seems to be little distinction on the general level between liturgical anointings and these civil anointings. The anointings located in the initiation rites, such as the anointing of catechumens and those to be confirmed, as well as the anointing of kings were perceived as removing the person from the profane dimension of life. The anointing of kings survived until modern times, into the 19th century when, for instance, Charles X of France was anointed in 1825. The religious mystique that these anointings added to the crowning of a king was a way of strengthening the prestige of any particular dynasty. The anointing would rarely be only political or spiritual, but usually was a combination. During the High Middle Ages the anointing of a king had a quasi-sacramental character, although eventually that understanding changed. The anointing of the king differed from that of bishop in that the king was anointed between the shoulders and not on the head. He was anointed without the use of chrism. It was in the best interest of civil authorities not to make their power dependent on the anointing as such, for that would have rendered their position subordinate to the church.

Popes were anointed also but not in order to be designated as pope. The anointing was connected with the ordination of the person as a bishop. And when in the 11th century the popes were chosen from the ranks of bishops, anointing ceased to be part of the papal enthronement.

The use of oil in Christian initiation is very old, dating from the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Its meaning and role has differed greatly. In some localities anointing was considered more preeminent than in others where it would have played a supporting role in bringing out the meaning of initiation as a whole. Because oil is such a polyvalent symbol, it has and can trigger the many associations that speak of the inner transformation of new life in Christ that initiation signals. Historically, two kinds of oil have been associated with the baptismal part of the initiation: the plain kind, which today is used before the water baptism, and the chrism, perfumed oil, which is used after the water ceremony. Each has its distinct meanings and clustering of images.

The oil used before baptism has had other names such as "oil of exorcism," but its name today is the ancient one of "oil of catechumens," since its origin is in the anointing of those who were preparing for baptism. Thus, this oil has been in close association with the prayer of exorcism both in the ancient rite and in the present Roman rite. It expresses the care of the church for the adults who have just renounced the devil and the forces of evil. The church prays that they will be strong in professing their faith and will persevere in the same. The prayer of blessing of the oil of the catechumens asks of God: "Grant them your wisdom to understand the gospel more deeply and your strength to accept the challenge of Christian life. Enable them to rejoice in the baptism and to partake of a new life in the church as true children of your family" (102). In infant baptism, the pre-baptismal anointing follows the exorcism prayer because it expresses the liberation of the child from the power of sin.

The method of anointing has changed through the centuries. In the early church period in some of the major liturgical centers the oil was poured over the naked candidates and then smeared over the entire body. St. Ambrose compares the candidates to wrestlers who grease themselves completely to make it more difficult for their opponent to get a hold on them. In 5th-century Rome the anointing was restricted to the ears, nostrils, and chest. These three bodily places were chosen for symbolic reasons: the ears so that the candidate could hear the gospel, the nostrils so that their service to God lasted as long as they drew in the breath of life, and the chest because it is the seat of the heart where Christ now dwells. In the Middle Ages a two-fold anointing took place, on the chest and on the back, both in the form of a cross. This form lasted until the most recent revisions, and now the presider anoints children on the breast only. In the U.S., this pre-baptismal anointing is optional and since the children are not really catechumens, it may be pastorally advisable to omit it. There are those, however, who maintain that it still can be significant if it is properly done. When a generous amount of oil is used and rubbed in, it can be recognized as the manifestation of the care of Christ for the infant. Just as an infant moves from the world of the womb to the outside world and so needs the loving touch of parents lest it feel abandoned, so the person in baptism needs loving care and support as it moves into a different world. Oil is a protective ointment and so can easily symbolize the church's protection for its progeny. The pre-baptismal anointing concludes and sums up the celebration of the word and now the church is prepared to celebrate the sacrament proper.

The ancient Roman rite has two anointings with chrism which completed the ritual of baptism. First, the newly baptized were anointed by the presbyter and then second by the bishop. It is difficult to say what the origin of this double anointing was. When the initiation rites broke apart, the second chrismatic anointing became identified as the separate sacrament of confirmation. There were other practices in the early church in which there was only one post-baptismal anointing and that one became identified with confirmation. Today, in the Roman rite the anointing by the presbyter is omitted if there is confirmation in the same ceremony. There was a third pattern in initiation in which there was no post-baptismal anointing.

This oil of chrismation is clearly distinct from the oil of catechumens. The latter is the oil of exorcism, the gesture of protection administered on the chest, the medicine of strengthening, while the former is the oil of gladness poured upon the head, the oil of thanksgiving, the perfumed oil. This oil of gladness is to be given lavishly. The anointing prayer in infant baptism in the Roman rite says that God has freed the child from sin, given it new birth by water and the Holy Spirit, welcomed it into the People of God and then continues: "He now anoints you with the chrism of salvation. As Christ was anointed Priest, Prophet, and King, so may you live always as members of his body, sharing everlasting life" (62). Through the power of the Holy Spirit and the sacramental action of anointing the child is now identified with Christ, the "one who has been anointed." It seems that this anointing in Christian initiation was suggested by the anointing Jesus received from God during his baptism in the Jordan where the Spirit descended upon him. What needs to be noted is that this anointing is an event of joy, recognizing the oneness in Christ with which the newly baptized now lives. Being anointed with this oil of thanksgiving means that this person is now a member of the chosen race, the royal priesthood, God's own people and is commissioned to bring light to the darkness, to proclaim the works of God in the assembly of the people, and to bear witness to the name of Christ in the world.

Both the American Book of Common Prayer and the Lutheran Book of Worship make provisions for a post-baptismal anointing. Both indicate that the person baptized is now sealed by the Holy Spirit and marked as Christ's own. The Episcopal blessing of chrism adds the notion of sharing in the priesthood of Christ.

Anointing in Confirmation

At its origin confirmation is the sacramental link between baptism and eucharist. There are theological differences about the meaning of confirmation today. However, it is best understood as part of the initiation process, a confirming of baptism. The use of chrismatic anointing is appropriate to this rite. In the Roman Catholic church the bishop is the ordinary minister of the sacrament, although presbyters can be delegated to confirm. As the minister traces the sign of the cross with chrism on the forehead of the person being confirmed he says: "N., be sealed with the Gift of the Holy Spirit."

In the American Episcopal church, baptism is considered full initiation by water and the Holy Spirit. There is only one anointing which is done immediately after water baptism. The rite of confirmation is administered by the imposition of hands. The latter is also the practice of the Lutheran Book of Worship.

For the first five hundred years plain oil was generally used, as was the case for the pre-baptismal anointing. According to Hippolytus (3rd. c.) the pre-baptismal oil was exorcised, while the oil of confirmation was blessed. Ritually, this makes sense because before baptism the prayer is to free the person from the forces and structures of evil while the prayer after baptism is in thanksgiving for the gifts of God, especially baptism itself. The anointing or sealing here has the basic NT meaning that the Spirit has now been fully given to the person to be anointed. It would seem that the use of oil as concluding the bathing process in the ancient world rendered this sealing open to this theological interpretation.

After the 6th century, perfumed oil was the common practice and chrism takes on further overtones of joy, embodiment, and sensuality. Some of the ancient prayers connect the smell of the oil to the sweet odor of Christ. Two themes emerge from these prayers: the bonding between the baptized and Christ, and the gift of the knowledge of Christ. The West interprets the bonding along more feudalistic lines of defending and strengthening, and the East sees the aroma of chrism as a metaphor for the presence of God. Those anointed with this aromatic presence will be able to sense the hidden life of God in prayer, liturgy, and all creation. This Eastern emphasis on confirmation as the sacrament of interior growth, with its sensitivity to the spiritual dimension of life and the authority which flows from contemplative prayer, is not in contradiction to the extroverted and active approach to confirmation in the West. But the Western theology of confirmation with its stress on public witness and institutional identification could profit from the tempering which would take place if there were a better wedding of the two theological perspectives.

As with all anointings, the oil needs to be applied generously. A stingy sign of the cross on the forehead does not express well that the person is marked with Christ, that the anointed one now lives out of the gift of the Spirit, that the confirmed belongs to a new covenant established in the death and resurrection of Christ. It is fitting that the anointing be done with the sign of the cross since so much of the imagery surrounding confirmation moves to the central metaphor that the person is "signed and sealed" by God in Christ. But this is no excuse for a meager use of oil. This chrismation is still done with the oil of thanksgiving, confirming Christians in their initiation into the community. Anointing in confirmation should not be so construed as to give the impression that there are two separate sacraments of initiation. Initiation is one process with two stages. Both baptism and confirmation initiate one into the single mystery of Christ and anointings in both sacraments sign one with the same sign of death and resurrection.

Anointing in Ordinations

The Christian rites of ordination did not have anointings from the beginning. The liturgical expression of this sacrament had developed for several centuries before anointings became part of the ritual. In the Franco-Germanic churches of the 7th and 8th centuries there is evidence of rites of anointing in the ordination liturgies. At the ordination of a bishop, besides the giving of the crozier and ring and the bishop's enthronement, there was an anointing of the head with chrism. Likewise, for the priest there was anointing of the hands in addition to the giving of the bread and wine and a second laying on of hands indicating the power to forgive sins. The first laying on of hands is already recorded by Hippolytus (c. 230). All these additional rites reflect the Germanic influence on the Roman liturgy. This northern spirit placed a great deal of emphasis on the handing over of the instruments of power, princely power in the case of the bishop, and cultic power in the case of the priest. By the 10th century there is a clear merging of these Germanic elements with the Roman rite.

The reformed Roman ordination of a bishop differs from the previous Franco-Germanic rite in the anointing in that the action takes place after the consecratory prayer and there is no anointing of the bishop's hands. In the old rite the anointing of the bishop's head took place in the midst of the prayer. Anointing of the head in the reformed rite is accompanied by a prayer which prays that as God has brought this person into a share of the priesthood of Christ, so may this person receive the "oil of mystical anointing" and be filled with spiritual blessings.

The Roman ordination of the presbyter manifests the same desire for simplification. The bishop anoints the palms of the hands of the newly ordained and prays that Jesus may preserve him to sanctify the Christian people and offer sacrifice to God. The anointing, as do the other elements in the ordination rites, represents an attempt to return to an early understanding of ministry. The bishop is seen as the shepherd and leader of the people. The presbyter is seen as one with Christ in building up the people of God as the body of Christ and temple of the Holy Spirit. The image of the presbyter is one who preaches the gospel and celebrates the worship of God. There is no anointing in the ordination rites of the Anglican and Protestant churches.

Anointing of the Sick

The anointing with oil is the central symbol of the sacrament of the anointing of the sick. It has the same basic meaning as the laying on of hands which is found in most of the sacraments. The imposition of hands is the most fundamental sacramental gesture and so anointing with oil is a form of laying on of hands. But there are other meanings of anointing with oil as it is used in this rite for the sick, elderly, and dying. To anoint is one way to acknowledge the blessings that God gives to God's people. Healing is a blessing of God which is especially asked for and for which thanksgiving is rendered in this rite. And the way that healing comes to those anointed is in the context of the Holy Spirit. Thus, there is the aspect of mission and commissioning since here the Holy Spirit is given for more than individual salvation. This Spirit-filled blessing of healing does not primarily refer to physical healing. It does refer to health, but in the sense of contributing to the building of the Kingdom of God in some way, whether it be through the witnessing of the person anointed, or the mutual contribution to community of the anointed and those doing the anointing.

The Christian community has consistently made use of anointing in regard to the ministerial sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and orders. The anointing with oil in the case of the sick and elderly is related to these other sacramental anointings in that anointing the sick and elderly is delegating them for ministry in the church. The sick and elderly as ill and old in the church may not belong to the permanent structures of the church in the same way they do as baptized, but they can and are called upon to fulfill a ministerial function. In baptism and confirmation the person was anointed with oil ritually so as to conform to Christ, the Anointed One. By entering more deeply into the paschal mystery through the suffering of sickness and the marginality of old age, this person now is further conformed to Christ, and so anointing in this sacrament recapitulates that of baptism and confirmation.

The oil used in the sacrament of the sick is specially blessed for this purpose by the bishop at the Chrism Mass on or near Holy Thursday. It is usually olive oil but other oil may be blessed, especially at situations such as communal anointings. In the reformed Roman Ritual the number of anointings has been reduced from five to two and the formula which accompanies the anointing has moved away from a penitential understanding which implied an association of sinfulness with the senses. The new formula has a fuller theology which stresses help for the person through the power of the Holy Spirit, and the healing power of God's grace extended to the person already freed from sin.

In the service for the Ministration to the Sick in the American Book of Common Prayer the central action is the laying on of hands. The anointing with oil is optional. The prayer accompanying the anointing asks for the forgiveness of sins, release from suffering, restoration to wholeness and strength, and deliverance from evil.

Anointing of Objects

In the liturgy of the dedication of a church there is an anointing of the altar and the walls. Anointing of these inanimate objects and the other rites such as incensation express in a visible way aspects of the invisible work which God accomplishes through the church. Anointing the altar with chrism signifies that the altar is a symbol of Christ, the Anointed One. Christ is the High Priest who on the altar of his body offers his life in sacrifice for the salvation of the world. In anointing the altar the bishop pours oil on the middle of the altar and on the four corners. He should anoint the entire altar. Anointing the walls of the building indicates that the purpose of the church building is that it be given over to Christian worship. Either twelve or four anointings are prescribed to show that the church is an image of the holy city of Jerusalem. As the altar representing Christ stands for the head, so the walls of the church represent the people, the body. The people are the church and the dedication of the church is the dedication of the People of God and so the anointing of the walls represents the anointing of the people. The dedication of the church is a concelebrated liturgy with bishop, clergy, and all the people taking part. The rite brings out how all clergy and laity share in the one priesthood of Christ.

The Blessing of Oils and Consecration of Chrism

The blessing of the oil of the sick and the oil of catechumens as well as the consecration of the oil of holy chrism (oil mixed with balsam) take place during the Chrism Mass prior to the beginning of the Easter Triduum. The blessing prayers give some understanding of the meaning of the various liturgical anointings in which these oils are used.

In the Roman rite the blessing of the oil of the sick takes place at the end of the eucharistic prayer immediately before the final doxology. The bishop's prayer addresses God, who brings healing to the sick through Jesus Christ. He asks that God send the Holy Spirit to serve our needs. He prays that all who are anointed with this oil may receive God's blessing, be freed from pain and illness, and be made well in body, mind, and soul.

The blessing of the oil of catechumens takes place after communion. The bishop, surrounded by the concelebrating priests, prays that those who are anointed with this oil may have wisdom and strength as they prepare for baptism. He asks that through anointing they may have a deeper understanding of the gospel, that they may meet the challenge of Christian living, and be led to the joy of new birth in the family of the church.

The consecration of the chrism is more elaborate. After praying that God will bless the oil so that those who are anointed with it will be inwardly transformed, the bishop sings a consecratory prayer in berakah (Jewish blessing prayer) style giving thanks for how the earth brings forth fruit-bearing trees from which comes the oil for this chrism. He recounts how the prophet David sang of the life and joy that oil brings and how after the flood the dove brought to Noah an olive branch as a sign of peace. He recalls that now the waters of baptism wash away our sins and the anointing with oil makes us radiant with joy. The prayer continues with the image of Aaron washed in water and anointed priest by Moses, all this foreshadowing Christ's baptism in the Jordan by John. This fulfilled the prophecy of David that Christ would be anointed with the oil of gladness beyond his fellow men and women. The bishop asks God to bless the oil with the power of the Spirit of Christ, the Anointed One, from whom the oil takes its name. He asks that it become a sign of life and salvation for those to be baptized, that they be washed of the evil inherited from Adam, that they become temples of glory, that they have royal, priestly, and prophetic honor, that they be clothed with incorruption, and that it be, indeed, the chrism of salvation.

ANOINTING, POST-BAPTISMAL

Found early in the development of Christian baptismal rites, an anointing with chrism (oil to which a fragrance, most often balsam, has been added) follows the water bath of baptism. Though originally lavish, it eventually became a simple anointing in the form of a cross on the forehead of the person baptized. Both christological and pneumatological in its import, it signifies the bestowal of the Holy Spirit and the sealing, a contractual branding, of the baptized person with the cross of Christ.

Biblical precedents for anointing harken back to the OT. There we find its root symbolic meaning in the anointing of kings and priests and the associated empowerment by the Holy Spirit. In Lev 8:12 we find Moses anointing Aaron to consecrate him as priest. In 1 Sam 10:1 Saul is anointed to be prince over God's people, Israel. In 1 Sam 16:12, 13, Samuel anoints David: "... and the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon David from that day forward" (v. 13).

Anointing with chrism at baptism takes its primary meaning from Jesus' anointing as our great High Priest (the Christ, the Anointed One) and consequently, of our anointing into Christ and into his priesthood in which all believers share. The words surrounding this anointing, all derived from the Greek chriein, to anoint, point to connection with Christ: Christ, chrism, Christian, chrismation, chrisom.

Anointing with chrism proclaims Christ; it also symbolizes the gift of the Holy Spirit. Paul links together anointing, sealing, and the giving of the Holy Spirit: "But it is God who has established us with you in Christ, and has anointed us (kai chrísas hemás); he has put his seal upon us and given us his Spirit in our hearts as a guarantee (2 Cor 1:21, 22). While it is not possible to determine decisively whether or not oil was actually used in the NT as here, where anointing is mentioned in connection with the Holy Spirit, clear evidence of early post-baptismal anointings comes to us from the 3rd century in the works of Hippolytus and Tertullian. In the 4th century Cyril of Jerusalem called chrism "the gift of Christ; and by the presence of his God-head, it causes in us the Holy Ghost" (Mitchell, p. 44). Ancient expressions from the Church Fathers further illuminate this act of anointing, "chrism of salvation"; "chrism of incorruption"; "shield of righteousness"; "tunic of immortality." Recognizing the value of this tangible sign to convey a spiritual reality, Ephraem in the 4th century states: "Christ and chrism are conjoined, the secret with the visible is mingled: the chrism anoints visibly—Christ seals secretly" (Mitchell, p. 34).

The Orthodox church, and some other Eastern churches, held to the pattern found in early baptismal liturgies where baptism, anointing and signation (chrismation), and eucharist formed a unified whole. In the West this anointing became at first separated from baptism's water bath, and eventually, when a post-baptismal anointing did return to the baptismal liturgy, became two anointings. Anointing with chrism as a sealing in the Holy Spirit occurred separately as the sacrament of confirmation. The anointing within the baptismal liturgy retained only its Christic significance.

Today in Roman Catholicism when adults are baptized, confirmation again immediately follows baptism, to be followed in turn by the eucharist, thus restoring the original unity of initiation into the church. In such instances, the so-called "post-baptismal" anointing is omitted. However, when children are baptized, confirmation continues to be delayed and the anointing with chrism in the baptismal service declares baptism's gifts of forgiveness, new life in Christ, and membership in Christ's body.

The Reformers discarded altogether

this anointing with chrism. However, as the study of early baptismal liturgies has sharpened, the most recent liturgies of some Protestant denominations (e.g., Presbyterian and Lutheran), now make a provision for this anointing and signing with chrism within the sacrament of holy baptism. The words used remain (with small alterations) remarkably consistent through the ages, noting the sealing of the Holy Spirit and the grafting into Christ forever. Once again the words of sealing and incorporation into Christ are clothed in tangible form, that flesh and blood people might better sense God's invisible acts of baptism. This cross of chrism glistening briefly on the forehead of the newly baptized visibly proclaims our eternal identity. Together we are the Spirit-anointed ones of the Anointed One!

APOSTLES, FEASTS OF

The apostles are particularly honored by the church because of their intimate relationship to Jesus Christ the Lord. They were called by him and were his first witnesses. The celebrations in the Roman calendar are: Solemnity of Ss. Peter and Paul (June 29); the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul (Jan 25); the Chair of St. Peter (Feb 22); Ss. Philip and James (May 3; formerly May 1, the date of the dedication of the basilica of the apostles in Rome in 570, and moved to May 11 in 1955 when the feast of St. Joseph the Worker was introduced); St. Matthias (May 14; transferred from Feb 24 to remove it from Lent and put it closer to Ascension); St. Thomas (July 3; transferred from Dec 21 to remove it from Advent); St. James (July 25); St. Bartholomew (Aug 24); St. Matthew, apostle and evangelist (Sept 21); Ss. Simon and Jude (Oct 28); St. Andrew (Nov 30); St. John, apostle and evangelist (Dec 27); and the obligatory memorial of St. Barnabas (June 11). There is also the optional memorial of the dedication of the basilicas of Ss. Peter and Paul (Nov 18).

History

Celebrations of the apostles are found in the earliest Western sources. The Chronographus of 354, which contains information dating from 336, includes a Feast of St. Peter on Feb 22. The Veronese (Leonine) Sacramentary (ca. 550; actually a collection of prayers from various sources rather than a sacramentary) contains 29 sets of Mass formularies for the Feast of Ss. Peter and Paul on June 29. It was a three-liturgy day: one each at the basilicas of St. Peter and St. Paul, and at the catacomb of St. Sebastian where their relics were temporarily housed at the time of the Valerian persecution (258). The Veronese also contains texts for feasts of St. Andrew (Nov 30; four sets); and St. John (Dec 27) placed after the Holy Innocents).

A feast of all the apostles was celebrated within the octave of Ss. Peter and Paul by the time of the Old Gelasian Sacramentary (ca. 650).

Feasts of individual apostles gradually entered the Roman calendar, taken from other churches or celebrating the translation of relics to Rome from time to time. The Old Gelasian adds a feast of Ss. Philip and James (May 1). The double commemoration (since 1558) of the Chair of St. Peter at Rome (Jan 18) and at Antioch (Feb 22) was combined in 1960. The feast of the Conversion of St. Paul seems to have been the octave day of the Gallican (Jan 18) celebration of Peter. Several other celebrations were eliminated in 1960: St. John at the Latin Gate (May 6); the Commemoration of St. Paul (June 30; probably the transfer of one of the Masses of the previous day); St. Peter in Chains (Aug 1).

Theology of the Celebrations

In the texts for the celebration of the eucharist, the scripture readings are generally chosen because they contain reference to the apostles who are being honored that day.

The prayers reveal many of the apostles' characteristics and give us the church's understanding of who the apostles are and what they do. They are first and foremost witnesses and preachers of the word, a living gospel (Simon and Jude, Andrew, John, preface of apostles II), the ones who believe in Jesus as Lord (Thomas). They call us to be witnesses as well (Matthias, John, Barnabas). Because of their fidelity to the gospel (Chair of Peter, Peter and Paul), they are the foundation and guardians of the church (Conversion of Paul, Dedication of the basilicas, preface of apostles I) and the signs of unity and peace (Chair of Peter, Bartholomew). Their sufferings transform them into even more apt witnesses of Christ (Philip and James, James). They are our intercessors in heaven (Peter and Paul).

The celebration of the liturgy of the hours holds up two items for our prayer and reflection. 1) The apostles had an intimate bond with the Lord Jesus. The antiphons especially delight to use the words of the Lord from John 15: you are my friends, love one another. This closeness to the Lord is also ours through the apostles, as we hear St. Paul: imitate me as I imitate Christ (Office of Readings, 1 Cor 4, 1-16). 2) The apostles build up the church into the body of Christ by their preaching, the witness of sharing goods in common, their suffering and their intercession.

The celebrations of the apostles throughout the course of the year are a continual reminder of our link to the original message and community of Christ Jesus the Lord.

ARCHITECTURE, LITURGICAL

A worthy architecture for the celebration of liturgy must be in continuing dialogue with 1. the self-understanding of Christians; 2. history of the tradition; 3. new orientations; 4. needs of contemporary liturgy; and 5. a theology of visibility.

1. The Self-Understanding of Christians

Biblical architectural vocabulary functions 1) to designate actual buildings; and 2) metaphorically. The portable tabernacle or "tent of meeting" used by nomads during the exodus served as a worship center. Here God abided. Of the Israelite shrines, the temple built by Solomon in Jerusalem as "House for the name of Yahweh" was greatest (2 Chr 24; JBC 76:39ff). As places where God dwells, these structures are relativized in the NT; "tent" serves as figure of the mortal body (1 Cor 5:1); the human person is God's "temple" (1 Cor 3:16) or "shrine" (2 Cor 6:16); and Jesus declares that worship in the Jerusalem temple is superseded (Jn 4:21). No temple building is needed in heaven, since the city is completely permeated by the glory of God and the Lamb (Rev 21:22).

The term "church" is derived from the OT Hebrew qāhāl, translated in the LXX as ekklesia = assembly of the Israelites a) wandering in the desert; b) at liturgical gatherings (JBC 79:149-156). Paul applies the metaphor of the building process ("edification") on numerous occasions to the community of those who believe in Christ and to what supports their growth. They form the eschatological temple, with Jesus Christ as its foundation. Paul compares himself to a "skilled master builder" (1 Cor 3:10) whom God has commissioned for the building project. Eph 2:19-22 describes the faith-community as part of a building of which apostles and prophets are the foundations and Christ is the main cornerstone. In the Spirit, God lives in this house under construction. The sense of the term church is personal and dynamic.

In Paul "church" refers to the local community (Rom 16:1, 4, 5, 16, 23) or to the "church of God" in Judea linked to the Israelite "congregation" of old. The phrase "the church in the house of..." 1 Cor 11:18, 16:19; Rom 16:5; Phil 2; Col 4:15) refers to such local assemblies gathered in a tenement apartment of an eastern city of the Roman empire, its largest room, that for dining, on the top floor (Acts 20:7-9); or to the town and village house with rooms arranged around a central courtyard. The community, "breaking bread from house to house" (Acts 2:46), would be hosted by a wealthier householder.

2. History of the Tradition

(a) House of the Church

The gradual acquisition of properties by Christian communities specifically for their corporate use led to the transferred meaning "house-church" or "house of the church": a community center or meeting house. The oldest of these is the renovated (A.D. 231) community house at Dura-Europos, Syria, with assembly hall, adjacent room (for the catechumens?) and separate baptistery. The Syrian Didascalia apostolorum (ca. 250) describes the disposition of a congregation: presbyters in the eastern end of the assembly room around the bishop's seat; laymen in the remainder of the eastern section; then the women; boys and girls seated apart. A mosaic (Paris, Louvre) depicts a middle-eastern church-house of the 4th century. Since persecutions were sporadic, properties were acquired during the age of the martyrs. But these belong to the genus of domestic architecture. A handful of depictions in the catacombs suggests as well the domestic character of liturgical furnishings. The 3rd-century Roman convert Minucius Felix declared, "We have neither temple nor altars." At best, new construction consisted of a barnlike hall. Churches or tituli in Rome which rose over or were renovated from pre-Constantinian buildings and named from their original owner may have replaced earlier house-churches; proof is lacking.

(b) The Basilica - "Audience Hall of the King"

With Constantine's triumph over Maxentius at the battle of the Milvian Bridge (312), Christianity had a patron and its bishops access to imperial architects and building stores. The great Roman Christian basilicas were adaptations of a design secular at base: clerestoried nave flanked by lower aisles and terminated by an apse, with or without transverse wings flanking a chancel area little distinguished from the nave. Here was a structurally simple building type which was not linked to pagan rites and was suitable for rich interior decor of marble, fresco and mosaic. Most important, with its longitudinal emphasis it could accommodate large crowds and splendid processions in a manner appropriate for a faith newly under imperial patronage. Their size discouraged preaching. St. John Lateran (begun 312/313) with its baptistery, was the seat of the bishop of Rome; outside the walls rose the covered cemeteries of St. Sebastian, St. Lawrence and St. Peter (319/22-329), the last focused on the 2nd-century memorial of the apostle.

In Jerusalem the five-aisled martyrium at Golgotha (ca. 335) rose to the east of the cube-shaped Mount of Calvary and tomb, situated in an open courtyard. Egeria's pilgrim diary (ca. 385) allows the imaginative reader to reconstruct the shape of the Jerusalem liturgy in its classical period. By the time of Egeria's visit, a huge rotunda rose over the tomb as architectural symbol of Christ's resurrection. (This meaning, together with the baptismal connotation of dying to self, governed the scale, design and location of the Pisa baptistery (1153ff) outside the west facade of that central Italian cathedral.) Bethlehem, too, had its Constantinian basilica. None of these basilicas seems to have had a fixed altar.

Eusebius, expounding on the beauty of the church at Tyre (Hist. eccl., X. 4), indicates something of the hierarchical ranking of clergy which was assimilated into the church from the empire: "After completing the great building, he furnished it with thrones high up, to accord with the dignity of the prelates, and also with benches arranged conveniently throughout. . . . He placed in the middle the Holy of Holies—the altar—excluding the general public from this part too by surrounding it with wooden trellis-work." The imperial origin of these basilicas is seen in the fact that their facades faced east, as with Greek and Roman temple architecture.

In imperial Milan Ambrose copied Constantine's Church of the Holy Apostles, Constantinople, in his Basilica Apostolorum (382); here is the first indication in the West that the Latin cross-shaped plan was intended to bear an explicit symbolism. Ambrose observed, "The temple is in the form of the cross . . . a triumphal image (which) marks the place with the sacred victory of Christ." When the bones of the martyrs Gervase and Protase were translated to S. Ambrogio in 387, Ambrose explained the appropriateness of placing them under the altar (Rev 6:9), where Christ is the victim. By reserving a grave for himself as celebrating priest next to them, Ambrose underlined the developing notion of the altar area as a place of sacred cult connected especially to priesthood.

North African church design corresponded better to the old Roman ecclesial sensibility: the altar should be accessible since the gathered people are offering subject of the liturgy. "If you are the body of Christ," Augustine taught, "your mystery is laid on the table, your mystery you receive." In North Africa the altar was placed in the middle of the nave; the apsidal area was utilized for the liturgy of the Word.

The period 380-480 saw the building of many parish churches in Rome (e.g., the exquisite Sta. Sabina on the Aventine hill). The city formed the unique subject of the liturgy when the whole church met here for solemn stational service on Ash Wednesday. Much smaller than the Constantinian foundations, these basilicas with eastern apse, nave flanked by two aisles, without transept but with a solea (area enclosed by barriers projecting into the nave in front of the sanctuary) were eminently suited to the Roman liturgy. The solea harbored procession, cantors and choir. The people's gifts of bread and wine were collected, probably at the head of the aisles reserved for men and women, after the liturgy of the Word; here also the people approached for communion. A mural in the lower church of S. Clemente (11th century) shows the Roman practice of Mass facing the people.

From the time of Gregory the Great (590-604) dates the reconstruction of the west end of Old St. Peter's. The floor was raised to form a platform; a semicircular passageway beneath it allowed access to the memorial of Peter from the rear. A stone altar and ciborium (canopy) were placed directly over the confessio for the relic. The bishop's cathedra (throne) was on the major axis facing altar and people.

Without disturbing Mass, pilgrims could venerate the shrine. This gave architectural expression to the West's emphasis on the sacrificial nature of the eucharist and its commemoration of the cross and also to the growing cult of relics. The linkage of these two levels of veneration had a profound impact on medieval church design.

Pilgrims flooded Rome, and took home with them the bones of martyrs (and other Christians as well) interred in the catacombs. Carolingian monasteries met the challenge: they adapted the stational liturgy of Rome to a single church by multiplying altars and monk-priests. Cf. the ideal plan of the monastery of St. Gall, where cubicles containing altars took over the nave space. The rule ran: a relic needs an altar, an altar demands a Mass, only one Mass per day can be celebrated at an altar. In the enormous Romanesque church at Cluny the radiating choir chapels of the developed Cluniac plan ordered a monastic layout which provided space for lay pilgrims as well. After the Carolingians, in architecture as in liturgy, Rome was destined to receive more than it would give.

(c) Architecture of the Eastern Churches

In the Middle East, Nestorian churches in northern Syria were designed with a U-shaped bema (here designating the platform for reading and preaching) large enough to seat clergy in the midst of the nave. Remains of the altar have been found in some instances at the top of high steps against the east end. The eucharist was celebrated facing east, back to the congregation, by the priest chosen for that day. The plan, bema, doors and disposition of worshippers (women behind the bema at the west) was conservative, paralleling synagogue design.

The Byzantine Divine Liturgy took shape in the basilica, often with galleries, endemic to the late Roman-Christian empire. Under the influence of shrines at the biblical Holy Places, preeminent among them the Anastasis Rotunda at the Holy Sepulchre, the centralized church crowned by one or several domes and semi-domes became the normative design. For the liturgy celebrated at the Holy Places commemorated the person or event not only once annually, but every Sunday. Martyrs also merited the centralized mausoleum type. Another category of church: the palace-church, drew on imperial architectural precedent. Hagia Sophia in Constantinople (532-537) is the most breathtaking. Here the emperor in the company of the patriarch worshipped that Ruler whom he represented under the great golden dome of heaven, suspended giddily overhead. Light flowing in from the windows immediately under the dome gives the impression that the latter is suspended from heaven. Of this Church of the Holy Wisdom Procopius exclaimed, "Radiance is generated within."

Ritual flourished in such an ambience. Entrance was gained, nearly simultaneously by the processing clergy and people, through nine doors in the western portal. An ambo protected by a solea extended outward on the main axis into the nave from the chancel or bema, where the altar was situated behind an open column-screen. The Riha Paten (Washington, D.C.; Dumbarton Oaks) depicts such an altar and screen, at which Christ presides to communicate the apostles with his body and blood. The sense of Christ's active presence secures the resurrection motif which dominates Byzantine liturgy. Behind the altar in the apse rose staged seating for the clergy, with the patriarchal throne at the top. No wonder that Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople (8th century) commented, "The bema is the stepped place and throne where Christ the ruler of all presides with his apostles . . . and it also shows the second parousia, when he will come, sitting in the seat of majesty to judge the world."

After such exertions, the architects of the middle Byzantine period had energy to construct only relatively small buildings, cubical in form topped by domes (Daphni, outside Athens; Phocis, Hosios Loukas, 1020). Lavish interior mosaics depicted Christ and his life, Mary and the saints; through the image the worshipper encountered its prototype. Episodes from the paschal mystery, however, are not often met under the central dome; the Divine Liturgy itself was the chief image of the saving death, descent into Hades and Resurrection. The iconostasis or solid screen bearing icons and separating chancel from nave appeared late (Russia, 16th century). Otherwise the unrevised Divine Liturgy has not called for new architectural solutions.

(d) Romanesque and Gothic in the West

Monastic architecture, some of it rural, proved to be the seedbed for the urban Gothic cathedral. The abbey church at Cluny (10th-12th cents.), an "epitome of medieval mathematical and musical theory," was built to accommodate the opus Dei carried on untiringly within its walls. It spawned smaller versions of its basilican plan with transepts (transverse arms) along the pilgrim routes of France. The pointed barrel vault of Cluny's third church was perfectly suited to plainsong. Its high altar was a stone table. Chapels radiating from the choir fittingly housed the abbey's relics. Its Benedictine monks, with room in the choir for orderly grouping according to rank, imagined themselves in "the walk of the angels." Suger's abbey church of Saint-Denis (1137-44, 13th cent.) capitalized on the light-refracting glories of gold and gems while it inaugurated seemingly weightless masonry, an innovative vaulting system, and new programs in stained glass. Suger's excuse was that such material loveliness as accompaniment to rich liturgy transports the worshipper from the inferior to the higher immaterial world.

The abbey church of Fontenay (1139-47) still stands with much of the original monastery at the head of a secluded valley, as witness to the ascetic Cistercian formula. Its architectural rigor underlines visually Bernard of Clairvaux's condemnation of Cluniac architecture: the immense height of these Benedictine churches, their immoderate length, excessive width, sumptuous decoration and finely executed pictures diverted "the attention of those who are praying and impede devotion." With square east end, pointed barrel vault and masonry walls built by lay brothers, Fontenay was a reduced version without towers of that which he lamented. It lacked color and sculpture but was acoustically remarkable.

Both Suger's Saint-Denis and early Cistercian were needed for the dialectic which produced the classical Gothic of Chartres Cathedral (1194-1220). Chartres' basilican plan with transept was completely unified in both plan and elevation; it could support visually western towers of unequal height and differing design. Elaborate sculptural programs on the exterior related the building, microcosm of the Christian cosmos, to the urban lay world. The cathedral's solid walls were turned outwards at right angles to form buttresses and allow for the insertion of walls of stained glass. The interior was transubstantiated into a mystical world: harmony of proportion and intensification of light provided a similitude of the heavenly Jerusalem, whose earthly counterpart even then the crusaders were fighting to regain. The Gothic cathedral was at once a distinctly corporate symbol of an age of faith and a building for worship in which personal devotion and "the gaze which saves" substituted for active liturgical participation; the clergy "offered" on behalf of the people.

(e) Renaissance/Reformation; Counter-Reformation, Baroque

The early Renaissance humanist

Alberti (De re aedificatoria, Bk. VII) had a passion for the centralized geometric plan, for the classical world, and for church reform. The Reformers were of their time; their principles for church architecture were based both on the NT and on theory of the period. They called for "temples" where God's "Word is heard and scrupulously observed"; believers were themselves temples of the Holy Spirit. There must be preaching (Calvin), and not separation of ministers from people. Simplicity was in order: the only things necessary were bell, pulpit, baptismal basin, and tables for the Lord's Supper (Church of Scotland, 1560). Lutherans preferred to group together the simple furnishings required for the liturgy.

Although Luther took exception to this course of action, the Reformation ushered in a period of iconoclasm not unlike that which convulsed the Byzantine Empire in the 8th and 9th centuries. Contrarily, the Counter-Reformation made the most of the arts as propaganda for the faith. Preaching was possible even in such a large single-naved building as the Gesù (1568ff).

The Reformation was precipitated in part by the building program for the new St. Peter's (15th-17th centuries). Requiring the destruction of the Constantinian basilica, Renaissance architects were unable to bring the revolutionary architectural project, in plan a Greek cross, to completion. Self-imposed demands for perfection and completeness were incompatible with the scope of their dreams. Baroque architects, however, were able to shape space so as to create a symbol of a church whose self-image was universality. No human scale was built into either facade or interior of this grandiloquent statement in stone. Liturgy must therefore be drama and spectacle. Bernini, who designed the altar with ciborium and cathedra and the monumental piazza, spoke of the latter's encircling colonnade as the arms of Christ embracing humankind. Baroque architecture becomes ecclesiological assertion.

The Catholic Baroque paradigm of the theatre and specifically the opera had a reduced Protestant manifestation. "Concert stage" designs of the 1860s and after put the choir on display behind the pulpit on a high platform, militating against the people's direct participation in worship.

Whether Catholic or Protestant, 17th-century churches were frequently centralized in plan. Style collaborated with theory and function. After the London fire of 1666 Sir Christopher Wren built over fifty churches: one-roomed buildings of a size and design so "that all who are present can both hear and see." Wren's steeples were memorable, and much copied. The Minutes of the Methodist Conference (1770) read, "Build all preaching-houses, if the ground will admit, in the octagon form. It is the best for the voice, and on many accounts more commodious than any other." Galleries allowed excellent visibility as well as audibility. Congregational meeting houses (a New World innovation) favored first a square, then a rectangular plan of domestic origin, with the entrance on the long side and a high, perhaps three-decker pulpit opposite. The small altar-table was placed at the pulpit base. Eighteenth-century Georgian churches with classical details were longitudinal in plan with galleries above the side aisles and across the back, and a raised platform at the front for the preacher.

Modern Anglicans inherited numerous Gothic cathedrals and churches which continue to shape their worship. The "two-room" plan: divided chancel containing facing choir stalls, with altar at its head and choir screen intervening in front of the nave, the high pulpit located at one side of the entrance, has been a strong influence on some Protestant church design.

(f) The Romantic Revivals

The 19-century Victorian revivals affected church as well as domestic building. A vernacular Greek Revival with Gothic details marked much of rural North America; among others, Baptist "preaching sheds" still punctuate that landscape. In larger churches of most denominations Gothic had a mighty impact. The Oxford Movement, devoted to liturgy, was echoed by the Cambridge Movement with its archeologism in church building.

(g) The Modern Period

"Form follows function," axiom of modern architecture, gave visual expression to liturgical movement goals. New building materials assisted a return to centralized designs preferred in the 16th and 17th centuries. Reinforced concrete (Auguste Perret in Notre Dame, Le Rainey, 1925) opened up the single-naved longitudinal hall to new unity and enabled the greater liturgical participation enjoined for Roman Catholics by Pius X. (Concrete would be given plastic shape by Le Corbusier in Notre Dame, Ronchamp, 1955.) Rudolf Schwarz's theories emphasized symbol and simplicity, leading to designs related to the 18th century meeting-house: nave wider than deep for the organic body of the assembly gathered about Christ its head. The 1930s in Europe saw new ideas and materials applied also in Reformed churches. Honest use of natural materials: stone, brick, wood and clear glass, recalled the pre-Constantinian house-church. Liturgical centers, relieved of clutter and "symbols," regained their symbolic value.

3. New Orientations

Vatican II's liturgical directives made possible collaboration and "reception" of liturgical, architectural and artistic values among a broad spectrum of churches. The Constitution on the Liturgy called for "noble simplicity" in the revised rites. Buildings and renovations were to facilitate active participation (S.C., 124). The primacy of the assembly together with the president's role in animating gifts and ministries was recognized. S.C. gave prominence to the word and preaching: its communication model demanded that sight-lines and acoustics be addressed. As eucharist regained its meal-character alongside the theme of sacrifice, mobility and accessibility to the altar-table became values. Assisted by artists, liturgy was to be adapted to times and cultures. Planning was to be carried out by competent local persons.

Other values reclaimed in the post-conciliar period include the communicative power of the non-verbal and non-figurative and the human social character of sacrament. The enunciation of the liturgical principles above coincided with new directions in the arts: form following function; simplicity in design and authenticity of materials; recognition of color and abstract form as analogy for spiritual experience.

4. Needs of Contemporary Liturgy

The variety of liturgical functions, initial and replacement costs, and population mobility call for multi-purpose buildings with accessibility for the differently abled and flexibility of interior arrangement. A communal discernment process undertaken by clients and architect, and collaboration between building committees, pastoral team, artists and liturgical consultant, is the model which, when used, is producing a new generation of buildings. The following points need to be kept in view:

The place of worship is a meeting place for the local church (function). It has a gathering place or foyer, which functions much like the courtyard of the early Christian basilica. Through immersion in abundant, living water the community grows (initiation). The font or pool may be located near the entrance to the assembly hall and allow for descent and ascent by an adult baptizand. Because the assembly actualizes in that place the great church and represents persons called together to form God's people from many places and times, it has referents beyond itself. The building should remind the gathered people of where they have come from: their origins and history (tradition). There they enter into dialogue with God through the Incarnate Word, in whom they have an acceptable response (word). Utilizing the goodness and inherent beauty of created things expresses relation to all God's creation (sacrament). The gathering nourishes for humanity's destiny: sitting down together at God's table in the kingdom (eucharist; eschatology). To this end the assembly witnesses, serves, celebrates. The past which roots it, the future which it enjoys proleptically, is celebrated now, in a structure which not only allows communication but leads to the experience of communion both with other human beings and with the triune God (communion ecclesiology). Needs of individual persons must also be met: of reconciliation and healing, of devotion, care (of children, the aged), education, vocation, death.

The various aims of this architecture range over the practical (including responsible stewardship) to the symbolic and aesthetic orders. Building, interior design and furnishings collaborate to manifest certain "absolute" or ultimate qualities: beauty, which calls the beholder to self-transcendence; centrality of the assembly, which challenges its clients to new and purer ways of being, seeing, and acting as a body; simplicity or poverty before God which rejects consumerism, the merely decorative, and comfortable pieties, and is therefore open to receive God's gifts.

5. A Theology of Visibility

Liturgy can be defined as the shape of God's grace in the form of the expression of the faith of the church, of which Christ in the Spirit is living source (E.J. Kilmartin). The building which houses the church under one roof is sacrament of that faith-community: sign and credo of the community's corporate faith, concrete hope and common commitment. It provides a home where persons embody their faith in common worship and other endeavors of the Christian life. It uses created things in its sign-acts. Thus a certain visibility is attained for the ultimate values which engage the assembly's prayer.

Architecture for this ecclesial understanding seeks to express God's transcendence-in-immanence. Since the Spirit is present and active in daily life, it does not separate sacred and secular but acknowledges that the sacred achieves visibility when life is lived faithfully. In other words, life has the potential for transfiguration. The house of the church is a kind of sacrament of God's offer of self-communication. Therefore it is hospitable rather than overbearing. Its beauty lies in simplicity rather than decoration. Because the assembly is active subject of liturgy and is a primary mode of Christ's presence, and because the church is built up by actions of the faithful, clarity or transparency governs the design of its assembly hall. It looks incomplete without people and their leaders, for liturgical centers, not works of art, serve as foci. Its spaciousness is analogue of God's mercy. Ancillary areas express the presence in mystery of the Holy One.

Its acoustic design is concerned with audibility of spoken word as well as song. Flexible seating allows proximity to chair, ambo and sacramental actions. Modular platforms can be given varying configurations without demarcating space beyond the functional. Given the global village with its ethical demands for sharing of goods, inclusiveness and justice, the church's house is "ordinary" architecture treated with extraordinary reverence. It does not ape ecclesiastical or "sacred" style.

The building can be called the domus Dei (house of God) because it is domus ecclesiae, meeting-house of the church. It houses a holy people who encounter Christ, priest of their worship, through the symbolic words and actions which they undertake together, and who, with renewed commitment to God's action, go out to meet the ethical demands of daily life.

MARY M. SCHAEFER

ART, LITURGICAL

To look at the long tradition in the West of the use of imagery for worship is to discover that at its best, the purpose of liturgical art has always been disclosure and revelation. Early Christian catacomb art of the 2nd and 3rd centuries was anamnetic; that is, its function was to remind the viewers of God's faithfulness to a chosen people through many generations. The attention was on images that would jog the memory, such as the three youths in the fiery furnace, or Noah in the ark, or Moses striking the rock.

The idea was to reveal the ongoing fidelity of God, to remind early Christians of who God is. To reveal something about who God is, is a quite different enterprise from describing what God looks like! There are very few images of Christ at all, and, of the few images that do appear, no two are the same. That there was no real concern about what a portrait of God might have looked like is revealed by the diversity of facial types. Twentieth-century viewers, conditioned by a later Byzantine image of a rather gaunt, elongated, dark-haired Semitic Christ, or worse, by a 19th-century sentimental portrait, might not even recognize them as representations of Christ at all. Those diverse images of the early centuries tell us something about Christ, that he is the attentive shepherd looking after his flock, and that his domain is both of this world and of heaven. Subsequent representations show Christ as teacher, a role among the apostles which in turn is intended as model for the bishop, as teacher among his priests. With the advent of the Emperor Constantine the parallel image of Christ as King appears. Only in the 4th century and later do we find Christ clad in the imperial gold garments of heavenly majesty.

In the first few centuries of Christian experience artists had as their focus the revelation of truths about how God acts among a beloved people. What Christ personally might have looked like had no relevance at all. This was not art of description, but of disclosure. Artists looked to their experience and the experience of their ancestors for the definition of what God was like. Their imagery was rooted in human experience and memory.

Within Eastern Christian worship there is another ancient tradition of sacred imagery, that of painted icons. Leonid Ouspensky writes that "the icon is not merely the expression of an autonomous sphere of human creative activity that the church happens to use in an accessory way. Rather, the icon belongs to the esse or essential being of the church; it is a vital part of that general order of human activity within the church that serves to express Christian revelation." [Leonid Ouspensky, "Icon and Art," in Christian Spirituality, ed. by Bernard McGinn et al (New York, 1987), p. 282.]

Icons have such an extraordinary role because their very existence lies in the christological controversies of early centuries. Icons of Christ and the Virgin witness to the dogma of the incarnation in affirming that God became fully human and that human beings will become divine. That is the economy of God's salvation. The human images (as opposed to symbolic images such as the lamb for Christ) represent a new view of the world: the Christian stance that matter is a vehicle of salvation. In the 7th century John of Damascus wrote: "I do not worship matter. I worship the Creator of matter who became matter for my sake, who willed to take his abode in matter, and who through matter wrought my salvation" (Ouspensky, p. 384). An important aspect of the content of icons is that they affirm the reality of the revelation of God in human circumstances.

The form in which that reality finds expression surprises us, for it is not the realism of classical antiquity. In these Christian icons, the depiction of realistic space, naturalistic descriptions of human bodies, the three-dimensional modelling of forms all disappear in favor of a rather flat, quite abstract design of non-naturalistic elongated proportions. The images are far more than illustrations. They invite the viewer to transcend the material image and to venerate the prototype, to honor the person to whom the image refers, and to enter into the reality of what is represented, a reality far greater and more complex than could ever be illustrated in a descriptive or merely narrative way. The image provides access to the larger and greater truth. The image becomes a way to communicate with God.

The early Christian expectation that imagery be rooted in human experience and memory, and the Eastern Christian presumption that icons lead the viewer beyond the image to the reality to which it refers, a reality of a graced humanity and a creation revelatory of redemption, represent principles equally appropriate for contemporary liturgical art. The goal is not to "decorate" churches, but to respond to human spirits which cry out to be lifted up, consoled, joyously encountered by the divine, the holy.

Imagery for public worship, whether permanent such as statues, other sculptures, paintings, mosaics, stained glass, or temporary objects such as seasonal hangings, plants and flowers, thematic arrangements or gestures of hospitality, requires authenticity and artistic merit to insure that it be worthy of the dignity of the activity of which it is a part. The American Bishops' document Environment and Art in Catholic Worship reminds us that the liturgy demands of all the arts quality and appropriateness. This means that every object should reflect honesty of materials, beauty, and care in the craftsmanship. The work of art 1) "must be capable of bearing the weight of mystery, awe, reverence, and wonder which the liturgical action expresses"; and 2) "it must clearly serve (and not interrupt) ritual action which has its own structure, rhythm and movement" (E.A.C.W., 19-20). The plea is made in the document for a transparency, "so that we see and experience both the work of art and something beyond it" (E.A.C.W., 21). The "transparency" spoken of here certainly resonates with our understanding of icons, leading the viewer from the apparent image to a larger and deeper meaning which finds its beginning point in the here and now.

What are the expectations of a work of art for worship? Guiding questions might inquire whether an image is evocative and provocative: Does it disclose intimations of ultimate concerns and holiness by virtue of being rooted in human and therefore accessible experience? Criteria for art for worship include: 1) that the work of art demand participation by resonating with human experience; 2) that works of art shape the imagination and lead to encounter with ultimate meaning; and 3) that works of art serve as occasions for revelation rather than as definitions of revelation.

How do such criteria help in making choices about particular works of art for worship? Among the many forms of art for worship, there is implied a priority of images utilized in the worship of the whole assembly. The primary honor of place belongs to those items which affect the communal worship, not the personal devotion of individuals. The importance and symbolic meaning of the works of art should be apparent in their forms. The focal points are the font, table, pulpit, and presider's chair. Nothing should challenge these priorities. Thus statues or other images of the saints, stations of the cross, or other images of popular devotion should not demand attention in the main worship space.

In the midst of the assembly, the altar stands as the primary object around which the assembly gathers. Its meaning encompasses Christ who is altar, priest, and victim. It encompasses both sacrifice and banquet. Clearly no ordinary table can disclose the richness and profundity of all these realities. The altar must be a piece of furniture of such beauty that it stirs reverence, of such dignity that it honors the holiness of what occurs there, of such stature that it is worthy of the mystery celebrated there, of such eloquent simplicity that it invites the placement of ordinary bread and wine as the appropriate offering of a people whose very lives are surrendered with those gifts in the eucharistic prayer.

The baptismal font requires special consideration so that it might bear the weight of the mystery of going down into the waters of death with Christ in order to rise from those waters into new life with Christ and new life in the community of believers. This means that the water, the major symbol of baptism, must be abundant and living and should be permanently located within the assembly for all the water rites and blessings that nurture the assembly's ritual life together. The font should be large enough to accommodate the baptism of adults as well as the immersion of infants, and accomplish this in a way that inspires awe and wonder at the life-giving properties of that water. The font should be a major image within the assembly, linked in scale and unity of form, as well as visual axis, with the altar so that the journey from font to altar becomes image of the Christian journey. The font is a place for memorable rituals marking births and deaths and blessings and spiritual journeys. The vessel for the water essential for Christian life deserves significance, permanence, dignity, beauty.

The ambo embodies far more than a lectern or podium. It is a table of the word, a reading table. The proclamation of the word of God is the activity it supports. The ambo itself should not overwhelm the lector in its scale or its grandiosity. It is not a podium for academic discourse and thus should not look like a classroom lecture stand. On the ambo rests the lectionary, exemplifying Christ present in his word, as the lector proclaims the sacred text. The ambo honors the proclamation of the word. It is not a shrine. Its form and appearance should reflect its role and evoke reverence

The presider represents Christ present in the assembly in the person of the ordained minister who calls the assembly to prayer and leads the worship. The presider's chair symbolizes the ordering of the assembly and anchors the place from which the designated leader conducts the ritual activity. The chair is not an immobile throne signifying rank and authority in the assembly, but rather the dignity and leadership focus of the present celebration. Care must be taken that the image the presider's chair projects is one that implies an appropriate role for the leader of prayer, for the presider's literal relationship to the gathered assembly visually expresses the ecclesiology prevailing in the community.

Today the assembly is understood in a new way, as a powerful symbol of the presence of Christ, along with the word, the eucharist, and the presider. The holiness of the assembly is honored when surrounded with plants and flowers, special lighting, or color (not signboards exhorting to action or acclamation, but color in hangings and shapes that speak to the season, the mood, the event). When the assembly, rather than just furniture pieces such as the altar and ambo, or the wall behind the altar, is embraced by color and image, so then is the total activity of the assembly, all its holy actions, enveloped in honor.

The choice and placement of any object in the worship space depends upon answering the primary question of what the item has to do with worship. The function of the work of art in question needs to be fairly clear. For example, to include stained glass in a new church building simply because stained glass is beautiful, because it is "churchy," and because it is low risk—everybody likes stained glass—can subvert the whole purpose of gathering the people of God at the Lord's banquet table.

A stained glass wall behind the altar, or even flanking the altar often constitutes a visual distraction and can even obliterate visibility of the altar area. Lest stained glass demand attention for itself within the assembly, its role should have some focus. The transformation of light quality in the baptistry, eucharistic reservation chapel, reconciliation room, clere-story, or foyer/gathering area allows the art form to be affective. The glory of stained glass' transparency and translucency lies in its capacity to interpret and express complex ideas and feelings in ways that vary according to the exterior light quality, weather, and seasons of the year, thus changing how one experiences that space. The mere illustration of figures of saints or emblems limits the artist as well as the material. Stained glass is a medium of transformation and of disclosure. When used with discretion it is a prime means for serving ritual.

In the recent past religious images for devotional purposes in places of worship tended to be limited to pious representations of saints and scriptural subject matter. One should keep in mind that powerful visual evocations of the contemporary human search for God need not be limited to those traditionally thought of as "religious." Those aspects of human life that provide poignant, not to mention dramatic revelations of the presence of God, offer possibilities for imagery that discloses and reveals life as God-touched. Gestures of compassion and tenderness, such as a parent for a child, remind us of God's compassion and mercy in our own day and place. An image of bone-weary age reminds us of the need to rest in the Lord. An abstract evocation of pure joy and exuberance at the entry might just recall the Lord's delight in the people he has formed and nurtured and convened.

To think of images as the occasion for but not the definition of revelation opens up possibilities for art to transform our perceptions in order to recreate and renew us. To think of images in this way also challenges us to carefully consider the expressive content of subject matter that deals with theological and scriptural content. A major barrier is a historicism concerning salvation history, a historicism which denotes a particular moment in the past without the openness and ambiguity in which revelation and mystery unfold. For example, what do those large wall-mounted representations of the resurrected Christ really say? Do they bear the weight of the paschal mystery as image for the Christian community? Would not the cross represent the fuller sign of a life lived in Christ Jesus, a life which is anticipating by virtue of the cross, but which has not yet experienced the resurrection of the last day?

The ubiquitous statues of saints, each standing quietly with his or her identifying attribute, invite reconsideration. Could the representations of those significant personages who have gone before us in the faith effectively provide encounter with the cantankerousness of those with the gift of prophetic vision, the anguish experienced by a mother like Monica over the chaotic and undisciplined life of her son, the subdued resignation of those oppressed by the church's own injustice, or the Lord's mercy in a gentle touch, a gesture of forgiveness? Such images would transcend the limits of historical narrative, breaking open the realization that in all times and places believers share in both the suffering and the triumph of Christ.

Liturgical vesture deserves artistic consideration as well. Ministerial vesture designates the presider and other ministers, but also serves to express the movement and gesture of ritual. Thought should be given to the shape of the presidential gestures so that fabrics can move expressively, and so that designs and color patterns respond to the expressive needs. Such reflection might guide designers away from symmetrical arrangements of symbols that "decorate" vestments to stronger visual emphasis in pattern and color for legibility throughout the assembly of movement such as arms lifted high in the invitation to prayer. In this way vesture serves the ritual activity.

The vessels used for eucharist, the containers for the oils, braziers for incense, and any other items used for worship require attentiveness to their function, their purpose, their meaning. Raising such questions calls for designs enabling those objects to support and enhance the ritual activity of which they are a part. Then they will not draw attention to themselves as objects, but function as sources of disclosure when they are used.

Liturgical art serves the life of the assembly when it supports and enhances ritual, when it discloses God's faithful presence in the times and places and lives of ordinary people, when it invites people to celebrate the beauty and honesty and integrity of creation, when it bears the weight of the mystery of faith and redemption.

MARCHITA B. MAUCK

ASCENSION THURSDAY

Celebrated during the sixth week of Easter, this feast brings specific focus to the exaltation of Jesus in his risen life. It also marks a shift in post-Easter mystagogy to the missionary dimension of Christian discipleship: "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to all creation" (Mk 16:15; Mt 28:18-20).

See Easter season

ASH WEDNESDAY

The first part of the Easter season i.e.,

Lent, begins with a solemn call to repentance (Joel 2:12-18). This period of 40 days is traditionally both a time of final preparation for those to be initiated at the Easter vigil, and a time of repentance for those to be reconciled during the Easter triduum. The custom of imposing ashes, a symbol of ancient penitential practice, is a symbolic act signifying human mortality ("Remember that you are dust and into dust you shall return") and total human dependence on the graciousness and mercy of God. It is a fitting act to begin the prayer and purification that is proper to Lent.

ASSEMBLY

The term "assembly" translates the Septuagint ekklesia, itself the Greek rendering of the Hebrew qahal which signifies the divine call that summons to a gathering as well as those who respond and come together in a community event. The qahal is the event of assembly (Deuteronomy 5). The emphasis is clearly upon the divine initiative of the call as constitutive of the assembly and the source of unity in its gathering. The OT qahal is an assembly of those who are gathered together by the Lord for life in the presence of the Lord.

The NT choice of ekklesia to name the assembly which is the church was influenced not only by its OT background but also by secular Greek usage which applied the term to political city states in Greece. Synagoge (Hebrew edah), on the other hand, was the term applied to Jewish religious assemblies. Thus the Christian community attempted to distinguish itself more precisely from the Jewish qahal while at the same time reaping the benefits of the word's heritage in its Greek translation. The term ekklesia is used first in reference to the local community of Jerusalem, considered to be the mother church (Acts 8:1). The sense of the word quickly developed to signify not only the members of local communities at Jerusalem or Antioch or "throughout Judea, Galilee and Samaria" (Acts 9:31), but also the universal church (Acts 15), that is, all the faithful who are believers in Jesus Christ. The Synoptics use ekklesia twice (Mt 16:18; 18:18) in reference to the community of disciples formed by Jesus. Paul, who is first to employ the term in the NT, makes use of ekklesia 65 times, mostly applying it to local churches which are regarded as equals in view of his use of the plural form of the word. In Colossians Christ is head of his body which is the church and Ephesians proclaims church as the fullness (pleroma) and body of Christ. Because church is the body of Christ, all belong together in a shared life of profound union and cooperation (1 Colossians 12; Romans 12) which is given symbolic expression by the one eucharistic bread (1 Col 10:17). John says that Jesus is the vine and the disciples in shared life with him are the branches (John 15) meant for the same kind of unity enjoyed by Jesus and his Father (John 17). John himself does not use the term ekklesia in the gospel passages, though it is found several times in 3 John. Thus a central NT understanding of church is that it is an assembly, called by God through Christ, for which the word ekklesia is used. Assembly is church.

In a liturgical context, assembly is the technical word in general usage to describe the gathered liturgical community. This represents the church's understanding of the liturgical event as the preeminent place in which the basic reality of the church is manifestly actualized. The Second Vatican Council's Sacrosanctum Concilium put clear emphasis on this point: "The liturgy is thus the outstanding means by which the faithful can express in their lives, and manifest to others, the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true church" (S.C., 2). Because the church is a mystical communion of shared life with the risen Christ and each other in Christ, the classical liturgical focus on celebration of the paschal mystery as the very source of the community's life is the basis of S.C.'s teaching that "Christ is always present in his church, especially in her liturgical celebrations" (S.C., 7), for "it was from the side of Christ as he slept upon the cross that there issued forth the sublime sacrament of the whole church" (S.C., 5). Thus, while Vatican II affirms in Lumen Gentium that "the church, in Christ, is in the nature of sacrament" (L.G., 1) and is "the universal sacrament of salvation" (L.G., 48), S.C. further affirms that the sacramental church is most completely expressed in the liturgical assembly. Similarly Pope John Paul II teaches in his Apostolic Letter on the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the liturgy Constitution (December 4, 1988) that "the council saw in the liturgy an epiphany of the church: it is the church at prayer" (9). S.C. had proclaimed that "the principal manifestation of the church consists in the full, active participation of all God's holy people in the same liturgical celebrations, especially in the same eucharist, in one prayer, at one altar, at which the bishop presides, surrounded by his college of priests and by his ministers" (S.C., 41).

In a related sense, the traditional axiom lex orandi, lex credendi ("law of prayer, law of belief") expresses the connection between the entire range of the church's life of faith and the liturgical celebration by the assembly in whose prayer that ecclesial faith is resident. Linking faith, church, and liturgical assembly, the bishops of the United States conclude: "Among the symbols with which liturgy deals, none is more important than this assembly of believers" (Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, 28). The liturgical assembly is a community of faith and its gathering in the event of prayer is the self-realization of the faith of the church.

The christological character of the assembly is assured by the presence of Christ in the gathered community, a point taught clearly by Pius XII's encyclicals Mystici Corporis (1943) and Mediator Dei (1947) which may be regarded as modern statements that prepare the way for the clarity of S.C.: "Christ, indeed, always associates the church with himself in this great work in which God is perfectly glorified and people are sanctified" (S.C., 7). Twentieth-century magisterial witness to the church's tradition affirms Christ's active presence in the assembly and his specific role of presiding at the community's prayer. This venerable tradition, rooted in Mt 18:20, "where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them," has enjoyed immemorial respect in the church's life and piety and has flourished with renewed vigor in this century when so much attention has been given to ecclesiological and christological questions. So S.C.: "The liturgy, then, is rightly seen as an exercise of the priestly office of Jesus Christ. It involves the presentation of people's sanctification under the guise of signs perceptible by the senses and its accomplishment in ways appropriate to each of these signs. In its full public worship is performed by the Mystical Body of Jesus Christ, that is, by the Head and his members" (S.C., 7).

The ecclesiological character of the liturgical assembly which manifests "the real nature of the true church" (S.C., 2) is rooted in the mystical union of Christians with Christ. So S.C.: "From this it follows that every liturgical celebration, because it is an action of Christ the Priest and of his body, which is the church, is a sacred action surpassing all others. No other action of the church can equal its efficacy by the same title and to the same degree" (S.C., 7).

Liturgical assembly, the community gathering of Head and members of the mystical body of Christ, accomplishes the action of liturgy by the "full, conscious, and active participation in liturgical celebrations which is demanded by the very nature of liturgy, and to which the Christian people, 'a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a redeemed people' (1 Pet 2:9, 4-5) have a right and obligation by reason of their baptism" (S.C., 14). Liturgical action, in fact, is defined as what the members of the assembly do in their graced mystical unity with Christ and each other in the celebration of the paschal mystery. By their mutual presence to each other, the grace of Christ's real presence is sacramentalized and delivered by and in the community members in a variety of specific liturgical events each of which is shaped in a particular symbolic expression ranging from eucharist and the other sacraments to the liturgy of the hours and the sacramentals. "Thus, for well-disposed members of the faithful the liturgy of the sacraments and sacramentals sanctifies almost every event of their lives with the divine grace which flows from the paschal mystery of the passion, death and resurrection of Christ. From this source all sacraments and sacramentals draw their power" (S.C., 61). Members of the assembly employ in their liturgical symbol-making elements of human experience, like meal-sharing and washing with water, as well as materials of God's creation in the world, to manifest the invisible presence of the Christ who is present and powerfully at work in his church in the actions, gestures, words, and very presence of the members of the assembly. Indeed, "There is scarcely any proper use of material things which cannot thus be directed toward the sanctification of people and the praise of God" (S.C., 61). When human actions and material things are gathered into and become what the assembly does and shapes in the celebration of liturgy, the event is the visible manifestation of the invisible reality of divine grace and so is the very reality of church as the sacrament of Christ risen. The saving and transformative grace of divine initiative has the priority in constituting the ecclesial assembly and the liturgy which it celebrates "in the unity of the Holy Spirit." While all Christian life and activity is accomplished by the gift of the Holy Spirit, "Nevertheless the liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the church is directed; it is also the fount from which all her power flows" (S.C., 10). Without underestimating the importance and richness of each individual's personal freedom and journey of faith but, on the contrary, depending on the gift of faith of all the believers who gather in assembly for liturgy, the assembly nonetheless transcends in the communal and ecclesial dimensions all individual faith. So S.C.: "Liturgical services are not private functions but are celebrations of the church.... Therefore, liturgical services pertain to the whole body of the church" (S.C., 26).

An immediate implication of the ecclesial nature of the assembly's liturgy is "that rites which are meant to be celebrated in common, with the faithful present and actively participating, should as far as possible be celebrated in that way rather than by an individual and quasi-privately" (S.C., 27). The fullest rationale for this principle may be found in the very nature of the assembly itself whose self-realization in its liturgy calls for the active participation of its members by their graced mutual presence and action. To the extent that the members of the assembly respond to and cooperate with divine grace and thus empowered fulfill their roles in the community event of shared prayer, the church's liturgy is accomplished as the paschal mystery is celebrated.

Just as there is a diversity of gifts, roles, and ministries in the church's life at large, a similar diversity of gifts and roles finds its expression in a rich and wide range of liturgical ministries that serve the assembly at prayer. The assembly's liturgies "touch individual members of the church in different ways, depending on their orders, their role in the liturgical services, and their actual participation in them" (S.C., 26). The most fundamental liturgical ministry belongs to the assembly itself in its communal wholeness as it participates in the dual function of rendering praise and thanksgiving to the Lord and offering the gift of sanctification to the people of God. The bishops of the United States write: "The most powerful experience of the sacred is found in the celebration and the persons celebrating, that is, it is found in the action of the assembly: the living words, the living gestures, the living sacrifice, the living meal.

This was at the heart of the earliest liturgies. Evidence of this is found in their architectural floor plans which were designed as general gathering spaces, spaces which allowed the whole assembly to be part of the action" (E.A.C.W., 29). This basic ministry of the assembly as such serves as point of departure for the diversification of services that are offered in the community for building up the body of Christ and thus giving glory to God. S.C.: "In liturgical celebrations each person, minister, or layperson who has an office to perform, should carry out all and only those parts which pertain to his office by the nature of the rite and the norms of the liturgy" (S.C., 28). The text continues: "Servers, readers, commentators, and members of the choir also exercise a genuine liturgical function. They ought, therefore, to discharge their offices with the sincere piety and decorum demanded by so exalted a ministry and rightly expected of them by God's people" (S.C., 29). The General Instruction of the Roman Missal develops the same point: "Everyone in the eucharistic assembly has the right and duty to take his own part according to the diversity of orders and functions. In exercising his function, everyone, whether minister or layperson, should do that and only that which belongs to him, so that in the liturgy the church may be seen in its variety of orders and ministries" (G.I.R.M., 58).

It is clear from the teaching of the Second Vatican Council and from the Missal of Paul VI (1969) in these texts that in the assembly the genuine diversity of ministries, clearly acknowledged as true ministries, is rooted in the rights and duties of the members themselves as they serve the assembly and that, furthermore, one person's ministry ought not be co-opted by another person. The leadership ministry in the assembly's prayer belongs to the priest "who, in the person of Christ, presides over the assembly . . ." (G.I.R.M., 60). The venerable phrase of the tradition, "in the person of Christ," used to describe the ministry of the priest, does not mean to suggest that the other members of the assembly do not live and act in Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit but refers to Christ's specific role of leadership which is sacramentalized by the priest's ministry.

In an even fuller sense, the life of the assembly may be intensified when the bishop presides at community prayer: "In the person of the bishop, with his priests around him, Jesus Christ, the Lord, who became High Priest for ever, is present among you. Through the ministry of the bishop, Christ himself continues to proclaim the gospel and to confer the mysteries of faith on those who believe" (Rite of Ordination, 18). The bishop's ministry of presiding sacramentalizes Christ's service of leadership and in this way assists in the building up of the body of Christ which is the assembly.

The years following the Second Vatican Council have witnessed the gradual identification of specific ministries in the impetus by the Apostolic Letter Ministeria Quaedam of Paul VI in 1972. Of particular significance has been the continuing discussion about who might exercise individual ministries in the assembly and especially what ministerial roles women might rightfully exercise. Historical studies which indicate the unnecessary narrowing of the assembly's ministries to sacramental orders as well as the widespread modern recognition of the unfortunate exclusion of women from secular and ecclesial roles has cast much light on the question of ministries in the assembly.

At the same time, theological reflection on the relationship of celibacy to ecclesial ministry has become a significant part of the discussion about the diversity of roles and ministries in the assembly. A half-century ago, candidates for church ministry were limited to the single choice of sacramental orders to which the spiritual discipline of celibacy was attached. Today the assembly welcomes a wide range of non-celibate ministries, even within the sacramental order of diaconate. It is not surprising that there are fewer candidates for celibate ordination in these circumstances in which more possibilities for ministry have been identified for which celibacy is not a condition.

The 1983 Code of Canon Law, recognizing this legitimate development of the assembly's ministries, states that, in addition to the work of sanctification expressed in the exercise of ordained liturgical ministries, "The other members of Christ's faithful have their own part in this sanctifying office, each in his or her own way actively sharing in liturgical celebrations, particularly in the eucharist. Parents have a special share in this office when they live their married lives in a christian spirit and provide for the christian education of their children" (can. 835, §4). The assembly rejoices in the richness of diversity in its ministerial

An especially important theme in contemporary ecclesiology as well as in pastoral life in the latter part of the 20th century has been the recognizing of the local church, especially as manifest in the liturgical assembly, as the incarnational realization in history of the very reality of church. Attention to this theme of the local church, called by L.G. 26 an "altar community" (26) in explicit reference to its liturgical assembling, is in fact a return to the vision of the earliest church which included both local and universal senses of ekklesia in its understanding of assembly. So L.G.: "This church of Christ is really present in all legitimately organized local groups of the faithful, which, in so far as they are united to their pastors, are also quite appropriately called churches in the NT. For these are in fact, in their own localities, the new people called by God, in the power of the Holy Spirit and as the result of full conviction (1 Thess 1:5). In them the faithful are gathered together through the preaching of the gospel of Christ, and the mystery of the Lord's Supper is celebrated 'so that, by means of the flesh and blood of the Lord the whole brotherhood of the body may be welded together.' In each altar community, under the sacred ministry of the bishop, a manifest symbol is to be seen of that charity and 'unity of the mystical body, without which there can be no salvation.' In these communities, though they may often be small and poor, or existing in the diaspora, Christ is present through whose power and influence the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic church is constituted" (L.G., 26).

In order to foster the life and appropriate development of the local assembly within the cultural ethos where it lives and finds its particular incarnational shape, S.C. states a fundamental principle: "Even in the liturgy the church does not wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters which do not involve the faith or the good of the whole community. Rather does she respect and foster the qualities and talents of the various races and nations" (S.C., 39). This principle, which offers a distinction between the substance or core of faith-life and the diversity of ways it may be expressed, serves as point of departure for the establishing of norms to be observed in the practice of the inculturation of the liturgy of the assembly (S.C., 38-40). The council's re-discovered respect for the pluralism which characterizes the life of the church, far from representing a novel breakthrough into uncharted territories, is rather a recovered loyalty to authentic tradition. So S.C.: "Provided that the substantial unity of the Roman rite is preserved, provision shall be made, when revising the liturgical books, for legitimate variations and adaptations to different groups, regions, and peoples, especially in mission countries" (S.C., 38).

It is expected that it would be entirely normal for the assembly's liturgy to find itself deeply affected and creatively energized by the cultural life of the members who gather for prayer, and that, on a regular basis. The necessary inculturation of liturgy, however, is a process which demands full attention to the varied aspects of the liturgy as well as the elements and parts which may be subject to development and change. S.C. listed the requirements: "In order that sound tradition be retained, and yet the way remain open to legitimate progress, a careful investigation— theological, historical, and pastoral—should always be made into each part of the liturgy which is to be revised. Furthermore the general laws governing the structure and meaning of the liturgy must be studied in conjunction with the experience derived from recent liturgical reforms and from the indults granted to various places. Finally, there must be no innovations unless the good of the church genuinely and certainly requires them, and care must be taken that any new forms adopted should in some way grow organically from forms already existing" (S.C., 23). Thus the assembly is responsible both for the preservation of the authentic tradition and for its legitimate development.

In addition to the regularly experienced need for the normal and organic development of the assembly's liturgy, S.C. envisions that the cultural impact could sometimes be even more intense and insistent: "In some places and circumstances, however, an even more radical adaptation of the liturgy is needed, and this entails greater difficulties" (S.C., 40). The difficulties to which S.C. alludes arise from the challenges presented both by a careful analysis of the cultural elements which are to be incorporated by the assembly into the liturgy as well as the necessarily painstaking study and evaluation of the liturgical elements themselves, especially as bathed in the light of the authentic tradition, as S.C. 23 has already noted. Success for the inculturation of the assembly's liturgy requires that the whole complexity of liturgical and cultural elements be addressed so that fidelity to the genuine tradition is maintained while at the same time the necessary and appropriate development of the tradition in cultural terms is assured.

This process of inculturation will be continued as long as local churches continue to develop their life in their cultural ethos in succeeding ages of history. As the inculturation process unfolds it must be guided by remembering that the Second Vatican Council's emphasis on the local assembly as the self-realization of the church suggests that there does not exist somewhere a cultural prototype which holds the primacy as model for all cultures and ages. It is precisely that mistake of implicitly suggesting the existence of a cultural prototype which the council, and particularly S.C. sought to correct and to avoid in the future by tradition and the pluralism of its diverse cultural expressions. In particular, a eurocentric predisposition to the arrangement of liturgical prayer in the assembly may be expected to decline to the extent that L.G.'s teaching (26) on "each altar community," described as "church" in the NT, is more fully realized.

The local assembly is the church of Christ. Yet, the tensions experienced by the ancient church as she began the attempt to live and express the gospel message in the language, elements, myth, and ritual of the Greco-Roman culture will always be repeated in new moments of history and in new ways as the diversity of human experience intersects with the power of the gospel message which is encountered in new situations and circumstances. The "Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults" states that each territorial conference of bishops has the responsibility "carefully and prudently to weigh what elements of a people's distinctive traditions and culture may suitably be admitted into divine worship" and "to retain distinctive elements of any existing local rituals, as long as they conform to the Constitution on the Liturgy and correspond to contemporary needs" and "to prepare translations of the texts that genuinely reflect the characteristics of various languages and cultures and to add, whenever helpful, music suitable for singing ..." (Introduction 30). The gospel becomes incarnate in the local assembly which is purified and transformed by the presence of the risen Christ in its members who embody in their cultural milieu this divine presence.

The preeminent example of assembly is found in the eucharistic community which is the fullest manifestation of church. As the "General Instruction of the Roman Missal" indicates, "The worshipping community is the people of God, won by Christ with his blood, called together by the Lord, and nourished by his word" (Introduction 5). The Roman ki i i c ion between authentic

Missal used in the eucharistic liturgy states clearly that "The celebration of Mass is the action of Christ and the people of God hierarchically assembled. For both the universal and the local church, and for each person, it is the center of the whole Christian life" (G.I.R.M., 1, 1). This understanding of the assembly, united with Christ, as the subject of the liturgical action strongly contributes to the sense of assembly as church for it is the church which celebrates liturgy. Pius XII, speaking of the mystical body as subject of the liturgical action, put emphasis on the union of Christ with the community in this act, "the entirety of its Head and members," and so liturgy is the worship which the "community of the faithful renders" (Mediator Dei, 20).

Following the same logic of development as L.G. in its first two chapters, furthermore, the missal first establishes the fundamental reality of assembly as church as the point of departure for a discussion of the roles and ministries to be exercised by the church's members so that everyone in the eucharistic celebration "may take their own proper part in it and thus gain its fruit more fully" (G.I.R.M., 2). The fundamental principle at work is that the gathered assembly, physically present and exercising its proper diversity of ministries, is truly the manifestation of the church at prayer: "The presence and active participation of the people show plainly the ecclesial nature of the celebration" (G.I.R.M., 4).

Liturgy belongs to the church, the people of God, given self-realization in the local assembly. For the church truly to become the full manifestation of the church at prayer, all the members of each particular assembly, in whatever culture it may live, are called to exercise their liturgical ministries. As the "General Instruction" states: "The purpose will be accomplished if the celebration takes into account the nature and circumstances of each assembly and is planned to bring about conscious, active, and full participation of the people, motivated by faith, hope, and charity" (G.I.R.M., 3). This participation, accomplished in prayer by the mutual presence of Christians to each other, is the exercise of baptismal priesthood. Again, as the "General Instruction" indicates: "Such participation of mind and body is desired by the church, is demanded by the nature of the celebration, and is the right and duty of Christians by reason of their baptism" (G.I.R.M., 3). The physical characteristics of symbol-making by assemblies in every culture point to the need "to select and arrange the forms and elements proposed by the church, which, taking into account individual and local circumstances, will best foster active and full participation and promote the spiritual welfare of the faithful" (G.I.R.M., 5). The very environment of the liturgical action of eucharist and other community prayers critically affects the possibilities of liturgy for the assembly since "The general plan of the building should suggest in some way the image of the congregation. It should also allow the most advantageous arrangement of everything necessary for the celebration and help the carrying out of each function" (G.I.R.M., 257). The goal for the eucharistic environment is to enable the assembly to be itself most fully: "While these elements must express a hierarchical arrangement and the difference of offices, they should at the same time form a complex and organic whole which clearly expresses the unity of the people of God" (G.I.R.M., 257). If the environment presents obstacles to the self-realization of the assembly in its liturgy, to that extent are the possibilities of the assembly's being true church negatively affected.

The "celebration of Mass is a communal action," the G.I.R.M. states (14), and therefore the entirety of the event seeks to enable and promote the mutual presence and shared actions of the assembly members gathered for eucharist. Even the physical arrangement of persons' bodies and their interactive deportment is at issue for the eucharistic assembly: "A common posture, observed by all, is a sign of the unity of the assembly and its sense of community" (G.I.R.M., 20). The structure of the assembly's eucharist is so arranged that the table of God's word (G.I.R.M., 8) is an event in which the word of God is both proclaimed in faith and listened to with faith (G.I.R.M., 9). At the same time, the table of Christ's body (G.I.R.M., 8) is the assembly's gathering for the paschal meal (G.I.R.M., 56) at which "the whole congregation joins Christ in acknowledging the works of God and in offering the sacrifice" (G.I.R.M., 54) in the eucharistic prayer, petitions for daily, including eucharistic, bread and for forgiveness from sin. In the rite of peace, "Christians express their love for one another and beg for peace and unity in the church and for all," and share the bread and the cup (G.I.R.M., 56).

The eucharistic memorial of Christ's death and resurrection is "a sacrament of love, a sign of unity, a bond of charity" (S.C., 47) in the assembly, entrusted to the church which is "his beloved spouse" (Ibid.). So the members of the assembly are not present in the eucharistic gathering "as strangers or silent spectators" but on the contrary take part "in the sacred action, conscious of what they are doing, with devotion and full collaboration" (S.C., 48). The stated focus of the assembly's eucharist is so entirely communal that every part of the Mass expects and requires the mutual sharing of the participants because the word and the meal are not meant simply for individuals but for the community and all its individual members who are united in love and peace. Especially in the Sunday assembly for eucharist, the Vatican II liturgical renewal has provoked a dramatic if not entirely finished process of change in vision and practice that has transformed the Mass from an exercise in individual piety to an event of shared prayerful experience.

With eucharist as model for assembly prayer, the other sacraments and liturgies which build up the body of Christ and offer worship to God (S.C., 59) have more easily become gifted celebrations of Christ's shared presence, with the result that earlier forms of familiar language which were used to describe liturgical events, like "receiving" the sacraments, have been found less and less appropriate as they yield to the community's appreciation of the assembly's "celebrating the sacraments" together.

A secure index that serves to describe renewed appreciation for the meaning and role of the assembly in liturgical prayer is a simple comparison between the Missal of Pius V (1570) and the Missal of Paul VI (1969). While G.I.R.M. very carefully and very vigorously explains that both missals are excellent and faithful witnesses to the faith of the church and especially to her eucharistic piety and teaching, nonetheless the efforts of the Second Vatican Council have allowed us to see in these two missals that the church is not only guardian of what is "old" in the deposit of tradition" but, at the same time, "it fulfills another responsibility, that of examining and prudently introducing the 'new' (see Mt 13:52)" (G.I.R.M., Introduction 15). Further, the instruction claims that "the liturgical norms of the Council of Trent have been completed and perfected in many ways by those of the Second Vatican Council" (Ibid.).

In particular, with regard to a sense of the meaning of the liturgical assembly, the Missal of Paul VI represents a considerable advance beyond the Missal of Pius V in the sense that, while the latter shows great respect for the piety of the faithful who attend the Mass, the Missal of 1570 nonetheless gives almost exclusive attention to the prayers of the ordained priest who is celebrating. But the Missal of Paul VI locates the presider's ministry within the overarching reality of the entire assembly and, in that context, seeks to actualize the long-dormant ministry of the assembly at large as well as the whole range of diverse ministries constituted by the gifts of each and all of its members. What is true of the Roman Missal is also the case of all the official liturgical books that have been produced by the reform of the Second Vatican Council, most especially in the instance of the R.C.I.A. which may stand as model for the liturgical assembly and its ministry.

BAPTISM

Commissioned by Christ (Mt 28:19), and enacted in the name of the Trinity by all major Christian churches, this first sacrament of Christian initiation incorporates new members into the church and into the mystery of Jesus Christ. It accomplishes what it signifies: new birth, new life, new creation. It arises in response to evangelization, the proclamation of God's word, to repentance and conversion to faith, and to a desire to be one with Christ in his church. This ritual act which combines a water bath and an anointing with oil confers grace, the priesthood of the baptized, and the gift of the Holy Spirit. In addition to the entries on baptism that follow, see also: Initiation, Christian; Anointing; Conversion to faith; Catechumenate; Evangelization; Mystagogy; Anointing, post-baptismal; Exorcism in baptismal rite; Sacraments in the Eastern churches; Sacraments in the Reformation churches

BAPTISM AND ORIGINAL SIN

I. Original Sin

The traditional teaching on original sin describes the state from which humanity is saved by Christ. The teaching is based on an interpretation of Rom 5:12. The interpretation that all have sinned in Adam appears to have been based on the practice of infant baptism, which in-

Original sin received its early formulation among the Church Fathers, most notably St. Augustine in his controversies against the Pelagians. The Council of Trent formulated the authoritative distinction that baptism removes the guilt of original sin, although concupiscence (the tendency toward evil) remains.

The contemporary church has witnessed a rethinking of the doctrine of original sin in the light of biblical criticism and the sciences. There are many schools of interpretation, but they generally agree that humanity has its dark side which cries out for redemption in Christ.

II. Baptism

Baptism incorporates individuals into Christ and forms them into God's people. In so doing, according to the traditional formulation, it removes the original power of evil. To say, "Baptism takes away original sin" is to express one aspect of "Baptism incorporates into Christ."

The liturgy of baptism has two expressions in the Roman Catholic church: the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults and the Rite of Baptism for Children. Although baptism is the same reality in each rite, only in the latter is there an explicit reference to the doctrine of original sin.

In the Rite of Baptism for Children is found this formula in the prayer of exorcism and anointing before baptism:

from original sin, make them temples of your glory, and send your Holy Spirit to dwell within them" (49). An alternate formula for the same prayer reads, "By (Jesus) victory over sin and death, bring these children out of the power of darkness" (221). This alternate formula is a literal translation of a potestate tenebrarum from the 1969 Editio Typica, rather than of ab originalis culpae labe which is found in the 1973 Editio Typica Altera. This prayer is omitted in the shorter rite of baptism designed for the use of catechists (20).

In addition to this explicit reference to original sin is an implied one in the prayer accompanying the anointing with chrism following baptism: "God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has freed you from sin...." This is an ancient formula most likely composed with adults in mind, but it has been used, together with many other texts for adult initiation, for infant baptism. The implication is that since the children have not committed personal sin, it is original sin from which Christ has freed them.

The Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship first promulgated the Rite of Baptism for Children in 1969 (Editio Typica). At the insistence of Pope Paul VI (who personally observed the omission of references to original sin) and the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, several changes were introduced in the second edition (Editio Typica Altera), promulgated in 1973. Among these were some which strengthened the influence of the doctrine of original sin.

For example, the General Introduction formerly spoke of the "natural human condition"; now it speaks of "the power of darkness" (2). The same introduction proclaims that baptism "washes away every stain of sin"; now it specifies that this applies to both "original and personal" sin (5). Also, the prayer of exorcism and anointing before baptism formerly asked freedom from "the power of darkness"; now it prays for freedom "from original sin."

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, however, makes no such explicit references to original sin. Its prayers and exorcisms beg freedom from the power of darkness and from personal sin. With adults, the obvious emphasis is on conversion of heart and entrance into the body of Christ. These prayers do not deny the doctrine of original sin; they simply concern matters which seem more appropriate to the nature of conversion.

By comparison, the baptism of a child has less to do with conversion of heart than with incorporation into the body of Christ. Hence, when the rite does speak of the sin from which the child is saved, it speaks of original, not personal, sin.

In the past a sense of urgency has surrounded the baptism of an infant. This was partly because of a fear of what would happen to the child if it died before baptism. This fear arose from a combination of factors: the infant mortality rate, the theory of limbo (a place for children who died before baptism), and the doctrine of original sin.

The Rite of Baptism for Children strives to lessen this fear. It urges that children be baptized within the first weeks after birth at a time when the child and its mother are well enough to attend the ceremony, and the family has had opportunity to make adequate pastoral preparation for the celebration. The rite actually encourages a further delay if the parents are unprepared to bring up their children as Christians (8). By shifting the focus of baptism from "freedom from original sin" to "incorporation into the body of Christ" the sharp sense of urgency has been modified.

The Rite of Funerals contains a set of texts which may be used for the burial of a child who dies before baptism. These texts differ from the other prayers for a deceased child in that they do not refer to the benefit of the sacraments the child enjoyed in life. However, by including these texts in the funeral rites of the church, the liturgy implies that a child of a Christian family who dies before its intended baptism still enjoys the eternal benefits of a Christian. The power of original sin in such cases may be presumed broken.

BAPTISM IN SCRIPTURE

The English word "baptism" derives from the Greek verbs baptō and baptizō. In Greek baptō means "dip," "dye" by dipping something into dye, and "draw" (water). The intensive form baptizō means "dip," or "cause to perish" by drowning or sinking (a ship). The nouns derived from these verbs are baptismos ("dipping, washing") and baptisma ("baptism"). The usual Hebrew equivalent for baptō and its cognates is tābal; both terms imply an immersion and often carry the sense of destruction by drowning. In the context of religious purifications the Greek verbs louō ("wash"), nīptō ("wash, rinse"), and rainō ("sprinkle") are more common than baptō or baptizō.

The ambivalence expressed in the words baptō and baptizō is based on the natural symbolism of water, which holds an important place in all religious traditions. Water can refer to both the life-giving blessings of God and the evil forces opposing God's authority.

water to exist, water is a natural symbol of life. Water quenches thirst and renews the human body. We use water to cleanse our bodies, and to purify our food and all objects related to human life. An abundant supply of water—either through rain or from springs and rivers—brings growth, fertility, and prosperity. For those who live in dry climates water is a special sign of happiness and divine favor.

Yet water can be destructive as well as life-giving. Floods destroy homes, crops, and persons. Polluted water carries infectious diseases. The formlessness and force of water in a storm at sea or at a raging river make it a fitting symbol of chaos. In a religious setting water can symbolize powers in opposition to the creator God who imposes form and stability upon creation. The ambivalence of the terminology for baptism and of water as a symbol finds expression in what the NT writers say about baptism.

Origin

The remote antecedents of Christian baptism are to be found in OT texts concerning ritual purification. Before carrying out rites in the Tent of Meeting (and later in the Jerusalem temple) priests washed themselves with water (Exod 40:12, 30-32). On the Day of Atonement the high priest bathed his body before putting on the priestly garments and performing sacrifices (Leviticus 16). The Pentateuch also prescribed washings as part of rites intended to end ritual uncleanness brought about through contact with unclean objects (Lev 11:24-40; 14:1-8; 15:1-13; Num 19:1-24). Ritual washings were so familiar to OT writers that they used them in metaphors, thus endowing them with moral and spiritual dimensions (Pss 24:4; 51:7) and in some cases eschatological overtones (Ezek 36:25; Zech 13:1).

Closer in time to early Christian baptism were Jewish practices that arose ritual purity. Part of the Pharisees' program for a "priestly" Israel was the observance even by non-priests of the biblical rules for ritual purity. Ritual immersion baths from Second Temple times have been discovered by archaeologists at several sites in the land of Israel (Masada, Herodium, Jericho, Jerusalem, Qumran), a sign that ritual immersions were widely practiced.

The elaborate system of water channels found at Qumran indicates that ritual purification was a regular feature of life within the Essene community. The Community Rule (cols. 2—3, 5—6) suggests that initiation into the Qumran community was accompanied by a special rite of washing that symbolized the initiate's interior life: "And when his flesh is sprinkled with purifying water and sanctified by cleansing water, it shall be made clean by the humble submission of his soul to all the precepts of God" (3:8-9). The community lived in expectation of the coming visitation of the Lord. From the beginning of their association with the sect, the members had a strong eschatological consciousness.

Two other possible antecedents for baptism are more controversial. The "proselyte baptism" in rabbinic literature (see b. Yebamot 46a—47b) is sometimes proposed as a model. A female convert to Judaism was required to undergo a ritual immersion, and a male convert underwent both circumcision and ritual immersion before undertaking Jewish life in its fullness. But doubts about how early this ritual was used and whether it should be called a "baptism" analogous to Christian baptism render it a questionable influence.

Likewise, the rites associated with initiation into Greco-Roman mystery religions are uncertain antecedents for baptism. That Jews of Jesus' time knew about such rituals is entirely possible. But it is unlikely that such rites exercised more than a passing influence on the vocabulary and practice of baptism among the followers of John the Baptist and Jesus.

The Jewish rite most influential on early Christian baptism was the baptism of John the Baptist. John's activity was centered in the Judean wilderness, by the river Jordan. Not far from Qumran, this area seems to have attracted several "baptist" sects in the first century. The Mandaeen movement probably originated in this milieu, though their claims to a direct tie to John the Baptist arose late, in response to Islam. Though part of a larger "baptist" movement, John was so striking a figure as to merit the title "the Baptist/Baptizer" from both Josephus (Antiquities 18:116-119) and the Evangelists (Mk 1:2-11 parr.).

Whereas most of the Jewish ritual washings were self-administered, John's baptism was administered by another. Whereas most Jewish ritual washings were repeated, John's baptism seems to have been a once-for-all-time affair. John's baptism demanded a turning around of one's life in the face of the coming kingdom of God. Several important characteristics of early Christian baptism derive from John's baptism: a water ritual, once-for-all-time, administered by another, involving conversion, and oriented toward the coming kingdom.

Two features distinguish Christian baptism from John's baptism: Christian baptism is "in Jesus' name" and involves the gift of the Spirit.

The point of contact between John's baptism and Jesus' baptism was Jesus' membership in John's movement (Mk 1:9) and the attraction of some of John's disciples to Jesus when he went off on his own (Jn 1:35-42). That Jesus accepted baptism from John is one of the best attested facts of his life. Yet the accounts of his baptism (Mk 1:9-11; Mt 3:13-17; Lk 3:21-22; Jn 1:31-34) are more concerned with presenting that event as the manifestation of God's Son and Servant than as a model for Christian baptism. Despite the silence of the synoptic gospels, it is possible that Jesus himself baptized (Jn 3:22, 26; 4:1), though this would not qualify as "Christian" baptism. The "great commission" of Mt 28:19 reflects the liturgical language of the late-first century church. Neither Jesus' own baptism by John, nor his activity as a baptizer, nor the great commission provides the one definitive link between John's baptism and Jesus' baptism. But given the common membership in the two movements, it seems that Jesus' followers would have understood baptism "in Jesus' name" and with the Holy Spirit (Mk 1:8 parr.) as the continuation and fulfillment of John's baptism.

Meaning

Christian baptism takes place "in Jesus' name," a formula which represents an earlier stage than the trinitarian formula of Mt 28:19. This christological formula is taken for granted by Paul (Rom 6:3; 1 Cor 1:13, 15; Gal 3:27) and expressed in various ways in Acts (2:38; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5). The Semitic expression underlying "in the name of" (lesēm in Hebrew, lesum in Aramaic) admits of several interpretations: with respect to, for the sake of, and with thought for. The basic point is that the baptized person now belongs to God through the saving-event associated with Jesus. In baptism one belongs to Jesus (1 Cor 1:10-17) and confesses him as Lord (1 Cor 12:3; Rom 10:9), thus putting aside all other masters. Perhaps with a deliberate allusion to slavery, Paul refers to baptism as the "seal" (2 Cor 1:22). In baptism one is delivered from the dominion of darkness and transferred to the kingdom of God's beloved Son (Col 1:13).

Christian baptism also differs from John's baptism by its association with the gift of the Holy Spirit (Mk 1:8; Acts 1:5; 11:16). Although the fullness of the Spirit is reserved for the eschaton, baptism

8:23). The present experience of the Spirit is also described as the "down payment" or "first installment" (arrabōn) of what will be in the future (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:14).

The precise relation between water baptism and the gift of the Spirit seems to have been a problem for some early Christians. That the two belong together is affirmed by many NT texts (Jn 3:5; 1 Cor 12:13; 2 Cor 1:22; Tit 3:5). How they fit together becomes problematic mainly because of some strange texts in Acts. At Pentecost the gift of the Spirit is a consequence of water baptism (Acts 2:38). Whereas some Samaritans had been baptized in Jesus' name but had not yet received the Spirit (8:14-17), in the Cornelius episode Gentiles first receive the Spirit and then undergo water baptism (10:44-48). Those at Ephesus who had received John's baptism need to receive the Spirit through the agency of Paul (19:1-7). Nevertheless, despite the variety in order, Luke's basic point in all these texts is that water baptism and the gift of the Spirit belong together.

The most extensive and profound reflection on the meaning of baptism appears in Romans 6. There Paul joins the baptismal themes of belonging to Jesus as Lord and the first installment of the gift of the Spirit to his theology of the cross: "Do you not know that all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life" (Rom 6:3-4). The connection between baptism and Jesus' death may have been suggested by the ambivalence of water as a symbol—both life-giving and death-dealing. Paul finds in baptism a death to the world ruled by the evil powers (sin, death, the Law) and the possibility of living a new life under the guidance of the yet fully realized; it demands conduct appropriate to one who is led by the Spirit (Rom 12:1-8) and rejects the idea that "all things are lawful" (1 Cor 6:12; 12:23). Thus in Romans 6 Paul specifies the point of identity between Christ and the baptized person as Jesus' death and resurrection, underlines the preliminary nature of the gift of the Spirit, and challenges his readers to "walk" appropriately as they await the fullness of God's kingdom.

The notion of baptism as passing from the dominion of sin, death, and the Law to the dominion of Jesus and the Spirit is Paul's way of talking about a motif that runs from John's baptism to Christian baptism: the forgiveness of sins (Mk 1:4; Lk 3:3; Acts 2:38; 10:43; 26:18). This motif is also the starting point for reflection on the problem of repentance after apostasy (Heb 6:1-6; 10:26). Other NT baptismal motifs associated with the forgiveness of sins include baptism as "an appeal to God for a clear conscience" (1 Pet 3:21), as a means of rebirth (Jn 3:3, 5; 1 Pet 1:3; 23; Tit 3:5-7), and as a washing (1 Cor 6:11; Eph 5:26; Tit 3:5; Heb 10:22).

The communal dimension of baptism and its power to incorporate even non-Jews into the people of God emerges from Paul's reflection on people of faith as the true children of Abraham: "For as many of you were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. . . . And if you are Christ's, then you are Abraham's offspring, heirs according to promise" (Gal 3:27, 29). In the midst of that conclusion Paul quotes an early Christian baptismal slogan: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, neither slave nor free, neither male nor female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (3:28). Though Paul showed interest in only the first of the three pairs, the content of the slogan corresponds to his themes of nonpartiality before God (Rom 2:11) and the equality of access to God's grace in Christ (1 Cor 10:1-6; Eph 2:11-13).

Baptismal motifs are so prominent in 1 Peter that it has been interpreted as a baptismal instruction or catechesis. Whatever the validity of this interpretation, it is fair to describe the spirituality of 1 Peter as thoroughly baptismal. A consequence of the author's reflection on baptism is his bold address to a largely Gentile community in terms applied in Exod 19:5-6 to Israel at Sinai: "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people" (1 Pet 2:9). What makes possible such assertions is the incorporation of non-Jews into God's people through baptism "in Jesus' name."

Order

There is no explicit description of the rite of baptism in the NT. What can be said about that rite must be inferred from passing comments. This is a dangerous procedure, since one can imagine all kinds of rituals on the basis of metaphors and other figures of speech.

With that caution in mind, it is possible to say the following about the rite of baptism in NT times. The person to be baptized received a form of catechesis (1 Cor 15:1-8; Heb 6:1-2). As with John's baptism, Christian baptism was administered by another (1 Cor 1:14-17). The word baptizō, the imagery of baptism as a drowning (Rom 6:1-11), and the practices associated with Jewish ritual ablutions and baths (miqwā'ōt) all indicate that immersion was the usual method of baptizing. Women may have been baptized by other women (Rom 16:2), though this is never made explicit. Where there was not sufficient water available for immersion, it was allowable to "pour water three times on the head" (Did. 7:3). The person was baptized "in the name of"—at first that of Jesus, and later that of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Mt 28:19; Didache 7:3). There may also have been questions directed to the congregation about the candidate's fitness (Acts 8:37; Mk 10:14; hymn. [Col 1:12] 20; Eph 5:14) confessions of faith (Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 12:13; Heb 4:14; 1 Jn 4:15; 5:5), and the imposition of hands (Acts 8:16-17; 19:6).

The premise behind most NT baptismal texts is that candidates were normally adults. It cannot be proved (or disproved) that young children or infants were also baptized in NT times. The arguments brought forward in support of infant baptism in the NT are weak. It is not certain that texts about the baptisms of entire households (1 Cor 1:16; Acts 2:38-39; 11:14; 16:15; 33-34; 18:8) really include infants. Peter's promise "to you and to your children" in Acts 2:39 refers to the succeeding generation(s), not to infant baptism. Jesus' rebuke of his disciples, "let the children come to me, do not hinder them" (Mk 10:14), had nothing to do with baptism in NT times. Whether young children or infants should be baptized raises the question about the nature of baptism. Is the essence of baptism the candidate's confession of faith, or is it the reception and appropriation of the salvation offered "in Jesus' name?"

Perhaps the strangest element in the NT teaching about baptism is the practice of baptism for the dead: "Otherwise, what do people mean by being baptized on behalf of the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why are people baptized on their behalf?" (1 Cor 15:29). It seems that people in Corinth had themselves baptized vicariously for dead people. Instead of criticizing this custom directly, Paul uses it to bolster his argument about the reality of resurrection. The practice was continued by the Marcionites and other heretical groups but condemned by the church at large. Paul's point was that this practice was a sign of belief in resurrection at Corinth. The magical assumptions behind it ran counter to Paul's insistence on "walking in newness of life" (Rom 6:4), as his reflection on the wilderness generation shows: "all were baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea ... with most of them God was not pleased" (1 Cor 10:2, 5).

BAPTISM, ECCLESIAL NATURE OF

The rite of acceptance into the Order of Catechumens is the first major ritual step of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. One of the questions usually asked of the candidates at the beginning of the rite is "What do you ask of God's Church?" (51) The Rite of Baptism for Children begins with the reception of the child. After asking the parents what name they have given their child, the celebrant asks, "What do you ask of God's Church for N.?" (37) From the outset, both of these rites make it clear that baptism is an ecclesial event.

This conviction has its roots in the NT where one of the meanings associated with baptism is that all who are baptized into Christ have become one in Christ Jesus (Gal 3:27-28). Paul uses the image of the body in order to express this union. In 1 Cor 12:13 he reminds the Corinthians that all who were baptized were made one body, in the one Spirit, and in Rom 6:3-5 he describes baptism into union with Christ Jesus as a matter of being incorporated into his death and risen life. In Acts 2:41 those who were baptized in response to Peter's preaching are said to be added to the community that day and the verses that follow (42-47) present a summary of the characteristics of life in the Christian community. In an exhortation on the meaning of baptism which appears in 1 Peter, members of the community are told that they have become "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people" (2:9).

The word used in Paul, Acts, and 1 John to express the union into which those baptized into Christ are brought is koinōnia which suggests a sharing or participation in something with others. The foundation of Christian koinōnia is God's call to share in the life of Jesus Christ (1 Cor 1:9) and the gift in which all participate is the gift of Christ's Spirit (Phil 2:1). Sharing a common life is the outcome of the gift (Acts 2:42) and this communion is expressed and deepened when members of the community participate in the Body and Blood of the Lord (1 Cor 10:16-17). Those who share the one Spirit are also expected to share their material goods with one another when there is need (Rom 15:22-27; Acts 2:44-45). Those who have received the Spirit and share the message of the gospel are called to proclaim it to others so that all may have koinōnia with the Father and with Jesus Christ (1 Jn 1:3).

The ecclesial nature of baptism is evident in the descriptions we have of the sacrament from the early centuries of the church's life. From the mid-2nd century we have the First Apology of Justin Martyr. In his description of the preparation for baptism he mentions that those preparing were expected to pray and ask God, while fasting, for the forgiveness of sin, but he goes on to say that "we pray and fast with them" (61). After the baptismal washing took place the newly baptized were led to the assembly where they were able to engage in common prayer and then celebrate the eucharist as members of the community (65).

This link between baptism and the assembly that celebrates eucharist is also obvious in the Apostolic Tradition which comes to us from the early 3rd century. Baptism took place after a time of preparation which could last three years and, by this time, the annual vigil celebration of Pascha had become recognized as the most appropriate context. Those to be baptized were brought to the water where they removed their clothes, renounced Satan, were anointed with oil of exorcism, went down into the water, professed their faith and were baptized, came out of the water and were anointed with oil of thanksgiving, got dressed and were brought to the assembly. There, in the midst of the assembly the bishop imposed hands on them with prayer, anointed them and sealed them on the forehead, and gave each the kiss of peace. When all this had transpired the newly baptized were allowed to pray with the assembly, give the kiss of peace, and celebrate the eucharist, the climax of the process. The right to engage in common prayer, give the kiss of peace, and participate in the eucharist were all symbols of full membership in the church.

Over the course of time the ecclesial nature of baptism lost its dominant place in Christian consciousness. Most of those being baptized were infants and baptism was no longer the climax of a process of initiation into the community. The dominant meaning associated with baptism came to be cleansing from original sin and gradually Easter, the Christian community's major feast, was abandoned as the most appropriate time for baptism.

The documents of Vatican Council II disclose a rediscovery of baptism as an ecclesial event. Members are incorporated into the church through baptism and deputed by their baptismal character to Christian worship (L.G., 11). Baptism is identified as the source of the Christian people's right and obligation to have full, conscious and active participation in liturgical celebrations (S.C., 14). Baptism is said to form persons into the likeness of Christ because they are baptized into one body in one Spirit (L.G., 7). In a discussion of the restoration of the catechumenate, Christian initiation is said to be the concern of the whole community of believers "so that from the outset the catechumens will have a sense of being part of the people of God" (A.G., 14). Finally, baptism is also recognized as the source of a bond between those who are fully incorporated in the church and those who are Christian but not in communion with the Roman Catholic church (L.G., 15).

The conviction that Christian initiation is a communal concern permeates the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. The initiation of catechumens is described as "a gradual process that takes place within the community of the faithful," one which will allow the faithful to renew their own conversion and thereby provide an example for the catechumens (4). The initiation of adults is said to be the responsibility of all the baptized and the entire community is called upon to help those preparing by their hospitality, their presence and active participation in the various rituals that make up the rite, their example of penance, faith and charity (9). Special roles within the community are designated for sponsors, godparents, the bishop, priests, deacons and catechists (10-16).

The rite of acceptance into the Order of Catechumens is described as being of the utmost importance because here, in a public assembly, individuals declare their intention to the church which accepts them as persons who intend to become its members (41). During that rite, the catechumens are invited to "come into the church, to share with us at the table of God's word" (60). The goal of the catechumenate is identified as that of training the candidates in the Christian life (75) and the goals of that period have the intention of leading persons "into the life of faith, worship, and charity belonging to the people of God" (76).

It is the church who judges the readiness of the catechumens and elects them, in God's name, for the sacraments of initiation (119-122). The bishop or his delegate carries out the election and has the responsibility for showing its ecclesial significance (121, 125). During the rite the catechumens are asked if they wish "to enter fully into the life of the Church through the sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and the eucharist" (132). The Lenten season which follows election is described as a time of preparation for the celebration of the paschal mystery for both the elect and the local community (138).

In the celebration of the sacraments of initiation which is the final step in the R.C.I.A., the elect receive pardon for their sins and are admitted into the People of God (206). The faith they personally profess during the celebration is the faith which has been handed down by the church and the candidates are baptized in that faith (211). This faith is also professed by the rest of the assembly during the service. Participation in the eucharist is the culmination of initiation and the newly baptized do so as part of the royal priesthood (217). Finally, the Sunday Masses of the Easter season are identified as the main setting for postbaptismal catechesis, a time "for the community and the neophytes together to grow in deepening their grasp of the paschal mystery and in making it part of their lives through meditation on the Gospel, sharing in the eucharist, and doing the works of charity" (244, 247).

The introduction to the Rite of Baptism for Children states that "children should not be deprived of baptism, because they are baptized in the faith of the Church, a faith proclaimed for them by their parents and godparents. . . ." (2). The various ways in which the local community participates in the baptism as well as the love and help its members give the child before and after baptism are said to be ways of making it clear that "the faith in which the children are baptized is not the private possession of the individual family, but the common treasure of the whole Church of Christ" (4). Baptism is normally to be celebrated in the parish church so that it "may clearly appear as the sacrament of the Church's faith and of incorporation into the people of God" (10).

During the rite itself there are a number of expressions of this corporate dimension. The symbolic action by which the child is received at the beginning is the signing on the forehead with the sign of the cross. The celebrant introduces the action by announcing that the Christian community welcomes the child with great joy and that he is acting in its name, claiming the child for Christ our savior by the sign of the cross. The parents and godparents are then invited to do the same (41). Later, as he asks the parents and godparents to renew their own baptismal vows by rejecting sin and professing their faith in Christ Jesus, the celebrant tells them that the faith in which the child is to be baptized is the faith of the church (56). Following the triple profession of faith, the celebrant says "This is our faith. This is the faith of the Church. We are proud to profess it, in Christ Jesus our Lord" (59). All are expected to respond with "Amen." Preceding the actual baptism the celebrant asks the parents and godparents if it is their will that the child be baptized in the faith of the church (60), and the post-baptismal anointing of the child with chrism is described as a sign of the royal priesthood of the baptized and of their enrollment into the company of the People of God (18).

Another important source for exploring the ecclesial nature of baptism is Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry, the 1982 document from the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches. There is much to be studied in its pages and the limitations of space do not allow a treatment of it here. However, the following quote may serve as a stimulus for further reflection on the topic: "Through baptism, Christians are brought into union with Christ, with each other and with the Church of every time and place. Our common baptism, which unites us to Christ in faith, is thus a basic bond of unity. We are one people and are called to confess and serve one Lord in each place and in all the world" (6).

BAPTISM, HISTORY OF

Baptism is the initiatory action which brings a believing person into the redemptive life whose sign community is the church. Such Christian theological meaning employs common materials and actions: virtually universally water has a capacity to symbolize life and death and washing. Ritual actions which use water to signify cleansing or rebirth, can be found in most world religions.

The Christian rite clearly derived from earlier material. The priestly washings of Judaism may have provided a partial model, even though such lustrations were often repeated. The washings, especially the initiatory bath, of the Qumran community (witnessed to by the pools and cisterns of the monastic ruins as well as by the scrolls) were significant antecedents. The Jewish practice of proselyte baptism, which cannot be shown to antedate the Christian era, but which Judaism was unlikely to have copied from the Christians, anticipated Christian baptism in ceremonial custom and in some interpretive meanings.

The principal source for NT baptism undoubtedly was the ministry of John the Baptist, who administered a decisive rite of baptism as a sign of inward repentance and expectancy. Jewish ethnic identity was not in itself sufficient in view of the urgency of the time (Mt 3:1-12; Lk 3:2-17).

Jesus' own baptism by John (see Mt 3:13-17; Mk 1:9-11; Lk 3:21f; and Jn 1:29-34), which does not actually recount a baptism) was the inaugural act of his public career and his identification with the sinful, but repenting and expectant people drawn by John. The accounts of Jesus's baptism, with the appearance of the Spirit as a dove and the voice from heaven attesting Jesus' divine sonship (Mt 3:16b; Mk 1:10f; Lk 3:22), influenced the development of early baptism rites and symbolism.

The synoptic gospels do not say that Jesus or his disciples baptized, but the fourth gospel (in a single early passage) depicts Jesus as leading a baptizing movement which first paralleled and then surpassed John the Baptist's (Jn 4:1f, cf. 3:26f). No one is spoken of in the NT as having been baptized by Jesus—tending to support the synoptics. But none of the critics, who drew contrasts between Jesus and John, remarked on Jesus' failure to follow John's use of baptism as a sign of repentance, suggesting that he did baptize. His not baptizing would draw more comment than would his doing so.

The book of Acts depicts the church from the beginning as a preaching, baptizing movement (Acts 2:38). When a convert evidenced signs of faith, baptism took place at once (2:41; 8:35-38; 9:17-19; 16:14f, 33). Often the term "baptize" suggests a unified, simple rite. But on several occasions a more complex action is indicated. At Samaria, converts who had been baptized under Philip's mission did not receive the gift of the Spirit until apostles came from Jerusalem and laid hands on them (8:14-17). The sequence was: preaching and faith, followed by baptism, and only later by the Spirit. The action was not intended to model a two-stage sacramental rite such as developed in the West, but to unite the Samaritan Christians with the parent community at Jerusalem. Another pattern is shown when, at the house of Cornelius, as Peter preached, the Holy Spirit came upon the household, and then the converts were baptized (10:44-48, cf. 15:8). The sequence in this instance was: preaching and faith, followed by the unmistakable access of the Spirit, to which baptism was an appropriate response. Here the event, marking the passage of the gospel to Gentile believers, is regarded as a New Pentecost (10:47, 15:8), and as at Pentecost, baptism follows from the initiative of the Spirit.

Acts gives no circumstantial description of how baptism was carried out. In one instance a convenient outdoor body of water was used (8:36). At other times baptism evidently took place in a domestic dwelling (9:18, 10:47; 16:15, 33), where, in the Roman world, water would be accessible. Acts speaks of the baptism of households, which would include parents, children, and probably servants (16:15, 33). Although the conclusion of Matthew includes the risen Jesus' direction to the disciples to baptize in the triadic name (Mt 28:19), there is no indication that this passage was taken to be a "formula" for baptizing, for the baptisms in Acts are in the name of Jesus (2:38; 8:16; 10:48; 19:5; 22:16, and cf. 1 Cor 1:13ff).

The NT supplies baptismal meanings. Baptism is for the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38). Through baptism one is identified with the death and resurrection of Christ (Rom 6:3-11; Col 2:12). It brings a believer into the one body (1 Cor 12:13), a unity in which the deepest human divisions are transcended (Gal 3:26-28). It provides a new birth (Jn 3:5). It is a "washing of regeneration" (Tit 3:5), an illumination (Eph 5:8-14; Heb 6:4), and a seal (2 Cor 1:22; Eph 1:13; 4:30). 1 Peter, which may be a baptismal homily, contains imagery of being born anew (1:23), tasting and feeding (2:2f), being called out of darkness into light, and made a new people (2:9f), and of persons summoned to live quietly and without reproach. The NT terms are performative; baptism not only signifies salvation, it conveys and enacts what it signifies (1 Pet 3:21).

In the generations following the NT period, the church's initiatory rite developed into a quietly dramatic form. The catechumenate, a stage of probation and instruction, came before baptism (Did., 7.1 is the earliest evidence; see too Justin Martyr, Apol. 61 and Hippolytus, Apost. Trad., 15-17). Before being accepted as a catechumen, a person's way of life was inquired into. Idolatry was so pervasive in the Hellenistic world that occupations which involved compromise with the worship of false gods or of the emperor had to be left. Although it was preliminary, this was a serious step. In many respects the catechumens, even though not yet baptized, were bonded into the community of faith. This pre-baptismal period was of indeterminate length, but could last up to three years. During this time, the catechumens would receive instruction, take part in the congregation's works of charity, and have a real, but limited part in the church's Sunday liturgy (they would be dismissed following the readings and the homily and before the eucharist meal).

Baptism, in the early centuries, was administered only at Easter (or, if necessary, at Pentecost, the end of the days of Easter) and under the general residency of the bishop. In the weeks prior to Easter, those who were to be baptized received special instruction and were assigned special austerities. (This period of intensified preparation of the catechumens for baptism was the origin of Lent.) The event took place before dawn, so that the baptism itself would coincide with sunrise on Easter day. The actual baptism became somewhat complex. There was a preference for using running ("living") water. At first, the persons to be baptized and the ministers and attendants went to the water, which might be a stream. When they arrived, prayer was said over the water. In time, as it could, the church built baptistries—buildings, often octagonal, located at the bishop's church, which contained a pool, with water perhaps two feet in depth, often with three steps going into the water and three more leading out. These baptistries were separate from, but not far from the eucharistic room. The water would be audibly flowing, and the room and the pool were decorated with mosaics of baptismal symbols. It was the rule in the early church that persons be baptized in the nude. All clothing was set aside, and all jewelry removed so that the water could touch the entire body. Modesty dictated that changing cubicles be provided in the baptistries, and women attendants be present; and, of course, the rite was performed in a largely dark room.

In the water there was, in some places, an anointing with the oil of exorcism. The candidates, in some places, turned to the West, the direction of the dying light, and renounced Satan and all his pomp and works—referring to previous affiliation with pagan religions, the products of the great Deceiver. Then they would turn to the East, where the sun of Easter day was rising, and be asked three questions, corresponding to the three sections of the Apostles' Creed: "Do you believe in God, the Father almighty. . . . In Jesus Christ his only Son. . . . The Holy Spirit, the church, and the life everlasting?" At each question, the candidate replied "I do," and was baptized. The creed thus grew up as the Christian baptismal confession.

The water rite became associated with other actions, of which anointing with oil was the most common. In the Syrian church, there was an anointing before the water baptism, and none following it. In other parts of the early church, West as well as East, the baptism would have been followed by an anointing, with prayer for the Holy Spirit, performed by the minister of baptism. In Rome only (assuming that Hippolytus reports Roman customs), there were two post-baptismal anointings—one at the water, by a presbyter, and probably of the entire body; the other in the eucharistic room, by the bishop, only of the head (Apost. Trad., 21). Other parts of the church used additional post-baptismal ceremonies, including foot-washing and the sign of the cross. The newly baptized were garbed in special white tunics; they then joined the "faithful" who had been keeping vigil in the eucharistic room under the presidency of the bishop. There, for the first time, the new Christians took part in the shared sign of peace and in the prayers of the faithful; they made their offering of bread and wine, and partook of the body and blood of Christ. The Easter communion, at least in some places, included a chalice of water (probably signifying inner cleansing) and a chalice of milk and honey (signifying the food of the newborn or the pledge of the promised land).

In the days following Easter, the newly baptized attended instructions ("mystagogic catecheses") by the bishop. These lessons explained what had been said and done at the baptism and the first communion. The compact actions and words of the rite, the darkness, and the secrecy of the text, made explanation desirable—explanation which would not have been fully clear before the hearers had undergone the experience itself. Our knowledge of the liturgy and theology of this period is significantly carried by four great sets of catecheses: by Cyril of Jerusalem, Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Chrysostom, and Ambrose of Milan. Although they describe a common Christian pattern, each teacher represents his own location and tradition, and each set of lectures shows individual genius.

Analysis by anthropologists (especially Arnold Van Gennep, in his classic Rites of Passage, 1909, Editio Typica, 1960) has found that changes in states of life move by three stages: separation from one condition and social solidarity, transition when one is no longer in the old but not yet fully in the new, and incorporation when one has taken one's place in a new status and internalized a new order of reality. Without benefit of modern social studies, the early Christians developed a succession of actions which effectively carried a new believer from an old way of faith and life into a new. These initiatory actions would have given form to interior experience; they would have been a ritualization of conversion.

Although baptism itself was a universal sign of Christian belonging, it figured in some complex doctrinal and disciplinary controversies. One was the question of return after lapse. Was it possible for persons who had, perhaps under great pressure, renounced their baptism to return to the church? Some rigorists, as early as the NT book of Hebrews, thought not. In time (see The Shepherd of Hermas, Mand. 4.3.1) the possibility of a second repentance gained strength. Eventually penance and restoration after sin became more routinely accessible. A second was schismatic baptism. When persons who had been baptized in a schismatic group, whose baptism followed the correct words and actions sought to unite with the Catholic church, should they be baptized again? (Cyprian of Carthage held that they should.) Or did the validity of baptism belong to the name so that baptism given in schism should stand? (Stephen of Rome thought so, but he regarded the bishop's laying on of hands as a gesture of reconciliation.) A third was the question of original sin. If, as some theologians thought, baptism is an essentially retroactive absolution, a Christian should seek forgiveness for sins after baptism through the developing penitential system. Tertullian, in On Baptism (c. 215 C.E., the earliest treatise devoted to one of the sacraments), pioneered this line of argument. Such ideas reduced the urgency of infant baptism, and supported the postponing of baptism until late in life, a practice prevalent for several centuries. Other theologians (principally Augustine) argued (in part from an interpretation of Paul, and in part from the church's use of baptism, including its renunciations and exorcisms, for infants) that guilt is inherited from the primal parents. This thesis made baptism of infants imperative.

In time, the entry into the catechumenate became a formalized ceremony at which salt was given and a summary history of redemption was narrated. The creed, which had originally been secret until the actual baptism, became publicly known, and it was "delivered" to the catechumens at a point in their preparation. The brief formula of baptism had originally been used in the churches of the East, but in the passive form: "N. is baptized in the name . . ." It was adopted in the West, where it took the place once occupied by the interrogatory use of the creed. The Western formula was active: "N., I baptize you in the name . . ."

The pattern of initiation which the early church devised gave form to the experience of adult converts. From early times, when parents became Christians, their children were baptized with them. (Presumably children born to Christian parents after their baptism were baptized rather than kept unbaptized until some later life stage. But the documents from the earliest generations are not concerned with the matter.) When most of the population of an area had become Christian, adult baptisms became rare; the catechumenate disappeared; and baptism became a rite for the children of believers.

These developments occurred (at locally different times) throughout the East and the West. In the East, baptism came to be performed a few days after the birth of a child, breaking the link of initiation with Easter. The local priest was and is the usual minister of the entire rite. The water baptism is followed at once by chrismation, using chrism blessed by the bishop (or patriarch). The rite leads to the child's first communion. These ritual events are regarded as comprising a sacramental unity.

In the West too baptism was ordinarily administered to infants soon after birth. The rite commonly began at the church door where some initial questions and ceremonies that had originally admitted adults to the catechumenate took place. Then the liturgy moved to the font (now a furnishing located within the church itself) with sponsors making the renunciations and promises in the name of the child. In most regions of the West (Spain, Gaul, North Italy, and perhaps others) baptism was followed, as in the East, by an anointing, given by the minister of baptism. Until late in the Middle Ages; newly baptized children were given communion. Functionally baptism changed from being a long process, bringing an adult into the church, to being a brief action centering on a child a few days old. Instead of identifying a community of instructed, convinced believers, it became a sign of the continuity of a Christian society. But through this functional shift, few adaptations were made in the rite itself or in the theological account of its meaning.

In Rome, and only there, baptism was followed by two anointings, one by the priest at the baptism, the second by the bishop, either at the baptism or as soon as possible thereafter. The churches in Gaul had followed the prevailing custom of a single anointing at the time of baptism. But when under Charlemagne there was an effort to bring consistency to the fragmented church, the Roman model was introduced widely in Europe—a model requiring a second post-baptismal anointing by the bishop, without which the baptism was incomplete. The medieval church in the West sought to make these regulations effective. In the vicinity of Rome, where dioceses were small, and most baptisms continued to be at Easter, and bishops were never far away, the two anointings were workable. But in northern Europe, where dioceses were large, the Roman pattern was impracticable. Bishops were remote, and travel was difficult. A time opened between baptism and the bishop's post-baptismal anointing. Legislation required that a child be brought to the bishop within a few years—five, seven?—of baptism and that no one receive communion before being “bishopsed.” But the bishop's anointing often did not take place. When it did occur, it was commonly some time after the water baptism. Since it came in later childhood, this bishop's anointing was associated with some minimal instruction. Eventually this medieval development was made the basis of a novel rationale of the rite. The two stages of initiation ritualized life stages: baptism was to birth as confirmation (the medieval Western term) was to coming of age.

This late medieval two-stage initiatory pattern was accepted both by the principal 16th century Reformers and by the Counter-Reformation church. The Reformers reworked the baptismal rites so that they suited the baptism of infants, which was then the universal practice. Luther understood baptism as a pledge of God's grace and faithfulness—a pledge that would stand whatever else failed. Calvin stressed baptism as admission to the redeemed society. Confirmation, the second stage of initiation, was a time of coming of age in the church, of owning for oneself the pledges of baptism. Throughout the 16th and 17th centuries, in Catholic and in Protestant communities, catechisms were written and strenuous educational efforts were put forward to secure an informed level of Christian life. (The Protestant pietists thought of confirmation as an occasion for conversion—the conversion of the already baptized.)

The Anabaptist strain of the Reformation, however, broke with this inherited pattern. Baptism should be of intelligent, confessing believers. Children of Christian parents were not baptized, but were held, under instruction and prayerful guidance, until, at an “age of discretion,” they could declare their own faith. Infant baptism could not be regarded as true baptism at all, thus calling in question the practice which had brought into being large Christian populations. The issues were (and remain) ecclesial as well as sacramental; and the ecumenical divisions over them have not been resolved.

Beginning in the medieval period and continuing until the mid-20th century, it was taken for granted that baptism was a private, not a congregational or ecclesial rite, to be attended by family and friends. It was cut off from confirmation and from any obvious association with the eucharist.

In the 19th century, beginning in Europe, but soon spreading more widely, the practice of a ceremonially important “first communion,” a few years prior to confirmation came to be common in the Roman communion. Baptism and holy communion were thus brought into closer association, but at the cost of flawing the sequence of the sacramental signs.

In the world-wide missionary expansion of the 16th-19th centuries, or in the rapidly growing "third church" of the mid-20th century, baptism has often recovered its power as a ritual enactment of conversion. But in the older centers of Christian population, Catholic and Protestant, a high proportion of the society is baptized, but only a small proportion seems to give evidence of adult Christian commitment or membership. Baptism has become a rite of reduced significance.

Various movements of "baptismal reform" have sought to raise standards of pastoral diligence. Quite rapidly in the final third of the 20th century significant changes in initiatory rites and practices have been introduced in many churches. The link between baptism and Easter (or the festal occasions of the year) is being reestablished. Baptism is coming to involve congregations, permitting baptized Christians to be reminded of their own baptism and its commitments. The level of pre-baptismal instruction for parents and sponsors, and of course for adults preparing for baptism, is being raised. In the Roman communion, the post-council Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults ("R.C.I.A.," Editio Typica, 1974) has had a marked influence. The rite (like new rites in several other communions) restores much of the shape of the baptismal process of the early church—catechesis, leading to baptism at Easter, followed at once by confirmation and first communion, and mystagogia. Such initiatory rites hold before the church what can properly be expected from its members.

DANIEL B. STEVICK

BAPTISM, INFANT

Early History

Baptism has from initial days of Christianity been the ritual center of the initiatory process. It is clear in scripture that adult persons professing faith, becoming part of the community of believers, and accepting the person of Jesus, celebrated a rite of baptism. The initial years of church experience provided a growing awareness of the many implications of baptism. And with this growth came changes in praxis.

Thus, for example, the timing moved from immediately after conversion, to a Sunday eucharistic gathering, to the annual Easter event. And the process of preparation expanded to what became the catechumenate. And at some time by the end of the 2nd century children were among the candidates for baptism. Yet even in the 4th century adult baptism was quite common.

Mixed reasons would be given for the baptism of children. There was an increasing fundamentalist understanding of the necessity of baptism, taking the Johannine gospel phrasing in a literal manner (see, Jn 3:3). There was also a high infant mortality rate. To all of this was added the theological explanation of Cyprian that it was the sin of Adam that was forgiven in baptism; with Augustine it was "original sin."

By the 5th century, the practice of infant baptism was universal in the West and by the end of the 8th century, when efforts were made to provide a universal common ritual for the Holy Roman Empire, it was presumed that the subject of baptism was the infant. While phrases and remnants of the adult baptism (the catechumenate, and the annual Easter celebration) were retained, the practical reality that came to be standard was that all children were baptized in infancy.

In the process there was a shift in the understanding of the meaning of baptism. The baptism which the Fathers of the church had written about was an experiential reality of conversion in adult life, a statement of faith confirmed and a way of life accepted. By the time the Scholastics wrote of baptism (de facto, infant baptism), society and church were practically co-terminous. The candidate was not saved from a pagan world into an ecclesial world or from a life of sin to forgiveness. The candidate was taken from a sinful state (i.e., original sin) to the state of grace.

Later History

With the reformers the practice of infant baptism varied. This was due to a shifting understanding of the church and the place of grace and faith in Christian life. Anabaptists directly rejected the concept of infant baptism. Luther, on the other hand, did not. Calvin's view of predestination made the question of infant baptism moot. For him children might be baptized but this was not, of itself, efficacious.

The Catholic response at Trent spoke directly to several of the underlying issues but did not address the question of infant baptism as such. It was deemed sufficient simply to condemn as heretical some of the Reformers' positions on the question. In the point/counterpoint manner of the "dialogue" of the day, the real dilemma was never faced: namely, that the praxis of infant baptism failed to engage people in the conversion to Christ. But while the bishops came forth strong on the issue of baptizing infants, they were sufficiently aware of the problem to call for catechesis, albeit in the years that would follow the sacrament.

Immediate History Leading to Vatican II

The pastoral liturgical movement of the 20th century encouraged a triple renewal in the whole process of Christian initiation: in the manner of celebration; in the level of catechesis; and indeed by changes in the very rituals themselves.

Even before the Second Vatican Council, the Easter vigil was restored and the focus of the people was directed to the baptismal implications of the vigil. And in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy there was issued a call for a renewal of the entire process of Christian initiation, a restoration of the catechumenate and the revision of the rite of infant baptism along with the composition of a new rite of adult baptism (S.C., 64ff).

Vatican II

The liturgy constitution was strong in its call for the catechumenate and its attention to adult initiation. But it was equally strong in its attention to infant baptism. "The rite for the baptism of infants is to be revised and it should be suited to the fact that those to be baptized are infants. The roles as well as the obligations of parents and godparents should be brought out more clearly in the rite itself" (S.C., 67). Three documents capture the fruit of this reform: the Roman Rite of Baptism for Children (1969); the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972); and the revised Code of Canon Law (1983). Before addressing these documents and noting the present praxis of the Catholic celebration of infant baptism a brief word on the dialogue that followed Vatican II is in order.

Post Vatican II Debate

While initial reception of the revised infant baptismal ritual was enthusiastic in most American parishes there was nonetheless more than a little concern raised by academics and pastors concerning elements of the new initiatory praxis being introduced, especially later in the light of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. In western Europe first, and later in the United States, many articles appeared searching for the theological rationale of infant baptism, questioning what the new rites for adult initiation said about the baptism of infants, etc.

The concern of both pastors and theologians surfaced in the area of faith. In infant baptism clearly it is the faith of the believing community that gives title to the celebration. In adult initiation the catechumen professes faith directly. This difference was less noticed in a culture where church and society were as one. In the secularized society of the later 20th century, questions and concerns surface more readily. When parents, showing little evidence of faith commitment, surface in local churches in a time when the mobility of people provides pastors with little awareness of the parents' roots and no clear picture of their future, serious questions arise.

While many of the articles concluded with the legitimacy of infant baptism, most were not enthusiastic. Sufficient questions were raised for the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith to issue an instruction (1980) affirming the Roman practice of baptizing infants. The instruction cites the traditional doctrine and then addresses several of the difficulties raised in the literature of the seventies: the order and sequence of "preaching, faith, sacrament"; that grace intended for a person "should be accepted and appropriated by the person who receives it"; restriction of the freedom of the infant; the pluralistic society in which the child will be reared; the begging of the question of adult evangelization in the baptizing of infants.

Arguing against each of these difficulties, the document then offers pastoral directives. The suggestion of "definitive abandonment" of infant baptism is not accepted. Two principles are offered. First, the value of infant baptism clearly suggests a gift for infants which must not be delayed. Secondly, assurances that the gift can grow by way of education and the Christian life must be given. If these assurances are not present there are grounds for delay; if the assurances are certainly non-existent, there are grounds for refusing the sacrament.

The instruction notwithstanding, there remains less than a clear, enthusiastic statement supporting infant baptism in current literature. Thus, e.g., Bernard Cooke in Sacraments and Sacramentality, page 116 et passim (Mystic CT: Twenty Third Publications, 1983).

Ecumenical Reflection

The academic and pastoral activity that led to the present situation was not limited to the Catholic community. More than a few churches have produced renewed rites in recent years emphasizing initiation and the Easter event. Ecumenical perspective on this can be seen in the January 1982 Faith and Order statement, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, promulgated at Lima, Peru. For a summary of the infant baptism question implicit in this statement, cf. Michael Amaladoss S.J., "Baptism in the Ecumenical Context," Month, 18:328-333 and Edward Kilmartin S.J., "Faith and Baptism: Sacramental Theology in the Lima Document" in Catholic Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, Michael Fahey, editor (Lanham MD, University Press, 1986).

The Lima document, cautioning against indiscriminate baptism, recognized the practice of infant baptism while respecting the discipline of churches that celebrated only believer's baptism. This having been said, however, the document does not touch many of the related questions; e.g., the manner of the continuation of the initiation process following the infant baptism or the manner in which churches which practice believer's baptism accept or reject the baptism of those already baptized as infants.

Having noted some ecumenical elements of the discussion, the following will focus on the Roman Catholic situation where the greatest pastoral development concerning infant baptism has occurred.

1969 Rite of Baptism for Children

The council called for a rite that would be adapted to the actual condition of children recognizing and expressing clearly the role and responsibilities of parents and godparents. Adaptations were to be provided for the baptism of a large number of persons. Adaptations were also to be allowed for baptism by catechists in mission lands where the ordinary minister of baptism was unavailable.

The seven chapters of the rite are preceded by a general introduction and specific introduction. The order of the rite includes reception of the child(ren), celebration of God's word, celebration of the sacrament, and conclusion of the rite. In the specific introduction the manner of arranging the rite within the Mass is detailed (paragraphs 29—30).

In the rite of reception, the name of the child is identified, the purpose of the gathering is noted, the responsibilities of the parents and godparents are attested and the child(ren) signed with the cross.

Chapter seven provides a number of pericopes for the celebration of God's word. Intercessions, prayer of exorcism and anointing with the oil of catechumens follow the homily. In the celebration of the sacrament, reminder is given of the symbol of water and the water of the font, if not already blessed, is blessed. Sin is renounced and faith is professed. This renunciation and profession is done by the parents and godparents themselves—not in the person of the infant. The child is immersed—or water is poured—with the trinitarian formula "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

Three elements of the celebration of the sacrament follow: anointing with chrism, clothing with the white garment and receiving the "light of Christ" from the lighted candle. The conclusion of the rite includes the Lord's Prayer and blessing.

Preparation for the Rite

Perhaps the most significant change in pastoral practice concerning the baptism of infants in the post-Vatican II era is in the area of preparation. Typical pre-of infants in the post-Vatican II era is in the area of preparation. Typical pre-Vatican II procedure presumed sufficient at designated hours, usually with parents arriving unscheduled and priest and parents and godparents meeting one another just as the celebration would begin.

Without detailing a format for the catechesis, the new rite clearly identified a need for such, and a variety of styles emerged. Many of the catechetical publishers have produced programs, structures, printed materials and audio-visuals supporting such catechesis. Typically this is directed by volunteer laity and includes pastoral visit or presence by the professional pastoral staff. The preparation period generally includes instructional elements on the theology of sacraments and initiation, spiritual reflection on the immediate and future tasks of parenting and ritual comments preparing for the actual celebration of the rite.

While sometimes programmed during the days of pregnancy, the preparation process has more often than not delayed the actual baptism to several weeks or months following birth in contrast to an earlier custom of baptism within the first week of birth. Can. 867 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law directs parents to see to it "within a few weeks."

Infant

The candidate for the rite is an infant. The rationale for baptizing infants is briefly noted in par. 2 of the introduction, citing John 3 ("unless one is reborn of water and the spirit") as the foundation for why children should not be deprived of baptism; adding that children are baptized in the faith of the church. Augustine is quoted.

Infants are children up to the age of reason, that is "those who have not reached the age of discernment and therefore cannot have or profess personal faith" (par. 1). In the Rite of Christian

Initiation of Adults there is specific provision for older children, that is, children of catechetical age, children of age to understand. These are to be catechized and then receive the three sacraments of initiation in the one liturgical celebration. Older children who are non sui compos, however, are considered infants.

Parents

The place of parents is accented strongly. It is they who present the infant. As a rule, it is they, or at least one of them, who profess faith, they who will rear the child in the faith.

Typically in parishes today parents register for the baptism of their child early, in the days of pregnancy. A preparation process follows as noted above. In the rite itself they publicly ask for baptism; they sign the child with the sign of the cross; they renounce Satan; they profess faith; they carry the child to the font; they receive a blessing.

As the role of parents is accented, a question surfaces when parents fall short of the mark. First to be noted is a presumption of faith. When hostility is evident, it is for the pastor to delay the decision of baptism until things are worked out. When one or both of the parents is not Christian and yet a sincere request is made with assurance of Christian upbringing, the baptism proceeds and the pastor notes the additional demand this places on the sponsor. Following the 1980 instruction, when parental assurance of Christian upbringing is non-existent, baptism is refused.

Sponsors

Each child may have a godfather and a godmother. Godparents should be present to be added spiritually to the immediate family of the one to be baptized and "to represent Mother Church" (General Introduction, par. 8ff.). As occasion offers, the godparent will be ready to help the parents bring up their child to profess the faith and to show this by living it.

Together with the parent, they profess the church's faith, in which the child is being baptized. Thus godparents should be mature enough to undertake this responsibility, should have received the three sacraments of initiation: baptism, confirmation, and the eucharist, and should be a member of the Catholic church and canonically free to carry out this office. Par. 10 of the general introduction noted that "A baptized and believing Christian from a separated church or community may act as a godparent or Christian witness along with a Catholic godparent, at the request of the parents and in accordance with the norms for various ecumenical cases." The 1983 Code, however, would have such a person "only as witness" (can. 874).

Community of Faith

The child has a right to the love and help of the community. The People of God, that is the church, made present in the local community, has an important part to play in the baptism of children. This is expressed especially in the assent after the profession of faith by parents and godparents.

Time and Place

Par. 8 of the introduction spells out principles concerning the time for the baptism. If the child is in danger of death, the baptism is to be done without delay. In other cases, as soon as possible and even before the child is born, the parents should be in touch with the parish priest that proper preparation may be made. An infant should be baptized within the first weeks after birth; a longer interval may be determined by the conference of bishops. When parents are not yet prepared to profess the faith or to undertake the duty of bringing up their children as Christians, it is for the parish priest, subject to directives of the conference of bishops, if any, to determine the time for the baptism of infants.

It is recommended that baptism be celebrated during the Easter vigil or on Sunday. It should not be celebrated more than once on any given Sunday. It may be celebrated during Sunday Mass so that the entire community may be present and that the relationship to eucharist be clearly seen. But baptism at Sunday Mass should not be done too often; thus typically parishes schedule baptism for the Sunday Mass at designated intervals.

The place for the baptism of infants is the baptistry of the parish church. Provision is allowed for a temporary font elsewhere in the church for pastoral reasons or, with the permission of the bishop and consultation of the local parish priest, at a font established at another church or public oratory within the parish boundaries (Introduction, par. 10 ff.). Except in danger of death, baptism is not to be celebrated in private houses and except in emergency, not in hospitals. The 1983 Code reinforces this strong statement for the place of baptism in the parish church (cf. can. 857).

Danger of Death

As noted, provision is made for baptism in danger of death when no priest or deacon is available. Chap. 5 of the Rite of Baptism for Children provides a ritual for any suitable member of the church to minister. Prayer, profession of faith, baptism, clothing with the white garment and the Lord's Prayer are detailed. In the absence of one able to lead the prayer, it is sufficient for any one to profess the creed and to baptize, with water, "N., I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." The parish priest is to be notified and if the infant survives, the ritual of chap. 6 is to be observed.

Mystagogia and Continuation of Initiation

The baptism of children presumes continued attention to the sharing of faith experiences and religious education as the child matures. The process of continuing the initiation begun in infant baptism has been the subject of much debate. The rite clearly keeps the order and sequence of baptism, confirmation and eucharist in perspective. The practice, since the call of Pope St. Pius X for the age of first eucharist to be lowered, developed, at least in most areas of United States, for confirmation to be delayed until after first eucharist. The sequence of initiation has been further complicated with the celebration of the rite of reconciliation prior to confirmation and/or eucharist. While the 1983 Code continues the tradition of the sequence of baptism, confirmation, and eucharist, pastoral practice for many continues to follow a different sequence.

BAPTISM, INFANT, PARENTS IN

The involvement of parents in the baptism of their children is documented in the earliest accounts of infant baptism. Referring to little children who are to be baptized and who cannot "answer for themselves," Hippolytus said "let their parents answer or someone from their family" (Apost. Trad. XXI, 4). As the emphasis on immediate or quam primum baptism developed, mothers were commonly absent from the baptism, and the godparents or sponsors gradually took over the role of answering for the children and even holding the infants during the baptism. In the Roman Ritual prior to the reforms mandated by Vatican II, the father, and the mother when she was present, had no formal role in the baptismal rite (Ordo Baptismi parvuli).

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy called for the revision of the rite of infant baptism and decreed that "the roles of parents and godparents, and also their duties, should be brought out more clearly in the rite itself" (S.C., 67). In the Rite of Baptism for Children (R.B.C.), parents once again exercise a "more important ministry and role in the baptism of infants than the godparents" (7). An Instruction on Infant Baptism (Instr.) from the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in 1980 and the 1983 Code of Canon Law (C.I.C.) both reaffirm the parents' role and responsibilities, which fall into three categories:

(1) Prior to the baptism, at least one of the parents must give consent for the baptism to take place and "provide a founded hope that the infant will be brought up in the Catholic religion" (C.I.C., 868). If the parents are not able to provide such an assurance, pastors may delay the baptism (R.B.C., 8-4, 25; Instr., 30). Even before the child is born, parents are expected to prepare for the baptism through instruction, prayer and religious rites under the direction of the pastor or catechists (R.B.C., 5-1, 7-1, 8-2, 27; C.I.C., 851). Parents also designate the sponsors in infant baptism (C.I.C., 874).

(2) At the baptismal liturgy, the presence of both parents is of such importance that the baptism may be delayed if the mother is not healthy enough to participate (R.B.C., 8). The parents make the responses, not answering for their child, but speaking of their own faith and their commitment to form the child in the faith. They ask that the child be baptized, they sign their child with the cross, they renounce Satan and profess the faith, they carry the child to the font, they hold the lighted candle, and they are blessed with special prayers. A parent who cannot make the profession of faith may keep silent during the rite. All that is asked is that such a parent permit the child to be instructed in the faith (R.B.C., 5-4).

(3) After the baptism, it is the parents' responsibility to bring the child up in the faith, enabling the child "to know God . . . to receive confirmation, and to participate in the holy eucharist" (R.B.C., 5-5). This formation in the faith fulfills "the true meaning of the sacrament" (R.B.C., 3). The godparents' role, described in the questions at the beginning of the baptismal liturgy, is to help the parents in this duty (R.B.C., 40).

This emphasis on the parents' role and responsibility before, during and after the baptism is supported by other church documents. The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, for example, speaks of the family as the domestic church in which "parents, by word and example, are the first heralds of the faith with regard to their children" (L.G., 11). Pastoral practice in the years since Vatican II has correspondingly expanded from immediate preparation of the parents for baptism to include pastoral care of potential parents (i.e., engaged and recently married couples) and ongoing support for parents throughout the years in which they are raising children.

BAPTISM, MINISTERS OF

Ministers of baptism are ministers of an initiation process. Initiation into any organization presumes some relationship between the members of that body and the individual seeking incorporation. Anthropologists and sociologists have studied rituals of incorporation present in diverse societies. An individual becomes a member of any society through some form of ritual process no matter how formal or informal this process might be.

The full development of the human person in any cultural setting is significantly affected by the ritual process of incorporation. Erik Erikson has pointed out the role which ritual plays in the incorporation of the infant/child into a particular culture. Parents, extended family and the society in general all play a role in the process. Through a ritual process, the individual becomes one with a particular people, community, society.

Incorporation into the Christian community is no exception. Historical evidence points to the presence of an initiation process whereby adults desiring membership in the church spent months and even years in preparation for full membership. The process involved the entire Christian community. While some members had specific, detailed responsibilities toward the one to be initiated, the entire community was involved particularly through prayer and fasting for those to become members.

A more detailed account of the initiation process is given in the 3rd century text, the Apostolic Tradition. Here we see the relationship that exists between the one to be initiated and the individual who first brings this person to the community. "...those who have brought them shall bear witness about them, whether they are capable of hearing the word. They shall be questioned about their state of life...." The "sponsor" obviously takes some responsibility for the individual who is brought before the community for the first time.

"Teachers" are responsible ministers in this 3rd century church. They are to question the individuals as to their "reason for coming to the faith." "After their prayer, when the teacher has laid hands on the catechumens, he shall pray and dismiss them. Whether the teacher is a cleric or a layman, let him act thus."

Not only do the teachers give instruction in the faith, but they do so within the context of prayer and are called upon to lay hands on those under instruction. Note also, that the role of teacher was not restricted to clerics.

Primarily, ministry associated with initiation in the early church was twofold. In regard to the individual to be initiated, the minister was to proclaim the Word, thus enabling a conversion of heart and change of life style in the one to be initiated. On the other hand, the minister was responsible to the community, determining the suitability of the particular individual seeking membership in the faith community.

The historical shift in ministry in the church eventually places sole emphasis on the priest as minister of baptism. With the disappearance of the catechumenate, and the growth in infant baptism as the normal mode of initiation, the priest alone ministers to the individual to be initiated. Ordinarily, this ministry is limited to the celebration of the sacrament of baptism. When an adult desired to become a member of the church, the priest alone conducted "convert" sessions with the individual. Often, the baptism itself was a private affair, with priest and two godparents (representing the community) gathering in the baptistry at a time that did not interfere with the parish Mass schedule.

Diversity of ministries in baptism, particularly as evident in the historical development of the rites indicates how important the involvement of the entire Christian community is in the process. With the implementation of the R.C.I.A., the "convert" no longer seeks from the local priest alone. Instead, a process of collaborative ministry is employed as the individual moves through the various stages of formation in the faith. The adult wishing to become a member of the Christian community plays a vital role in the process of formation. One must undergo a radical transformation of life style as one prepares to live life in Christ. Yet, due to the very nature of this commitment, it must be made in communion with other Christians. To live life in Christ is to be a member of his body, the church.

Due to the reforms in ecclesiology and soteriology set forth in the decrees of Vatican II, it is now possible to base one's understanding of ministry on the presence of a believing, faith community. It is into this vibrant body of believers who live their lives in union with Christ and in communion with one another that the new member is incorporated.

The many charisms or gifts present in the local church are surfaced and employed during the stages of the catechumenate. Based on the premise that the faith is "caught" not "taught," it is in the context of various faith-sharing sessions with a diversity of individuals that the catechumen is able to begin to accept the faith. This concept of diversity of ministries becomes the model for all ministry in the church.

The Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (A.G., 14) points to the responsibility of all the baptized to make known the message of Christ to the world. This is a major shift from the encyclical Mystici Corporis (article 17) in which Pius XII claims that it is the church's chief members, that is, the clergy, who are responsible for carrying out the mission of Christ in the world. The baptized are called upon to be the body of Christ; therefore, they are to welcome newcomers into their midst giving clear evidence of the spirit of Christ which binds them one to the other.

Whenever possible, all the faithful should gather with the catechumens to support them in prayer. This is particularly true at the transitional periods in the life of the catechumen (scrutinies, exorcisms, etc.) particularly during the Lenten season.

In the ancient church it was essential that some member of the community sponsor the individual seeking membership. Some knowledge of the interested party's moral character, intention for seeking membership and some sign of faith were important in order to assure that no harm would be done to the fabric of life of the Christian community. Today, a sponsor is called upon to do likewise, that is, to bring the individual to the church and to attest to the credibility of the person's request for membership in the catechumenate. This presumes a relationship between the sponsor and the one to be baptized. Often, it is the sponsor who has inspired the inquirer to begin the process of initiation.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults calls for both a sponsor and a godparent. While on occasion the same person might fulfill both, the roles are nevertheless distinct. While the sponsor is responsible for attesting to the life stance of the individual, the godparent forms a unique relationship with the catechumen. The catechumen, priest and local community all have roles to play in the choice of godparent. A godparent is chosen from among the assembly as one who leads an exemplary Christian life possible of being emulated by the catechumen. Note, emphasis is placed on the ability of the godparent to witness to and share the faith with the catechumen. Choice of godparent is not based on degree of friendship nor familial relationship.

Godparents are responsible "to show the candidates how to practice the gospel in personal and social life, to sustain the candidates in moments of hesitancy and anxiety, to bear witness, and to guide the candidates' progress in the baptismal life" (R.C.I.A., 11). The godparent participates in faith-sharing sessions with the catechumens and is present as witness for the community at the various rituals of incorporation. Therefore, the godparent is an active member of the community; an individual recognized as one who lives the Christian life daily and participates fully in the activities of the local church.

At the Rite of Election, the godparents exercise their roles for the first time as they come forward when called by name and testify before the assembly as to the readiness of the catechumen to become one of the elect. They, together with the catechumen, write their names in the book of the elect.

In the ancient rite of initiation found in the Apostolic Tradition, the bishop, priest and deacons all had roles in the process. In addition, the text indicates that the individual who engaged the catechumens in the actual instruction process was either a "cleric or a layman" (Apost. Trad., 19). In time, the priest alone filled all roles. With the revision of the rites, various roles are now assigned to bishop and priest with deacons being called upon to assist when necessary in the process. The role of teacher or catechist is given to a member of the assembly possessing the charism.

The bishop, as chief teacher of the diocese, is responsible for the formation in the faith of all catechumens. It is his role to implement the spirit of the R.C.I.A. in his diocese and to see that all who wish to participate in this process of initial formation might be able to so. Ideally, it is the bishop who presides over the election ritual and the Easter vigil. Where this is not possible, the local parish priest presides.

The priest, as pastor of the local church, is responsible for the formation of the candidates. It is the priest, along with catechists and other ministers, who establishes the catechumenate in the local church. Where possible, the priest, along with catechists and godparents, establishes a personal relationship with each catechumen providing pastoral care and instruction in the faith. He also selects, along with catechists and catechumens, appropriate godparents for each candidate.

Generally, it is the priest who presides over the various transitional rites of the catechumenate. He also presides over the baptism of an adult (or child of catechetical age) and in the absence of the bishop, confirms the candidate.

Deacons may, where pastoral necessity requires, take the place of the priest in the various stages of the initiation process including presiding at the celebration of the sacrament.

The reforms subsequent to Vatican II contain two unique expressions of initiation: one set of rituals for the initiation of adults, the R.C.I.A., and one for the initiation of children (those who have not yet reached the age of discernment). Due to the very different nature of initiation of children, the church's ministry responds accordingly.

While the community, priest, deacon and godparents continue to play a role in the process, it is the parents who take the primary ministerial role in the baptism of children.

It is the parents who take the role of sponsor, bringing their child to the church for initiation. They publicly ask that the child be baptized, an act which calls for a commitment in faith on their part. Both mother and father have roles to play in the actual ritual of baptism. They make a public profession of faith on the part of the child and declare that they will continue to assist the child on the journey of faith.

The parents continue their ministry in the initiation process as they share the life of faith with their growing child. They are the first teachers of the child in the faith. As their child prepares to complete the initiation process with the reception of first eucharist and confirmation, the parents continue to play an active role in the process.

In the R.C.I.A., the bishop and his local representative, the parish priest, have the responsibility of providing adequate formation for the candidates. In the initiation of young children, the necessary formation is given to the parents. Some process, similar to that of the catechumenate is designed for parents or children to be baptized providing them with the opportunity to share faith with other members of the community as they prepare to bring their child for baptism.

Godparents play a special role in the life of the young Christian. Often, they are chosen because they are the "significant others" in the life of the child. They will witness to the faith as the child matures and they will be present in times of need. Because of their particular ministry, godparents are often included in the faith sharing sessions provided for parents prior to the baptism of their child. They are also given a special place in the actual celebration of the sacrament of baptism.

While the local priest is ultimately responsible for the formation of the parents prior to baptism, other members of the community are called upon to share their gifts in the process. The catechist, in conjunction with other members of the community, shares faith with the parents in an informal setting. At times, a more formal classroom setting will also be appropriate for some aspects of preparation.

BAPTISM, MODES OF ADMINISTERING

Christian baptism is rooted in the NT, but the biblical writings neither describe the rite nor direct how it should be carried out. The verb bapto means "dip" or "immerse" or "bathe" or "wash" or even "drown"—actions which would require varying amounts of water. In the NT this word, which is infrequent, is used of washing one's hands (Lk 11:38), of dipping (Jn 13:26), and in Rev 19:13 it may mean "dye." The Christian rite is always designated by the related term baptizo (v.), baptisma (n.), which had come into use in Judaism prior to the Christian era to speak of ceremonial lustrations and of proselyte baptism. Baptisma is also used figuratively of Jesus' passion (Mk 10:38; Lk 12:50). The word "sprinkle," rantizo, which is used for ceremonial purification in LXX, in Mk 7:4, and in Heb 9:13,19,21;10:22, is never used in connection with the Christian initiatory rite.

At the portion of the Jordan where John is presumed to have baptized, the river is shallow and marshy. Reaching deep water would be difficult. But it is usually assumed that John's baptism brought penitents under the water. In Jewish proselyte baptism, candidates entered the water in the nude and immersed themselves.

No baptism is described circumstantially in the book of Acts or in the epistles. The term "baptize" was so widely understood that it could stand without explanation. Several of the early baptisms seem to have been performed in domestic dwellings and with little preparation (Acts 10:47; 16:15,33). Roman houses would have a supply of water; although persons could step into the impluvium, a pool in the atrium of most well-to-do homes, it would be rather shallow. The account in Acts 8:36-39 indicates that Philip and the eunuch stepped into and out of a convenient outdoor body of water. The Pauline imagery of baptism as burial and resurrection with Christ (Rom 6:3-5, which is not the only NT baptismal imagery) need not imply baptism by immersion, for in the ancient world bodies were often buried by placing them in a cave or a wall, and as Sophocles' Antigone indicates, ceremonial burial could be performed by casting earth on the body.

The earliest documentary evidence subsequent to the NT, the Didache (early 2nd century?), gives flexible directions: "Baptize in running water. . . . And if you do not have running water, baptize in some other. If you cannot in cold, then in warm. If you have neither, then pour water on the head three times" (7.1-3). Immersion in cold, running water was preferred; but if this could not be done, other actions and other kinds of water were acceptable. Some of the adaptability and good sense of this and later church orders has marked the tradition: when you cannot do what you would prefer, do what you must. The rite can be true to itself while varying in execution.

Early baptismal pools are extant from before and after the Peace of the church (such as in the well-known house church at Dura-Europos, c. 250 C.E.; and the many later baptisteries, such as that at St. John Lateran in Rome, c. 500 C.E.) which show a conspicuous, decorated pool, often octagonal in shape, with steps leading down into it and out on the opposite side, located outside the eucharistic room (indeed usually in a separate building). The pool holds a large amount of water, flowing in and out (where that is possible), the water being anywhere from a few inches to two feet in depth.

These pools, located only at the bishop's churches, were used once a year. The baptismal water was to reach the entire body, but the pools themselves were relatively shallow. Paintings indicate that often the candidates stood in the water, in the nude, at the baptism, they bent down while water was dashed over them using a large bowl.

In time the persons baptized were almost exclusively infants; the church

moved to colder regions; and Roman virtuosity with water was lost. Baptism came to be performed over a bowl which stood on a pedestal in or near the eucharistic room. Baptism was performed, essentially privately, when the child was a few days old. In the Eastern churches infants continue to be baptized in the nude and are dipped into the water. In the West, baptism in the nude lapsed; the child was held by the minister of baptism, who poured water over the child's head, usually three times. Medieval fonts became highly decorated, and when the baptismal water became a source of abuses, large covers were built for the fonts—at times requiring hoists to raise them when the font was to be used. The quantity and centrality of the water was reduced, while the water-holder became an object of interest in its own right.

These furnishings and customs continued in the medieval and modern Catholic tradition as well as in the major changes of the Reformation. Several Protestant traditions sought to have baptisms take place when the congregation was present, but until recent years, such efforts largely failed. Some modern Protestant bodies (through delicate sensibility, rather than through theologically informed conviction) began to baptize by "sprinkling," using only a few drops of water. This practice is the extreme of the reduction of the water itself as constitutive of the sacramental sign.

From the early 16th century, certain Protestant groups held, on NT grounds, that true baptism is a declarative act made by a believer; hence the baptism of an infant, who can give no sign of faith, is no baptism at all. This conviction meant that most of the Christians in Europe had to be regarded as not truly baptized. The ecclesiastical disruptions were violent, and the ecumenical divisions that were raised remain generally unresolved. Usually this emphasis on "believer's baptism" was associated with the practice of total immersion—the Pauline imagery of baptism as death, burial and resurrection with Christ (Rom 6:3-5) was taken to give the normative meaning. Churches were built in which a large baptismal pool is located in full sight of the congregation. Baptism is administered, always by total immersion, only to persons competent to give an account of their faith. Baptist churches differ in the recognition they grant to baptisms made by modes other than immersion.

The Roman service books allowed for baptism by immersion, and the rubrics of Anglican and some Lutheran churches expressly offered it, sometimes as the first option. (The minister “shall dip the child in the Water discreetly, or shall pour Water upon him,” Anglican Prayer Book.) The Eastern tradition has always maintained it. In missionary areas where adult converts are common, it has often been used. Modern times have seen an emphasis on baptism as a sign of a life-changing divine redemption. The Roman Catholic R.C.I.A. (Editio Typica, 1974) holds the baptism of converted, prepared adults before the congregations as a significant, constitutive function of the Christian community. In many communions, baptism is now administered at a Sunday eucharist, at Easter or at one of the major feasts of the church’s year, and in full view of the congregation, with participatory roles for many. The use of immersion for the baptism of children and of adults expresses the life-and-death power of the act, and this mode is growing in use, particularly in the U.S. But change in the mode of baptism requires appropriate furnishings. Fonts are being brought into greater visibility, with water made a richer sign. And they are often designed as pools, with baptism of adults by immersion in mind, while other ways of carrying out the initiatory action remain possible as well.

BAPTISM, SYMBOLS IN

This article will consider the role of symbols in baptism by focusing on the symbolic dimension of the baptismal rite for adults (R.C.I.A.). It is divided into four sections: 1) role of symbols in Christian initiation; 2) symbolic dimension of the catechumenate; 3) symbolic dimensions of baptism at the Easter vigil; 4) catechesis of baptismal symbols.

Role of Symbols in Christian Initiation

The symbols which are part of the sacramental celebration of baptism today evolved in the context of the initiation of adult converts during the first four centuries. For these converts, coming to believe in God revealed in Jesus Christ, deciding to accept the salvation offered in Christ’s life, death, resurrection and outpouring of the Holy Spirit, and learning how to live a life faithful to the risen Lord above all else as members of the Spirit-filled community could be a disorienting experience. Those undergoing conversion had to learn to perceive, think, speak, and behave in a way often radically different from that to which they were accustomed. Both the early communities’ need to help the converts through the process of conversion, and their ever-deepening theological reflection on the meaning of baptism in water and the Spirit as they experienced it being lived out in common, contributed to the progressive ritualization of Christian initiation, rich in symbolic expression. In addition to the water-rite itself, symbolic gestures such as imposition of hands, anointings, casting off old garments and being clothed in new, etc., became part of the baptismal rite. These symbolic rites both gave expression to the converts inner experience of God’s work in their lives, and, simultaneously, by representing this spiritual reality in a tangible way, provided initiates with a palpable means of making contact with the paschal mystery in order to be drawn more fully into it.

The central symbols of the baptismal rite: water, oil, and touching, are natural symbols which are found in initiatory rites in other religions. The way they are understood in Christian baptism, however, while including their natural and cultural meaning, is more immediately derived from their role in salvation history and scriptural imagery. Thus, while water as natural symbol can signify birth, or destruction, or sustenance of life, the waters of baptism are understood through the experience of salvation history as symbolizing the waters of creation, or of the flood, or the living waters Jesus promises to those who believe in him so that they will never thirst. Similarly, patristic understanding of baptism in terms of contemporary cultural symbolism of, e.g., the nuptial bath, is rooted in Eph 5:26, where Christ washes his bride, the church, with water and the word.

Symbols have a number of characteristics which help explain their role in the rite of initiation: symbols are multivalent, that is, they have more than one level of meaning; reflection on a given level of meaning (e.g., water as birth) can lead to discovery of another meaning (e.g., water as death), and to reflection on the relationship of the meanings (how can something be simultaneously birth and death?), and to the relationship of the various meanings to what is being symbolized (how is baptism into Jesus who is anointed with the Holy Spirit both birth and death?). Since the work of the Holy Spirit in Christian conversion has many dimensions, and ultimately defies any single verbal formula, scripturally derived ritual symbols which are also many-dimensioned are a privileged means both to express that work and to help draw converts more deeply into it. Similarly, because symbols are multivalent, they are also ambiguous, and this is another reason why symbolic expression is particularly appropriate in the ritualization of conversion. While the theological reality of being plunged into the paschal mystery is the same for all baptized Christians, the perceived experience of living out Christian conversion is not. The rich ambiguity of symbolic ritual allows a given rite to be perceived by all converts as a genuine articulation of their own unique experience of the work of the Holy Spirit in their lives, and as a vehicle through which they can surrender themselves to that work. Further, part of the ambiguous quality of symbols is that they conceal as well as reveal what they signify. Immersion in the waters of baptism and rising up from them in one sense makes present the initiate's burial and resurrection with Christ, and yet in another sense the symbolic action points beyond itself to a deeper reality. This capacity of symbols both to reveal and yet point beyond themselves allows them to express what is beyond words.

The symbolic expressions which are part of the rite of baptism today evolved as early Christian communities reflected on the many dimensions of the salvation in Christ they had experienced in light of the witness of scripture, and sought ways to enable converts to enter into the fullness of that salvation through the rituals of Christian initiation. The natural symbols used in baptism are understood in terms of their role in salvation history; as all symbols, they are multivalent, ambiguous, and lead those experiencing them beyond themselves.

The Symbolic Dimension of the Catechumenate (R.C.I.A.)

In the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972), which is based on the experience of the early church, the catechumens' process of conversion is given rich ritual symbolic expression. While the symbolic dimension of initiation is most readily apparent in the culminating rites of the Easter vigil, it is not confined to those rites. In fact, part of what enables converts to experience the paschal rites as effective symbols of salvation in Christ is the symbolic dimension of the entire initiatory process which has prepared them for those rites, beginning with the rite of acceptance (or enrollment) into the order of catechumens. Throughout the catechumenate and final period of purification and enlightenment the converts are progressively initiated into the symbolic world of scripture and ritual action.

The specific ritual gestures which are part of Christian initiation function symbolically to draw catechumens into salvation in Christ, and thus, into the ongoing story of salvation history. The proclamation of the scriptural account of God's actions to save at the rites of the catechumenate provides the context which gives these gestures meaning. The process of conversion to Christ is full of experience for which converts have no names or categories, and thus is disorienting. The scripture lessons proclaimed at the rites of the catechumenate provide the converts with the framework within which they can organize the unfamiliar experiences of growing in the Christian faith and begin to understand them; the scripture lessons enable the catechumens to begin to perceive themselves and what is happening to them in scriptural terms, and provide them with scriptural language to articulate it. In order to know how to grow in relationship to God, the converts must know what God is like; by proclaiming how God has acted in relationship to others in various situations in the past, the scripture lessons in the R.C.I.A. set forth positive and negative models to guide the converts in learning to be faithful (cf. 1 Cor 10:11).

In addition to introducing the figures of salvation history, whose experience of God will help the catechumens understand their own, the lessons and prayers of the catechumenate provide the converts with the landscape of scriptural imagery and metaphor for conversion within which they can begin to perceive their own experience. The dominant metaphor of the catechumenate is that of a journey between opposite extremes: darkness and light, slavery and freedom, falsehood and truth, death and life; at the end of this journey is a new birth into a kingdom of love celebrated with a feast in a new age. The scripture lessons not only offer the converts this picture of where they are going from and where they are going to, but also abundant imagery depicting them, the church, and Christ, who is the Way on the journey to salvation. Thus, when the catechumens find themselves searching for names and concepts to express the new experience of conversion to Christ, the scripture lessons give them a vocabulary of imagery and metaphor with which they can reflect on it coherently.

rites of the catechumenate, however, goes beyond pointing out moral examples or offering imagery to function on an even deeper symbolic level. In the lessons the church community is proclaiming to the catechumens its memory of its forebears' encounters with God; as the catechumens absorb the church's memory, they come to share its identity. As they are encouraged by preaching to identify with those before them who encountered God, they themselves are drawn into that encounter.

This symbolic dimension of the proclamation of scripture to graft the catechumens into the story of salvation history provides the context for the specific ritual gestures of the rites of the catechumenate, which will now be discussed in sequence. In the rite of acceptance into the order of catechumens, after the catechumens formally ask to enter the church's way of faith in Christ, their foreheads are signed with the cross, marking them as now belonging to Christ and under his protection. Following this, their senses and others parts of their body are also signed, that every means of perception and response may be claimed for Christ and begin to function as it was created and redeemed to function, in a way fitting for those who are to be members of Christ's body, the church. Thus, the candidates' ears are signed that they may be attentive to the word of God and begin to be able to recognize the voice of the Lord in their lives, guiding them into greater faithfulness. Their eyes are signed that they may begin to perceive as Christ perceives (and thus be able to respond as he would respond), that awareness of the all-surprising glory of God may begin to be the central motivation of their lives. Their lips are signed that they may begin to learn to speak as Christ speaks, responding faithfully to the Father's loving call and proclaiming his goodness. They are signed over their hearts "that Christ may dwell there by faith," enabling them to experience the situations of their daily lives as Christ would; their shoulders are signed that they may "bear the gentle yoke of Christ." (In the United States, there is also signing of the hands and feet, that the catechumens may make known the presence of Christ in the world through the work that they do, and that they may walk, conduct their lives, as Christ would.) These signings of the senses are normally performed by the catechumens' sponsors, thus expressing from the beginning that the faith the catechumens are seeking to enter into is not only doctrinal assent but is a way of living as part of a community of Christ's faithful. When the sponsors have completed the signing, the celebrant alone makes the sign of the cross over the catechumens, sealing their entrusting of their entire selves to Christ with the trinitarian blessing. Then, as the catechumens are now taking their first steps toward entering the church, they physically enter the church building; since the church is most fully itself at worship of the triune God, the catechumens are led into the church by being escorted into a liturgy of the word. During the proclamation of the word and the homily, the scriptures which previously have been a closed book to them, are opened to the catechumens and begin to become their story; after the homily, a book of the gospels may be given to them. Thus from the very first rite of the catechumenate, the church community addresses the converts through symbols which are both expressive and evocative of their experience of conversion to Christ.

The symbolic ritual gestures of the other rites of the catechumenate continue to draw the catechumens into the symbiotic relationship between faith-experience and ritual action. The anointings with the oil of catechumens and exorcisms symbolize the converts' need for strength as they struggle to let go of their old way of life and begin to live a life of faith, and the community's care for them. At the rite of election, the catechumens' desire to commit themselves to accepting God's call to them is expressed in the enrollment of their names among those the church has elected for Easter baptism. The three scrutinies, through their scripture lessons, prayers, and exorcisms, both express the catechumens' deep need for purification and enlightenment, and begin to effect it through the power of the proclamation of Christ as living water, as light, and as life. The formal presentation of the creed ritualizes the church community's entrusting the candidates with the infinitely precious gift of faith which they first asked for when they became catechumens; the presentation of the Lord's Prayer (if it is not anticipated, but celebrated after the third scrutiny) symbolizes the community's beginning to share with the elect soon to be joined to it the familiar language used by those adopted as God's children when they come before him as a family. In the preparation rites on the Holy Saturday, the ephphetha rite gives ritual expression to the converts' need for grace in order to hear God's call to them and respond to it to enter into salvation; the recitation of the creed allows them to make this response by professing the faith that saves as their own. Throughout the catechumenate one of the most powerful symbolic gestures is the formal dismissal of the catechumens before the liturgy of the eucharist. Through this dismissal, the church community affirms that it is the celebration of the eucharist which constitutes it as the church; those in whom the gift of faith has not sufficiently matured for them to be considered "faithful" are not yet capable of being part of such a celebration.

By the time the elect arrive at the Easter vigil they have had sufficient experience of the church's use of symbolic expression (including physical posture) to understand the symbolic language of paschal baptism. The service of light sets the scene for the celebration of the sacraments of initiation by proclaiming Christ as light who comes to dispel the darkness of sin as the paschal candle is carried through the darkened church. The Exsultet announces that the entire church community is assembled to celebrate its Passover from slavery to sin to new creation in Christ, the wedding of heaven and earth.

In the scripture lessons of the vigil, the church is proclaiming the many ways God has acted to save, re-presenting them as a point of contact through which all in the assembly can grasp and be grasped by God's saving power in their own lives. All of the scripture lessons of the vigil speak symbolically of baptism. The church's use of the scripture lessons in the rites of the catechumenate, to share its story of its relationship to God with the catechumens in order to draw them into it and make them part of it, thus reaches its climax. The principle that God acts in correspondences, that God's saving actions in the past help explain his saving action now in Christ, seen already in the NT (1 Cor 10:1-13; 1 Pet 3:18-22) and learned in the catechumenate, enables the elect to receive from the readings their final catechesis for baptism.

In hearing the reading from the beginning of Genesis, the elect know that the Spirit of God will soon move over the waters of the font, and they will be a new creation; they recognize Christ as light shining out of darkness. In the Abraham and Isaac reading they ponder God's providing a lamb for sacrifice. The Exodus reading draws their attention back to the paschal candle, reminding them that as the Lord in a pillar of fire led his people through the dark waters of their Exodus, so Christ the light will lead them safely to freedom from the bondage of sin through the waters of baptism. In Isaiah 54 the elect are assured that the flood of baptism will not kill them, that God in fact wants to marry them, make a covenant with them. Isaiah 55 urges the elect to forsake their sin and call on the Lord while he is near, to come to the waters and drink, because his word of forgiveness accomplishes its purpose. The reading from Baruch warns them not to forsake the fountain of wisdom, but to turn to God's commandments of life. Finally, the reading from Ezekiel proclaims God's promise to gather the unfaithful, to sprinkle them with clean water and free them from false worship, to give them a new heart and his own Spirit which will enable them to obey, in a land he has chosen for them. The psalms which respond to these OT lessons resound with rejoicing in God as the one who saves, and are full of such symbolic images as thirsting for the Lord and drinking from the waters of salvation. After the singing of the Gloria, in celebration of God's fidelity to his promise to save so abundantly proclaimed, the reading of Romans 6 depicts baptism as death to sin, burial into Christ's death and resurrection into life with God; Matthew 28 evokes the source of that life, Christ's own resurrection. After the homily the liturgy of baptism takes place.

By beginning the blessing of the water with the litany of the saints, the local church bears witness that it is only part of a much broader community, and that they are helped by the prayers of those who have gone before in bringing the elect to new birth in Christ; the elect are reminded that they are being baptized into Jesus Christ, risen and living in his people, not into an abstract opinion. The blessing of the water itself draws on the imagery and accounts of God's saving through water already proclaimed at the vigil or in the rites of the catechumenate; the elect thus approach the waters of the font seeing them as the waters of creation over which the Spirit breathed, the flood waters which washed away sin, the Exodus waters through which freedom came, the Jordan waters where Christ was anointed by the Spirit, the waters flowing from the side of Christ on the cross. During the blessing the paschal candle is plunged into the font, symbolizing Christ the light giving life to the church, which is brought to birth in baptism.

The elect are then asked to make explicit their desire to reject Satan and sin, to make faith in Christ the determining principle of their lives, and to give their assent to that faith as proclaimed by the church; the candidates are then immersed (or have water poured over their heads) three times with the invocation of the Trinity. While the candidates are baptized their godparents touch them, symbolizing the church community's responsibility and support. (If baptism is not followed by confirmation, an anointing with chrism follows, symbolizing the baptized's new union with Christ who is priest, prophet and king.) The clothing with a baptismal garment which follows gives tangible form to the neophytes' new identity as a new creation, and to the ethical responsibility which that entails: the baptized have been clothed in Christ and must keep themselves from the stains of sin. Similarly, in the presentation of a lighted candle, the godparents light a candle from the paschal candle which has symbolized Christ throughout the vigil and give it to the newly baptized; the neophytes are exhorted to walk always by the Christ-light the church has shared with them, and keep the flame of faith burning in their hearts. The clothing and presentation of the candle understood together evoke the parable of the wedding feast (Mt 22:1-14) and of the wise and foolish virgins (Mt 25:1-13), and thus the heavenly marriage into which the neophytes have been drawn.

Then, as the waters of baptism made palpable for the baptized the drowning of their sin, their washing and rebirth, their anointing at confirmation concretizes for them the seal of the Spirit with which the Anointed One anoints his people. The expectation of the R.C.I.A. that the sacraments of initiation normally will be celebrated together at the Easter vigil is itself a powerful symbol of the unity of the paschal mystery and of the unity of baptism, confirmation, and eucharist: eucharist is the way baptism and confirmation are lived out in time. The symbolic use of scripture and ritual action at the Easter vigil evokes and effectively articulates the experience of salvation through water, anointing with the Spirit, feasting at the eschatological banquet. The cumulative effect is to make clear that what is happening to the candidates is more than changing opinions on matters of doctrine or deciding to be better behaved; it is about joining a new world.

Catechesis of Baptismal Symbols

The symbols in baptism developed in the context of the initiation of adults, where they helped give expression to the multifaceted work of grace in conversion: converts were hearing God's word of grace and making a free response of commitment, being united with Christ, dying and rising with him and so receiving salvation, being cleansed and forgiven from sin, being reborn as a new creation, becoming members of his body, the church. The symbols in the baptismal rite functioned both to provide means through which converts could experience a tangible connection to workings of grace which were ultimately beyond words, and to provide a variety of ritual actions to articulate the many facets of that grace. In the 4th century (Cyril of Jerusalem and Ambrose of Milan) formal instruction on the paschal rites of initiation was given only after the neophytes had experienced them during the week after Easter. Although today sacramental instruction normally precedes baptism, there remains a need for catechesis to ensure that converts appreciate the symbolic richness of the sacramental rites of initiation and can experience them as effective signs. A study of 4th century explanations of the rites of initiation can provide useful principles for contemporary catechesis. In composing these explanations, Cyril and Ambrose combined the use of scripture with natural and cultural symbols in the way they considered most helpful to the particular group of persons they were addressing at that time. These explanations enabled the converts to organize the complex of sensual, emotional and spiritual experiences of the rites of initiation and to appropriate the grace given through these rites; by associating specific ritual actions with specific aspects of the working of grace, they helped converts to remember the many different facets of God's gift of salvation to them, and thus to be able to continue to respond to them.

In developing contemporary catechesis on the symbols in the rites of initiation, several things should be kept in mind. First, part of what the rites of initiation initiate converts into is learning to perceive reality through the lens of the scriptural symbolic world and to relate to God through ritual symbols. Since the Christian life into which converts are initiated is in fact a life of ongoing conversion which is appropriated through the same symbolic language of conversion learned in the catechumenate, it is essential that catechumens become fluent and unselfconscious in ritual symbolic expression. Similarly, it is crucial to provide converts with the vocabulary of scriptural imagery and type which gives the rites their richness of meaning. The clothing with the baptismal garment and presentation of a lighted candle, for example, which 4th century preachers used powerfully as basis for reflection on baptism as marriage to God or eucharist as anticipation of the eschatological wedding feast, lose their nuptial resonance if neophytes do not recognize the parables on which the accompanying prayers are based. Because the prayers of the rites are so redolent of such scriptural symbolism, especially the prayers of the scrutinies and the vigil, it could be helpful to encourage the candidates to meditate on these prayers and to reflect on what they are actually petitioning God for through them. Finally, in preparing catechesis on the symbols in baptism for those participating in the celebration of the rite of infant baptism, it should be remembered that these symbols evolved in the context of adult conversion and initiation. While the grace given in the sacrament is the same, the infant's profession of faith in the saving word of the gospel and desire for a life of conversion to Christ lie ahead, and those who bring the child for baptism thus take on a responsibility that the child hear that word and be raised to desire that life; the explanation of the symbolism of the rites should take this into account.

In sum, since the experience of conversion to Christ entails becoming a new creation, joining a new world unlike anything converts can imagine, there is a need for a means to organize and articulate this experience which goes beyond ordinary language. The biblical and ritual symbols of baptism express the richness and complexity of Christian conversion and provide a means through which converts can enter into it more deeply.

BAPTISM, THEOLOGY OF

1. Initiation into the Church

The most obvious, and the most fundamental, thing to say about baptism is that it is a rite by which we become members of the church (L.G., 11). Since Vatican II it has become usual to speak of baptism in this sense as a sacrament of initiation. Baptism, however, is not the only rite of initiation: the R.C.I.A. classes baptism with confirmation and first communion as the three "sacraments of Christian initiation" (General Introduction, 1; cf. S.C., 71, P.O., 5, A.G., 36). These three sacraments are so closely linked that it is difficult to distinguish precisely between the effects of each; indeed, when they are celebrated at the same time at the baptism of adults, they form a single action, so that it is pointless to attempt exact distinctions. Consequently, at least some of the effects of baptism which we examine in this article could be attributed in part to the other two sacraments of initiation.

The sacraments of initiation are not the only sacraments which have an ecclesial dimension. The Vatican II understanding of the church as itself a sacrament (L.G., 1, 9) implies that each of the sacraments is a particular realization of the church's general sacramental reality (L.G., 11). Moreover each of the seven sacraments in its particular way relates the recipient to the church in a new or more profound manner. Thus ordination and marriage establish the Christian in a new position in the church with new responsibilities as an ordained minister or as husband or wife; reconciliation brings back into full fellowship sinners who have estranged themselves from the church. This ecclesial effect which each sacrament brings about is commonly known as the res et sacramentum: as the effect of the sacrament it is a "reality" (res), but in its turn it is the sign and cause (sacramentum) of a further effect, namely the grace of the Holy Spirit working in the individual Christian within the church. Baptism, as the first of the sacraments by which we are initiated into the church, and the gate which gives access to the church's spiritual resources, clearly exemplifies this ecclesial understanding of the sacraments.

Another way of expressing this truth is to speak of the character conferred by baptism. Baptism, like confirmation and holy orders, is traditionally said to imprint a character, or "spiritual mark" on the soul. St. Thomas explained the character as a participation in the high priesthood of Christ (S. Th., 3.63.3). Some modern theologians (e.g. E. Schillebeeckx, O.P., Christ the Sacrament, Sheed and Ward, London, Melbourne and New York, 1963, p. 197) identify the character conferred by each of these three sacraments with their ecclesial effect or res et sacra- mentum: the character is the permanent ecclesial effect of those sacraments which are unrepeatable. Thus the character imparted by baptism is membership in the church. We cannot become a member of the church more than once. "It is impossible to restore again to repentance those who have once been enlightened [i.e. baptized]" (Heb 6:4). Even the baptized sinner who has cut himself off from the fellowship of the church by his sins, and extinguished in himself the life of grace, does not lose the baptismal character so that he ceases to be a member of the church; he needs, not rebaptism for re-entry into membership, but the sacrament of reconciliation. The weeds remain among the good crops until the definitive separation at the final harvest (Mt 13:24-30).

St. Thomas' understanding of the sacramental character as a participation in Christ's priesthood fits in with the NT representation of the church as a 'royal priesthood' (1 Pet 2:9; cf. 2:5; Rev 1:6; Exod 19:6). Baptism is therefore the sacrament by which each Christian enters into this sacerdotal state. This priestly language used to describe the Christian calling can be interpreted at one level in liturgical terms, as a right and duty to participate actively in the church's public worship (S.C., 14). But this liturgical worship should be the expression of a deeper reality. The 'spiritual sacrifices' which are mentioned in this context (1 Pet 2:5) seem to consist of the glory which is offered to God by the witness of lives dedicated to the performance of his will and the service of one's neighbor (L.G., 10; Heb 13:15-16; Rom 12:1-2). 1 Peter's words on the royal priesthood are written in the context of baptism, and are probably intended to indicate the responsibility for Christian living undertaken by the baptized.

There are occasional indications in the NT and the Fathers that baptism was seen into the New Covenant. St. Paul in one passage compares baptism to the OT sign of the Covenant, circumcision (Col 2:11-12). The word "seal" (sphragis) which the Fathers often apply to baptism, sometimes at least implies a reference to circumcision (e.g., Cyril of Jerusalem, Myst. Cat., 5.6).

Since baptism is a rite of entry into the church, it is appropriate that the modern R.C.I.A. should stress the role of the community in the process of initiation (nn. 4, 9, etc.; Vatican II, A.G., 14), and in particular the duties of catechists, sponsors and godparents (R.C.I.A., nn. 10, 11, 16, etc.). Before the candidate's name is accepted for baptism, the whole community is required to "arrive at a judgment about the catechumens' state of formation and progress" (n. 121). It is a pity that the modern rite does not make so much as the Fathers did of the greeting of the newly baptized by the congregation (e.g., Chrysostom, Baptismal Homily, Wenger 2.27, Harkins p. 53).

This understanding of baptism as a process of entry into the Christian community accords well with modern anthropological investigations of the "rites of passage" by which members of a society acquire a new status within the group (e.g., A. Van Gennep).

2. Incorporation into Christ

The church into which we enter through baptism is not merely a society of human beings but the body of Christ. "By one Spirit we were all baptized into one body" (1 Cor 12:13). Being "baptized into Christ" we "put on Christ" (Gal 3:27). Specifically the baptized are incorporated into the risen Christ: we are baptized "into his death . . . so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life" (Rom 6:3-4). Elsewhere St. Paul suggests that the risen life of the baptized begins here below: "you were buried with him in baptism, in which you were also with him through faith in the working of God" (Col 2:12-13). But in Romans the author indicates that the resurrection of the baptized includes future resurrection after death: "if we have died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him" (Rom 6:8).

From NT times the Christian's baptism has sometimes been seen not only as incorporation into the crucified and risen Christ, but as a participation in his baptism at the hands of John the Baptist. St. Luke seems to be making this point when he structures his second book, Acts, as an echo of his gospel: the baptism of Jesus, at which the Father proclaims him as his Son, the anointed Messiah-king (Lk 3:21-22), is matched in Acts by the Pentecostal descent of the Spirit and the baptism of the first converts. As Jesus' mission in the power of the Spirit begins with his baptism, so the life in Christ of the whole church and of each Christian begins with their baptism: "Repent, and be baptized . . . and you shall receive the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:38). The baptismal font is linked in the liturgy with the Jordan (R.C.I.A., 222; Cyril of Jerusalem, Myst. Cat. 3.1). The Christian's entry into the royal priesthood, of which we have written above, is thus a participation in Jesus' messianic anointing; that the baptized become "Christs," i.e., anointed ones, is perhaps the earliest interpretation of the anointing which regularly accompanies baptism (cf. Cyril of Jerusalem, Myst. Cat. 3.1; Didascalia, chap. 16). As Jesus' baptism laid upon him the duty to bear his cross (Lk 12:50; cf. Mk 10:38), so the baptism of Christians entails the obligation to follow Jesus in bearing their cross after him.

Again, just as Jesus, being baptized, heard the Father's voice proclaiming him to be Son, while the Holy Spirit descended on him, so the Christian's incorporation into Christ at baptism implies adoption into the life of the Trinity. The one baptism creating one body is inextricably linked with the one Spirit, one Lord, and one Father (Eph 4:4-6). We are baptized "into" the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Mt 28:19). To become one with the Son is to receive the Spirit of adoption and to become sons and daughters of the heavenly Father. Consequently the doctrine that confirmation is a sacrament which confers the Holy Spirit must not be interpreted in such a way as to minimize the fact that the Holy Spirit is already conferred on the baptized.

This new life of the Spirit which the baptized enter implies such a radical break with the past that it can be called a new birth, "the washing of regeneration and renewal in the Holy Spirit" (Tit 3:5; cf. Jn 3:5). Rebirth is a recurrent theme in 1 Peter, which is, as we have seen, a writing which focuses on baptism (1:3, 23; 2:2). In the early church the newly baptized, with reference to their second birth, were described as "infants," whatever their age; in some places they were given at the baptismal Mass, besides the normal eucharistic chalice, a cup containing the baby-food of milk and honey (Apost. Trad., Botte n. 21). The life-giving properties of water, especially the flowing water that was originally prescribed (Did. 7), was a fitting symbol for the new life conferred at baptism (cf. Ezekiel 47; Rev 22:1-2). In the first book of the Bible the history of the world begins with God's creative Spirit or wind moving over the waters (Gen 1:2). Jesus is the source of "living water" (Jn 4:10; cf. 7:37). Favorite motifs in early sacred art are the deer drinking from a pool (cf. Ps 42:1: "As a hart longs for flowing streams . . ."), and birds drinking from a basin.

3. Conversion and Forgiveness

However, before the water of baptism can be life-giving it needs to be purifying. Before "sanctifying" his bride the church, the Bridegroom "cleansed her by the washing of water with the word" (Eph 5:26). "You were washed, you were sanetified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God" (1 Cor 6:11). The Council of Florence in 1439 taught that the effect of baptism is "the remission of all original and actual fault, and also of all punishment which is owing in proportion to that fault" (D.S., 1316; cf. the Council of Trent, D.S., 1672; R.C.I.A., General Introduction, 5).

Baptism is not only the means by which past sins are forgiven: it also involves conversion, which is a determination to live a new, sinless life in the future. The first converts at Pentecost are told to "repent and be baptized" (Acts 2:38). We are crucified with Christ in baptism so that "we might no longer be enslaved to sin" (Rom 6:6; cf. 6:11-14). Consequently the catechumenate leading up to baptism is regarded as a process of conversion: before candidates are admitted to the catechumenate they are expected to have experienced an "initial conversion" (R.C.I.A., 6, 42); before they are allowed to enroll for baptism they "are expected to have undergone a conversion in mind and in action" (R.C.I.A., 120). The three scrutinies celebrated during the "Period of Enlightenment" are intended as "rites for self-searching and repentance" which "complete the conversion of the elect" (R.C.I.A., 141). The succession of exorcisms which punctuates the process of initiation contributes to the deepening of conversion. Finally shortly before baptism the candidates express their new resolve in the rite of the renunciation of sin and of its personification in Satan. In the early church this ceremony formed part of a dramatic declaration of a change of allegiance: the renunciation (apotaxis) was followed by an act of adhesion (suntaxis) to Christ, during which in renouncing the devil the candidates faced west, the seat of darkness, and then turned eastward towards the sunrise to express their new loyalty to Christ (e.g. Cyril of Jerusalem, Myst.

Cat. 1.8-9). The modern rite, though pairing a profession of faith with the renunciation, does not bring out the change of allegiance so clearly (R.C.I.A., 224-5).

4. The Sacrament of Faith

From the NT to the modern R.C.I.A., baptism is so closely linked with faith that the two seem sometimes almost synonymous. St. Paul couples the statement, "In Jesus Christ you are all sons of God, through faith," with a second statement, "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Gal 3:27). In a passage much quoted in church documents, the long ending of Mark makes belief and baptism the joint conditions for salvation (Mk 16:16). The connection which baptism has with faith was expressed by its name 'enlightenment' (Heb 6:4; Justin, 1 Apol. 64); for the same reason the baptized have been known as the "faithful". St. Augustine called baptism "the sacrament of faith" and derived from this definition the conclusion that babies obtain faith from baptism, since a sacrament resembles the reality of which it is a sign (Ep. 98.9, C.S.E.L., 34.531; the passage is cited in the Council of Trent's Decree on Justification, D.S., 1529). The R.C.I.A., (General Introduction, 3) echoes St. Augustine's phrase.

Faith is both a prerequisite and an effect of baptism. In the NT baptism follows after faith in the proclaimed word (e.g., Acts 2). But though faith is a prerequisite for baptism, the process of initiation is also a means by which the candidate comes to faith. According to Vatican II, faith is "received in baptism" (G.E., 3). The second question asked of the candidates seeking admission into the catechumenate is: "What do you ask of God's Church?" to which the answer is: "Faith" (R.C.I.A., 50); but before the request can be granted they must show evidence of a "first faith" conceived during the pre-catechumenate (R.C.I.A., 42); to be enrolled for baptism they must have "progressed in faith" (R.C.I.A., 6). The catechumenate is therefore the means by which the candidates grow in faith; but it is also true that faith is one of the supernatural gifts infused into the soul through the instrumentality of baptism at the moment of justification (Trent, Decree on Justification, D.S., 1529-30). The resolution of this apparent paradox is that the faith infused at that moment is an aspect of the habitual or sanctifying grace that becomes a permanent disposition given by God when a convert is justified; the faith that is conceived before justification, though a supernatural gift, is a preliminary disposition which becomes a permanent principle of knowledge and choice only when the believer is baptized.

The close association between baptism and faith is shown by the prominence of credal professions in the rite of initiation. In many baptismal rites in the early church the formula was not "I baptize you in the name of the Father. . . .," but a trinitarian profession of faith in question and answer form. At an earlier stage in the rites the candidates was taught the words and the meaning of the creed in two ceremonies called the "Presentation" and the "Recitation of the Creed"; they have been reintroduced in the modern R.C.I.A.

Two problems emerge from this understanding of baptism as the sacrament of faith. The first concerns the sense in which faith can be said to be a precondition for baptism in the case of babies, or alternatively how baptism can be the cause of justification for babies if they are incapable of faith. This question is investigated in another article. Briefly, as the revised rite of infant baptism makes clear, it is the faith of the church, professed and offered, that provides the primary warrant for baptism of the child.

The second question concerns the salvation of those who have not been baptized. As we have seen, the NT regards baptism as a requisite for salvation, a doctrine reaffirmed by the Council of Trent (D.S., 1524, 1618, 1672). Does this mean that all the unbaptized are excluded from salvation? Trent's answer is that those who do not actually receive the sacrament can be saved by the "desire" (voluntum) of baptism (D.S., 1524). Since early times there has also existed the belief that an unbaptized martyr is saved by "baptism of blood". K. Rahner has developed the doctrine of baptism of desire into the theory of "anonymous Christians", who are saved by an implicit faith in Christ which is unrecognized to themselves. This theory can claim support from the Vatican II decree on the church's mission, which speaks of truth and grace being found among the unbaptized "as a sort of secret presence of God" (A.G., 9).

5. The Missionary Duty of the Baptized

We have seen how the baptized are pledged to exercise their royal priesthood by living lives that give glory to God. One aspect of such Christian lives is the witness they give to Christ. "All Christians are bound to show forth, by the example of their lives and by the witness of their speech, that new man which they put on at baptism, and that power of the Holy Spirit by whom they were strengthened at confirmation" (A.G., 11; cf. 36; L.G., 3; A.A., 3). The Faith and Order document (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry) speaks in this connection of baptism as the "sign of the kingdom" (Baptism 7). This is true not only in the sense of Christ's statement that only the baptized can enter the Kingdom of God, conceived apparently as a synonym for eternal life (Jn 3:5), but also in the sense that the baptized have the responsibility of working for the establishment of God's Kingdom on earth.

However, this duty incumbent on all the baptized to promote the Kingdom is not only to be fulfilled in the exercise of apostolate in the strict sense of making Christ known. It includes the call to perfect "the work of justice under the inspiration of charity" (G.S., 72). Vatican II's teaching on the lay vocation derives from this understanding of the responsibilities which follow upon baptism: "The laity, by their very vocation, seek the Kingdom of God by engaging in temporal affairs and by ordering them according to the plan of God" (L.G., 31).

6. Instituted by Christ

The NT clearly attributes the institution of the sacrament to Jesus Christ himself. Even though the fourth gospel gives an inconsistent answer to the question whether Jesus himself baptized during his ministry (Jn 3:22; 4:2), it shows him teaching the necessity of baptism in his dialogue with Nicodemus (Jn 3:5), while Matthew attributes a command to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them" to the risen Lord (Mt 28:19; cf. Mk 16:16). Even though many modern critics question whether these passages give grounds for certainty that Jesus explicitly instituted the sacrament in the course of his life and resurrection appearances, there seems to be no doubt that the early church believed that its practice of baptism was due to the authority of the Lord himself (see W.F. Flemington, The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism, S.P.C.K., London, 1948, pp. 115-119).

There were perhaps two decisive considerations which lay behind the adoption of baptism as a Christian rite of initiation. The first was Jesus' own baptism, with its many layers of meaning. His baptism showed his will to be identified with the sinful people he came to serve; it was the moment when he was named Son of God and received his mission as Messiah, for which he was strengthened by the power of the Holy Spirit. Christians not only accepted baptism in order to follow the Lord's example by acknowledging their need of purification from their sins; their baptism into Christ (Gal 3:27) was sometimes seen as linked specifically with his baptism (Didascalia, chap. 9). The need to express in ritual form this sharing by the baptized in Jesus' messianic "anointing" may explain why anointing came to be attached to Christian baptism (Winkler). A second factor perhaps was the belief that the New Covenant required a rite of entry which would correspond to circumcision and its accompaniment of proselyte baptism (Flemington, pp. 3-11; S. Brock, "The Transition to a Post-baptismal Anointing in the Antiochene Rite", in The Sacrifice of Praise, C.L.V. Edizioni Liturgiche, Rome, 1981, pp. 215-225).

7. Baptism and Confirmation

There is no need for us to deal explicitly with the sacrament of confirmation, for it forms the subject of several other articles. What is necessary for us here is to discuss briefly the relationship between that sacrament and baptism, since it is a question which has emerged at several points in the present article.

The revised rite of confirmation promulgated in 1971 states that the effect of the sacrament is the gift of the Holy Spirit which "conforms believers more fully to Christ and strengthens them so that they may bear witness to Christ for the building up of his Body in faith and love" (2). Yet, as we have seen, baptism already confers the Holy Spirit, and calls the new Christian to be a witness to Christ. This apparent duplication poses no problem if, as happens when adults are baptized, confirmation is conferred immediately after baptism, as then the two sacraments can be seen as two representations of different aspects of a single sacramental effect. The problem arises when confirmation is separated from baptism, and seems to confer nothing which the earlier sacrament has not already conferred.

The solution of Vatican II is that confirmation im arts in a special way what has already been imparted in baptism. "Bound more intimately to the church by the sacrament of confirmation, they are endowed by the Holy Spirit with special strength. Hence they are more strictly obliged to spread and defend the faith ... " (L.G., 11, my emphasis). However, the precise nature of this "special" effect which confirmation adds to baptism the Vatican II documents do not explain.

The ecclesial effect of the sacraments (res et sacramentum) discussed above indicates a possible solution to the problem. Confirmation establishes the Christian in a new calling within the church: whereas all have a duty to be witnesses to Christ, the confirmed reaffirm their acceptance of this duty on behalf of the whole church, as a result of which the Holy Spirit, who already dwells within them since baptism as a principle of their Christian lives, empowers them for their new responsibilities. A parallel is provided by some of the other sacraments, in which an obligation already incumbent on the baptized is now confirmed in a new way for the sake of the whole church. Thus all Christians have the obligation to worship; but the sacrament of holy orders confers on the ordained a special responsibility for the worship of the whole community, together with the grace which is required for the fulfilment of this duty. Again, all Christians have the duty to bear sickness in a Christlike way; but the sacrament of anointing conveys a special obligation to bear the limitations of sickness in union with the crucified Christ on behalf of the church, and confers the strength of the Holy Spirit which this vocation requires.

8. Ecumenical Consequences

The Catholic church recognizes the validity of baptism celebrated in other churches, provided it is "properly" administered, i.e., with cleansing with water and invocation of the trinitarian name

(Council of Florence, D.S., 1314; R.C. I.A., General Introduction, 5). This, together with the faith in Christ of which baptism is the sacrament, is the basis of the deep, though imperfect, communion which exists between the Catholic and other churches. (As even a lay person can be an extraordinary minister of the sacrament, acceptance of the validity of a church's baptism does not necessarily imply recognition of its orders.) Consequently the churches which celebrate these baptisms are said to possess "elements of sanctification and truth" (L.G., 8), and to be in "a certain, though imperfect, communion with the Catholic Church" (U.R., 3).

However, baptism, which together with faith is the basis of the imperfect communion which exists between separated Christian churches, is also sadly a source and sign of their divisions. Baptism is traditionally seen as incorporation, not only into the body of Christ, but also into a particular Christian church, to the exclusion of membership of other churches. Ecumenists, however, sometimes question this principle, and seek a theological justification for allowing the children of an "inter-church" marriage (i.e., one in which the parents are committed members of different churches) to be enrolled at baptism into both of their parents' churches. Baptism, it is said, is basically not incorporation into a particular Christian denomination, but into Christ's own church, although one cannot enter Christ's church in the abstract, but always as it exists in the form of a particular ecclesial body. It is accordingly suggested that the children of an inter-church family can be baptized into Christ's one church as it exists in each of the churches to which the parents belong. Church membership need not, in this view, be restricted to one particular ecclesial body. This is, however, a field of speculation which urgently requires deeper exploration.

9. The Church's Affirmation of Faith

It is not until Vatican II that the church's affirmations of faith concerning baptism represent the full richness of the subject. In the early centuries they deal with such contested issues as the rebaptism of heretics (Pope Stephen I, A.D. 254, D.S., 110) and the baptism of babies for the remission of original sin (Council of Carthage, A.D. 418, D.S., 223). In the Middle Ages the conciliar statements concerning baptism were mostly concerned with its right administration and with the remission of sins it confers (Lateran IV, D.S., 802; Florence, D.S., 1314-6), though the latter council also contains the essential teaching that baptism is the "gateway of the spiritual life," by which we become "members of Christ and of the body of the Church" (D.S., 1314). The Council of Trent, facing the challenge of the Reformation, affirms the role of baptism in the process of justification (D.S., 1526, 1529), and condemns a number of errors (D.S., 1614-27). The new insights on baptism are to be found throughout the Vatican II documents, especially the decrees on the church, the liturgy, ecumenism, and the church's mission; and its fullest form in the reformed liturgical texts for the initiation of adults and the baptism of children, especially in their introductory sections.

BAPTISM, TIMES FOR

Particular times for baptism emerged as early as the late 2nd or early 3rd centuries. The writings of Tertullian express a preference for Easter or the Easter season, but go on to say that "every day is the Lord's; every moment is apt for baptism" (De Baptismo, c. 19). The classic outline of initiation found in Hippolytus assumes that baptism is at Easter (Apost. Trad., XX-XXI). In Rome, Easter remained the usual occasion for baptism until the 12th century, but in other places baptism began to be celebrated more frequently by the 6th century. The high infant mortality rate together with the doctrine of original sin encouraged baptism shortly after birth rather than waiting for an annual celebration of initiation. As the catechumenate fell into disuse, the connection between Easter and baptism was also broken in the case of adults.

The current revised rites of initiation reestablish the ancient emphasis on particular times for baptism. In several places, the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults speaks of the Easter vigil as "the proper time for the sacraments of initiation" (R.C.I.A., 8, 17, 23, 26, 207). Only for serious pastoral needs may a day other than Easter be chosen, and then the preference is given to days within the Easter octave or the Easter season (R.C.I.A., 23, 26). The emphasis on Easter is explained by the paschal character of baptism "since the initiation of Christians is the first sacramental sharing in Christ's dying and rising" (R.C.I.A., 8).

The Rite of Baptism for Children (R.B.C.) presents several factors to determine the time for baptism. The first requires baptism within the first weeks after birth so that the child "may not be deprived of the benefit of the sacrament" (R.B.C., 8). A longer interval between birth and baptism may be allowed when the mother is not healthy enough to be present at the baptism, or when the parents are not prepared to profess the faith or to undertake the Christian formation of their children. In danger of death, a child is baptized immediately.

The second factor concerns the sacrament's paschal character. Although the urgency to baptize infants does not permit the postponement of baptism beyond a few weeks to an annual celebration at Easter, there is a preference for celebrating the sacrament "during the Easter vigil or on Sunday, when the church commemorates the Lord's resurrection" (R.B.C., 9). Third, since the children are baptized in the faith of the church, preference is given to communal celebrations "for all the recently born children, and in the presence of the faithful" (R.B.C., 32). Baptism may be celebrated during Mass on Sunday to permit community participation and to manifest the relationship between baptism and eucharist. Finally, baptism "should not be celebrated more than once on the same day in the same church" (Christian Initiation: General Introduction, 27).

Pastoral practice in the years since the promulgation of R.C.I.A. has moved closer and closer to the rite's clear emphasis on Easter vigil as the normative time for adult baptism. The implicit tension among the variety of factors to determine the time for the baptism of children has, on the other hand, produced a wide array of pastoral practice. A developing practice of celebrating the baptism of children several times a year on occasions of paschal significance (e.g., Easter, Pentecost, Baptism of the Lord, the parish's patronal feast) offers an opportunity to respect the paschal and ecclesial character without unduly delaying baptism.

BAPTISMAL FORMULAE IN EAST AND WEST

Baptismal formulae are the words which characteristically accompany the administration of water during Christian baptism. These words give definition to the symbolic act of administering the water and call on the power of God as named in the formula. They name the God with whom the baptizing community is in relationship and summarize the Christian faith as understood by that community.

Theology and Practice

Most Western churches use the formula, "Name, I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," whereas most Eastern churches use the formula, "The Servant of God, Name, is baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." These two formulae are called "trinitarian baptismal formulae" because they symbolize and summarize Christian belief in the Trinity. The 1982 Baptism, Eucharist, Ministry document of the World Council of Churches (which has over three hundred member churches) states that "baptism is administered with water in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit" (section on baptism, par. 17). Most of the 143 churches responding to the document either did not question this statement or explicitly affirmed that it represents their practice.

The words "The Servant of God, Name, is baptized" (used by the Orthodox churches) are theologically significant because they point to the triune God, and not priest or minister, as the main actor in baptism. "I baptize you," on the other hand, points to the human agency of the officiant. It does not explicitly state that the sacrament is effective through God's power; this explicit statement is important to Orthodox believers. The Eastern formula is called "passive" and the Western "active" because of the verb used.

At the beginning of these formulae, the name of the person being baptized is spoken. Not the family name, but only the Christian or given name of the person being baptized, is used, since this name represents a new identity in Christ beyond a person's identity given by natural birth and cultural context.

Another baptismal formula which has been used occasionally up to the present is "I baptize you in the name of Jesus" or "I baptize you in the name of Christ." This alternative was accepted by the Scholastics and by other Roman Catholic theologians and church leaders up until the Council of Trent, so long as the administrant was not intending to deny trinitarian theology.

Sometimes groups augment the trinitarian baptismal formula with a statement which more specifically defines their baptismal faith and practice. Thus, U.S. Presbyterians add "child of the covenant," to emphasize their belief that baptized children are part of the covenant community of faith. Those who baptize only those who confess Christian faith for themselves may indicate as part of the formula that the person being baptized has professed Christian faith. Riverside Church in New York City has added "one God, Mother of us all" at the end of the formula to avoid naming God only in masculine terms.

History

There may have been considerable variation of the words spoken during the administration of water in baptism in the East until the 4th century and the West until the 8th century.

In the NT are found three groups of phrases associated with baptism which may or may not have been spoken during baptismal liturgies. In one group of passages, baptism is said to be done in the name of Jesus Christ or the Lord Jesus. In Acts, baptisms are administered "in the name of Jesus Christ" (2:38; 10:48) or "into the name of the Lord Jesus" (8:16; 19:5). In 1 Cor 6:11, Paul says that his readers were baptized ("washed . . . sanctified . . . justified") "in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God." The Pauline and deutero-Pauline literature includes a second group of passages in which persons are said to be baptized "in Christ" or "into Christ," without including the words "in the name of" (Gal 3:27 and Rom 6:3; 1 Cor 12:13 and Col 3:10, 11 are related passages). The third phrase is found in Mt 28:19, in which Jesus says, "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." According to Edward Schweizer and a number of other biblical scholars, it is unlikely that the baptismal formula from Mt 28:19 represents the exact words of Jesus (Schweizer, 530). Without scholarly consensus on the dating of Matthew or Acts, and without certainty that the phrases used by Paul were actually spoken in baptismal liturgies, it would be risky to claim that any of these phrasings was the first to be used in Christian baptisms.

Church documents of the 2nd through the 4th centuries also vary as to the baptismal words which they quote or to which they allude. The Didache speaks both of baptizing "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" and of baptizing "in the name of the Lord" (Whitaker, Documents, 1). Justin Martyr speaks of baptizing "in the name of the Father and Lord God of all things, and of our Savior Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit" (Whitaker, Documents, 2). However, authors as late as Ambrose could report that baptism was done "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," while not reporting use of those words during the administration of water in baptism. Instead, candidates were asked three questions about their belief in God, and after responding in the affirmative each time, they were immersed in the water.

The earliest extant full model for a baptismal liturgy is found in Apostolic Tradition, usually dated around A.D. 215. The questions in this document are:

Dost thou believe in God the Father almighty?

Dost thou believe in Christ Jesus, the Son of God,

Who was born of Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary,

Who was crucified in the days of Pontius Pilate,

And died,

And rose the third day living from the dead

And ascended into the heavens,

And sat down at the right hand of the Father,

And will come to judge the living and the dead?

Dost thou believe in the Holy Spirit in the Holy Church,

And the resurrection of the flesh?

(Whitaker, Documents, 5-6, rubrics and responses omitted)

As candidates answered, "I believe," to each question, they were immersed in the water.

Baptismal liturgies from the 2nd through the 8th centuries often followed this pattern of asking three questions, one about each person of the Trinity, rather than using a declarative formula baptizing persons "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." The exact phrasing of the questions varied considerably.

The Eastern churches apparently preceded churches of the West in arriving at characteristic use of the declarative trinitarian baptismal formula. A Syrian document, The Acts of Xanthippe and Polyxena, dated around A.D. 250, tell a story of Paul baptizing and speaking the declarative trinitarian formula (Whitaker, Documents, 20); but some later Syrian documents, including Cyril's Mystagogical Catecheses, report a questioning rather than a declarative formula. In the 4th-century baptismal catecheses of Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia, it is specified that the words "[Name] is baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" are spoken during the administration of water in baptism. These writings provide the earliest documentation of the "passive" baptismal formula. Chrysostom says that this shows the priest "is only the minister of grace and merely offers his hand because he has been ordained to this end by the Spirit. The one fulfilling all things is the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, the undivided Trinity" (Whitaker, Documents, 41). The declarative formula became standard in churches of Asia Minor and Palestine and later of Orthodoxy, without much variation after the 4th century.

Evidence for use of the declarative trinitarian formula is first found in northern Egypt in the 5th century, in Spain in the 5th or 6th century, in Gaul about A.D. 700, and in Rome in the 8th century; documents before that time either report a threefold questioning or are not specific (Whitaker, "History," 1-12). Several reasons have been suggested for the change in usage from asking three questions about candidates' faith in the Trinity to using a declarative trinitarian formula. First, the transition to infant baptism made the interrogatory form less appropriate. Second, the Donatist controversy may have led to greater emphasis on uniform administration of baptism. Third, trinitarian controversies often led to increasing use of the trinitarian formula ("in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit") in worship (Jungmann, 15-32).

By the 9th century, use of the formula "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" was characteristic in the Western church in baptismal liturgies. By the 16th century, other forms were virtually excluded from liturgical practice. Baptism "in the name of Jesus [Christ]" or "the Lord Jesus" re-emerged around the beginning of the 20th century in groups such as Pentecostal Holiness churches who found it appropriate to base their baptismal practice on the accounts in Acts.

Baptismal Formulae and Ecumenical Discussion

Mutual recognition of baptism is a key issue in ecumenical discussions, because anything less implies failure to affirm the Christian identity of other groups. Mutual acceptability of the words spoken during administration of water is important to mutual recognition. Since these words summarize Christian faith as understood by those baptizing, to accept another group's formula is in essence to accept their basic understanding of faith.

Three barriers exist to agreement on baptismal formulae: the difference between the "active" and "passive" forms of the formula; the continued practice by some churches of baptizing "in the name of Jesus"; and the emerging concern in some liberal Protestant groups which affirm trinitarian faith but question the predominantly masculine language of the formula. Some of these questions may be very difficult to resolve, but they are also important, since they involve understandings of Christian unity and faith and of justice among humanity.

BAPTISMAL VOWS, RENEWAL OF

One of the most pressing needs for the church today is to rediscover a spirituality of baptism. This need is all the more imperative in view of the fact that most Christians are baptized in infancy and have no conscious memory of this gateway sacrament to the Christian life. Opportunities need to be provided for Christians to renew their baptismal promises from time to time and to claim for themselves the commitment undertaken for them by their parents and godparents on the day of their baptism.

Communal forms of baptismal renewal are built into the liturgical year, especially during the season of Lent with the restored scrutiny Sundays of the Samaritan woman, the man born blind, and the raising of Lazarus: readings from John's gospel steeped in baptismal imagery which figure so prominently in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. At the Easter vigil, the privileged time for the initiation of adult converts, and on Easter Sunday itself, the entire congregation is invited to renew its baptismal commitment, the fruit of the annual Lenten retreat which began on Ash Wednesday. Sundays, the weekly Easter in the liturgical year and preferred time for the baptism of children, also present an occasion for the renewal of baptism with the rite of blessing and sprinkling with holy water, especially during the Easter season so strongly marked by a baptismal mystagogy.

Communal forms of baptismal renewal which have fallen into disuse are the earlier Sunday vespers on the octave day of Easter with a procession to the baptismal font, a description of which is found in the ancient Ordo XXVIII, and the pascha annotinum, in which during the first thousand years of the church parents and sponsors would bring to church the children baptized the year before to celebrate with gratitude the anniversary of their baptism.

The celebration of other sacraments is also an opportunity for the renewal of baptismal vows. This renewal is part of the rite of confirmation and may be inserted into the ceremony of first communion. For that matter, every eucharist, the one initiation sacrament that may be repeated, is a renewal of baptism. The sacrament of penance may also be seen as a recovery of the grace of baptism and a reintegration into the eucharistic community of the church. Finally, funerals—with the introductory rites involving the Easter candle, sprinkling with holy water, and white pall symbolic of the baptismal garment—celebrate death as a final stage of growth into the paschal mystery of Jesus Christ which began at baptism.

Baptismal reminders preserved in the family are the baptismal garment and baptismal candle, which may be incorporated into a celebration of faith on the anniversary of baptism and at other important occasions. (See, Catholic Household Blessings and Prayers). A praiseworthy custom being rediscovered today is a letter written by the sponsors or the parish community for the child to open later and treasure for a lifetime. Individual forms of recalling baptism in the devotional life of a Christian are the Lord's Prayer and Apostles' Creed, recited at the beginning and end of the day in the tradition of the Eastern and Western churches, and the sign of the cross, particularly when conjoined with holy water.

The ancient format for making and renewing baptismal vows consists of a three-fold renunciation of evil and a three-fold affirmation of the creed framed in a trinitarian perspective. The Episcopal Book of Common Prayer contains an interesting adaptation which expands this credal faith into a commitment to participate in the church's life and mission. The Episcopal, Lutheran, Methodist and Presbyterian churches also include liturgical forms for renewing one's baptismal commitment from time to time as prompted by pastoral need or personal faith.

CHARLES W. GUSMER

BAPTISTRY

The baptistry (also baptistery) was a most important building on the cityscape of the provincial capitals of the old Roman Empire. Both eastern and western cities of paleo-Christianity had initiation rites centered in buildings for baptism.

These early ritual buildings, had of course, antecedents in the pagan cultures wherein they developed. But there is a root in the Bible, too. John baptized in the River Jordan; a summary ritual cleansing of the people of the Old Covenant is what this washing became in the context of what the evangelists tell us Jesus' baptism was about. Jesus' baptism was a bathing in the new life of the Holy Spirit.

There are, thus, within the early Christian community, two strands woven into the fabric of baptismal "sacramentology." The one a cleansing, the other new life in the Holy Spirit. Paul develops, in Romans, a clear sacramental theology which both joins and scrambles these two strands. He correlates this new life in the Spirit with Christian initiation into the salvific blood-letting of Christ when he says that we enter, through baptism, into his death in order that we might rise with him in his resurrection.

The Johannine theology in Revelation further correlates the washing and dying into new life. John says that the elect wear white because they are washed in the blood of the Lamb. The fascinating image of white robes, so frequently used in sacramental rituals, here, in John, takes on a lovely meaning because the color is totally reflective. The ones in white reflect the light of the Lamb in whose presence they are gathered. The baptized in white reflect the Easter light of faith in Christ, crucified and risen, symbolized in the paschal candle, a flickering, fragile faith, dependent on the wiles of the wind.

It is necessary when considering the function of the baptistry to look at all of the legitimate reverberations of rich symbolism which inhabit the rite, whether housed in a separate building or in the sanctuary itself, or in some space between the sacred and profane precincts. Let us consider the symbolisms that exist in the Western church at present because the functions have been divided and separated and the sense of their interrelationship lost in the profusion of disparate symbols represented in multiple holy water fonts, discrete baptistry buildings, and the separation of baptism from the ongoing liturgical worship of the adult community. The compartmentalization of ritual was unfortunately coupled with a scholastic insistence on the purgative nature of baptism. Post-Thomistic philosophy resulted in a rather widespread fear about the need for infant baptism before "limbo" be unleashed as the theoretical place of all joy except the Beatific Vision, a place "invented" for those poor innocents released from life without benefit of the sacramental cleansing from original sin. In Ravenna, Italy, are two baptistries dating from the 6th century. Both the Orthodox and the Arian baptistries are domed octagons with central, walled pools the entering of which initiates the believer into a particular sect of Christianity. Other sacraments took place in other places. The insider/outsider focus, so clear in Ravenna's two baptistries, untouched by the second millennium, is a prototype for many centuries of baptistry building.

The credal repetitions in the rite, in the form of serious questions, historically linked to 3rd-century formulae reiterate the faith of the community into which the initiate is being baptized. There are rights and duties for the new member symbolized in the flickering candle and the white robe, and, by faith, actualized in the pouring of or the entering into the water.

The current state of sacramental theology associates gift in sacrament with ministry to the body. Entering the water blessed by the Holy Spirit fills the neophyte with the intangible, necessary grace which makes it possible to believe the creed, a faith in Christ signified in water, symbolized in the paschal candle. (The little light is easily extinguished and easily relighted by another member of the community. The symbol of the paschal candle thus reinforces the connection of faith and ministry, the white robe reflecting this light of Christ more fully than any other color, symbolizes how the new Christian must reflect Christ's Light to the community.) The blessing with oil asks for all the natural helps that God can give the baptized to fulfill this covenant within the community. So, the baptistry, with water-font symbolizing the primordial water of life, needs to be at the entry to the church but, because it is most appropriately used in the eucharist, especially at Easter, it needs to be accessible to the community at the eucharistic liturgy.

The constantly appropriate symbols of paschal candle and holy oils, find an appropriate home in the vicinity of the water of life, because they can remind all Christians of their rights and duties as they enter the holy place, the church building, which symbolizes the aspirations of the whole church, aspirations to become the Kingdom, the body of Christ, the bride of the Lamb.

BENEDICTINES AND LITURGICAL RENEWAL

Dom Prosper Guéranger (1805-1875) first used the expression "liturgical movement" to describe the revival of liturgical studies and the growing interest in understanding and improving liturgical practice. As a young priest, Guéranger lamented the disunity within and among French dioceses due to the multiplicity of local usages dating from the Enlightenment era. While serving as chaplain to religious from Rome, Guéranger came to know and appreciate what he considered to be the surpassing treasures of the Roman missal and breviary.

Guéranger set out to make his love for the Roman liturgy visible, audible and tangible in a particular setting: the restored St. Peter's Abbey at Solesmes. In 1833, he and several associates began to live a communal life there based on the Rule of St. Benedict. Guéranger explained that he chose the Benedictine way of life precisely because of the importance it placed on the celebration of the divine office in choir, and because of the possibility of undertaking serious study of the liturgy with an eye to its renewal. Guéranger's monastery at Solesmes served as a kind of showcase for the proper celebration of the Mass and divine office, and as a workshop for the pursuit of liturgical scholarship. Monastics and lay persons could "come and see" what revived communal life and communal prayer looked like in a country where they had all but disappeared.

Guéranger's goals regarding the liturgical life may be summarized as: 1) forming monks and other Christians through the liturgy and 2) recovering and authenticating such historical documents as patristic texts, and later, collecting and editing Gregorian chant (an effort that won Pope Pius X's approval). These goals lay behind two of Guéranger's more significant writings, Institutions liturgiques (1840, 1841, 1851) a three-volume history of liturgical tradition from ancient Israel to his own time, and L'Année liturgique (1841-1866) a nine-volume meditative commentary on the texts and prayers of the Mass and divine office for each day of the year. Guéranger's purpose in these volumes was to deepen comprehension of liturgical texts, especially the scriptures, which he saw as the chief requirement for renewed participation. "His teaching upon the Church as the Mystical Body, the centrality of the paschal mystery, the doctrinal character of the liturgy, and his insistence upon the need to study the texts of the liturgy, all these ideas were absolutely original in the 19th century" (Johnson, p. 350). Guéranger can justly be called the herald of the liturgical movement.

Monastic Centers of Renewal

The influence of Guéranger's liturgical theology, scholarship and practice extended far beyond the walls of Solesmes to German abbeys like Beuron, its Belgian foundation of Maredsous, and to French parish churches. Guéranger's legacy of monasteries and parishes transformed into vibrant centers of liturgical energy has been well chronicled by R.W. Franklin in Worship magazine (see the bibliography). Clearly the chief means to renewal of community life, then as now, was liturgical formation and active participation in the Mass and divine office on the part of all. While monks became the premier promoters of the 19th-century liturgical movement, they understood that the liturgy needed the whole people of God to celebrate it, not just clerics and religious. This understanding led Dom Gérard van Caloen of Maredsous to publish his Missel des fidèles (1882), the first complete Latin-French missal to receive episcopal endorsement. The inexpensive review which accompanied it from 1884, Le Messager des fidèles, would serve as the model for popular liturgical pamphlets of subsequent decades.

The Abbey of Beuron, refounded by Maurus and Placidus Wolter in 1863, was to be in many ways a mirror of Solesmes. Maurus, its first abbot, had studied with Guéranger and had become imbued with his love of the liturgy. Beuron's dedication to Solesmes' principles was reflected in its Messbuch der heiligen Kirche (1884) and vesperale (1893), in which the phrase "liturgical movement" was first used in Germany. This so-called Schott missal, which provided translations and explanations of all the Mass prayers, was immensely popular; seven million copies in fifty-six editions had been sold by the eve of the Second Vatican Council. Around the turn of the century, artist Desiderius Lenz founded a school and studio at Beuron that made his abbey renowned for a distinctive style of religious art.

"The nature of the monastery as an institution which is both a center of learning and of daily life shaped the liturgical movement along a creative "middle way" which was at once conservative, in that it looked to the past for models, and progressive, in that it sought to create a revived community life appropriate for modern conditions" (Franklin, "The Nineteenth-Century Liturgical Movement," p. 38). "Modern conditions" clearly were before the participants in the National Congress of Catholic Works at Malines, Belgium, in September 1909, which is generally recognized to have launched the liturgical movement as an organized endeavor. Here, Dom Lambert Beauduin (1873-1960), a monk of Mont-César in Louvain, encouraged industrial workers to make the parish Mass the great weekly gathering of the Christian people for "the true prayer of the Church." To help shape personal and family prayer in accord with the liturgy, Beauduin published translations of the texts for Sunday Mass and Vespers in the periodical La Vie Liturgique (1909-1913). Under Beauduin's leadership, the movement radiated from the Belgian abbeys of Maredsous and its foundation, Mont-César.

World War I halted the movement, but the post-war interest in liturgy found a two-fold expression: the ever increasing research into liturgical history, and the growing desire for better instruction in liturgical matters. The focus of leadership in the liturgical movement shifted from Belgium to Germany.

At the Rhineland Abbey of Maria Laach, Abbot Ildefons Herwegen (1913-1946, abbacy) and his monks insisted that liturgical celebration must recapture the spirit of worship of the patristic era, not the Middle Ages, and they propagated that spirit in publications and conferences. The series Ecclesia Orans, begun by Herwegen in 1918, was directed toward a popular audience. The volumes of Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen und Forschungen (begun in 1918 and superseded by the Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft in 1950), and the annual Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft were important means of disseminating results of research to intellectuals and priests. Herwegen set Dom Odo Casel (1886-1948), one of his monks, on the path that led to Casel's development of his "mystery doctrine" (Mysterienlehre), by which he attempted to explain how Christ is present and active in the sacramental mysteries of the church.

At Maria Laach, art and architecture, as well as chant and publications, became a significant part of liturgical renewal. Courses on liturgy and "Liturgical Weeks" served as a means of spiritual revitalization for their often well-educated participants. In 1921, Prior Albert Hammenstede began celebrating Mass facing these visitors in the crypt of the old Romanesque abbey church. There, lay brothers and novices took a full and active part in their morning Mass by reciting the Gloria and Credo with the celebrant, making the responses in unison, and bringing their own bread to the altar rail in an offertory procession. The appropriateness and beauty of these old-but-new practices made a lasting impression on the visiting Fr. Godfrey Diekmann of St. John's Abbey in Collegeville, Minnesota, who later helped draft Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy.

New Initiatives in the New World

During 1924 and 1925, another monk of St. John's had visited all the major European centers of liturgical renewal. At Maria Laach, Dom Virgil Michel studied liturgy, at Beuron art, at Solesmes chant, at Maredsous publishing. But it was from Dom Lambert Beauduin at Mont-César that Fr. Virgil received the clearest inspiration and enduring interests that made him the pioneer of the American liturgical movement.

In 1926, Dom Virgil founded the journal Orate Fratres (renamed Worship in 1951) which was addressed especially to parish clergy and lay persons. Its first issue announced itself as "a review devoted to the liturgical apostolate," and it became one of the most important means of promoting liturgical renewal in America. The Liturgical Press, also founded by Dom Virgil, published his translation of Beauduin's La Piété de Glazier, Inc., 1988] p. 175). As they seek to revitalize their celebrations of the eucharist and the liturgy of the hours, Benedictines can help the church to understand that unity need not require uniformity.

For Benedictines today, the challenge of liturgical renewal is changed, not ended. According to monastic historian Dom Jean Leclercq, they retain a significant role in "animating" the movement they pioneered, especially through their present scholarship and efforts to produce a religious culture based on biblical, patristic and liturgical sources (Leclercq, p. 252). It is not surprising that Benedictines, who have relished and cherished the riches of the liturgy for over fourteen centuries, should continue to share them through writing and publishing, teaching, leading retreats, and giving careful attention to the aesthetics of worship, both among themselves and with others. The biennial meetings of the Benedictine Musicians of the Americas and Caribbean, begun in 1966, provide opportunities for members to share their own compositions and to address questions pertaining to the work of directing music and liturgy in their communities. The Monastic Liturgy Forum, an organization formed in 1988 of Benedictine women and men who serve their monasteries as liturgists, seeks to enhance worship and deepen liturgical spirituality in monastic communities.

The monastic liturgical spirit, nurtured in silence and contemplation, has often flowered in an abundance of artistic compositions, especially music and prayer texts. The monks of St. John's Abbey in Collegeville, Minnesota, concretized (literally) their liturgical ideals in the new abbey church (1961) designed by Marcel Breuer of the Bauhaus tradition, a worship space which anticipated many requirements of the post-Vatican II liturgy.

Today monasteries are, or are called to become once again, places where a contemplative religious culture will favor a synthesis of the arts around the worship of the church. The monastic style of celebration will be one that "gives people a way out of verbal thickets, that provides space to hear the silence that exposes real human needs and feelings" (Mitchell, p. 16). Benedictine communities should find it easy to understand that physical hospitality to guests, which is a hallmark of monastic life, is closely linked to liturgical hospitality: the divine hospitality shown to God's people in the beloved Son is to be mirrored in our hospitality to each other, and never more so than in the liturgy. Through their continuing attention to the outward forms and inner spirit of worship, which Dom Guéranger promoted in the 19th century, monasteries can be oases where those "who are to be welcomed as Christ" (Rule of Benedict 53:1) can join their hosts in drinking with delight from the wellsprings of communal prayer and be refreshed for their journey of service in the world.

BISHOP

In Roman Catholic church order (L.G., 20), as well as the orders of many other Christian churches, the office of bishop is the primary pastoral office of the local church. The bishop is the sign and minister of unity both within the local church and of the local church with the church universal. It is said that the fullness of ministerial priesthood resides in the office of bishop, a statement which has more to do with the office as an ecclesial office, the bishop ordained to be sacramentum ecclesiae, than to any sense of ranking or parcelling out the ministerial priesthood of Christ. The Roman Catholic ritual for ordination of bishops reminds the ordinand that "the title of bishop is not one of honor but of function, and therefore a bishop should strive to serve rather than to rule" (Homily-Instruction). It names the bishop as steward of the mysteries of Christ, as father and brother to all in his care, guardian of the faith, builder of the church, and servant of the gospel. The ministry of the bishop is a trinitarian ministry: a personification of the Father in the church; a fulfillment of Christ's role as teacher, priest and shepherd; an agent of the Spirit who gives life to the church. Bishops serve the church as a body, a college of bishops in which the apostolic college is continued (C.D., 4).

BODY OF CHRIST

Language plays a central role in the life of any community as it expresses and shapes its identity. From the 1st century to the present the phrase "body of Christ" has been part of the Christian community's vocabulary for communicating something of its self-understanding and its understanding of the eucharist. Anyone engaged in a study of ecclesiology or the theology and spirituality of the eucharist will have to explore this notion.

The Pauline literature provides us with our earliest evidence for the use of this image in the Christian scriptures. In addressing himself to the divisions and conflicts experienced by the church of Corinth, Paul described the interdependence that exists among the parts of a human body and informed the Corinthians that they were one body, Christ's body, as a result of their baptism (1 Cor 12:12-27). At that time it was not uncommon to use the image of a body when referring to a social organization. We get a sense of the depth of the bond uniting Christians from Paul's statement that their union is grounded in the sharing of the one Spirit (1 Cor 12:13). Sharing in the one Spirit, Christ's Spirit, is the result of being incorporated into his death and resurrection through baptism (Rom 6:3-8).

Those who have been incorporated into Christ through baptism are engaged with other members of the body in an ongoing process of transformation into the likeness of Christ (2 Cor 3:18). Their corporate identity as the body of Christ is renewed every time they celebrate the Lord's Supper and share in the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor 10:16-17). Koinōnia is the word used by Paul in these verses and elsewhere to express the relationship which is at the heart of the Christian community's identity. The word suggests having a common share or participation in something greater than oneself. Paul uses it to speak of sharing in the life of Jesus Christ (1 Cor 1:9). Persons are brought into this relationship of communion with Christ and one another through baptism when they receive the one Spirit. This is a dynamic relationship in which the gift must be continuously realized in various forms of expression. There are consequences for those who have been brought into the body of Christ.

Those who have received the same gospel and who have come to share in the one Spirit are also called to participate in one another's sufferings. Paul makes this clear when he refers to the collection taken up by the Gentile Christians for the Jewish Christians who were suffering from famine (Rom 15:22-27). Furthermore, those who come together to share in the body and blood of Christ are called to be attentive to all those, rich and poor, who constitute the body of Christ, lest they be guilty of desecrating that body (1 Cor 11:17-34). The gifts of each member are to be used for the building up of the community (1 Cor 12:14; Rom 12:4-8). Finally, for those who are baptized into union with Christ there are no more distinctions between Jew and Greek, slave and free, male and female, for all are one person in Christ Jesus (Gal 3:27-28).

The notion of the body undergoes significant development in the letters to the Colossians and Ephesians, letters whose Pauline authorship is questioned by many scholars. In these letters the church is explicitly identified as the body of Christ and Christ is designated as head of the body (Col 1:18; 1:24; Eph 1:22; 4:15). This distinction between Christ as head and the church as body was not present in the earlier letters. In Ephesians, the relationship between Christ and the church is likened to the love between a husband and wife and the image of the bride comes to be associated with the church which is Christ's body (Eph 5:21-33). In these letters, the holiness of the church and the love that exists between Christ and the church are two important themes.

Patristic literature provides many examples of the church and the eucharist depicted as the body of Christ. Limits of space allow for the presentation of only a few. In the middle of the 2nd century, Justin, while explaining Christian worship to the emperor, wrote that the bread and wine of the eucharist is not received as common bread or common drink but as the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus (First Apology, 66). In a homily on 1 Cor 10:16-18, John Chrysostom (d. 407) emphasized Paul's teaching that the bread is the body of Christ and that all who partake of this bread become the body of Christ. In a homily on 1 Cor 11:23-28 he tells his congregation that those who neglect or overlook the hungry and do not give liberally to the poor eat the bread and drink the cup of the Lord unworthily and will be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. Augustine is well known for his strong sense of the ecclesial dimensions of the eucharist. In one of his homilies to the newly baptized he reminds them of Paul's words, "You are the body of Christ, and His members" and goes on to say the following: "If, therefore, you are the body of Christ and His members, your mystery has been placed on the Lord's table, you receive your mystery. You reply 'Amen' to that which you are, and by replying you consent. For you hear 'The Body of Christ' and you reply 'Amen'. Be a member of the body of Christ so that your 'Amen' may be true. . . . Be what you see, and receive what you are" (Sermon 272).

In the early centuries of the church's life the intimate relationship between the church as body of Christ and the eucharist as body of Christ was expressed in praxis and theology. When an assembly gathered to celebrate the eucharist its members provided the bread and wine, were understood to be active subjects in the celebration because of their union with Christ, shared in the body and blood of the Lord as the climax of the service. Communion in the bread and wine of the eucharist was an expression of membership in the ecclesial body of Christ. Guests who were recognized as legitimate members of the church were welcomed to the table as a sign of hospitality. Members who had cut themselves off from the body by grievous sin were excluded from the table. In the course of time the church's eucharistic praxis underwent significant change and new questions emerged in eucharistic theology. There were corresponding shifts in the meaning of the body of Christ.

During the 9th century theologians began to question the relationship between the eucharistic body of Christ and the historical body of Jesus, the manner in which Christ is present in the eucharist and the kind of change that occurs in the bread and wine during the eucharist. The eucharistic praxis within which such questions were explored was quite different from that of the early tradition. It was not uncommon for people to be present at the eucharist but to refrain from communicating in the body and blood of the Lord. Many did not understand the Latin language and this contributed to the emerging sense that the clergy rather than the whole assembly were the active subjects of the liturgy. It was during the 9th century that other changes in the relationship between the laity and the bread of the eucharist became apparent. Whereas, for centuries the people had made the bread, presented it at the service, and received it into their own hands at the time of communion, legislation now appeared requiring that the bread be unleavened, made by clergy or monks, and received by lay persons in the mouth. In addition, lay persons were no longer allowed to bring the eucharist to the sick. Such a context did not support a strong sense of a local assembly expressing and deepening its identity as the body of Christ in its celebrations of the eucharist.

Paschasius Radbertus, one of the 9th century theologians, identified the body of Christ present in the eucharist with that which was born of Mary and is now glorified. This position attained a certain dominance but was challenged by Berengar in the 11th century. A controversy erupted and Berengar's teachings were eventually condemned by Pope Leo IX in 1050. Berengar reluctantly signed a confession in 1059 which contained a very strong statement about the physical presence of the Lord in the eucharist, then rejected it and returned to his earlier views. Eventually he accepted a more refined version of the oath at the Synod of Rome in 1079.

As theologians were discussing the real presence of Christ in the eucharist and asking questions about the exact moment at which this presence is realized, new ways of recognizing and responding to that presence were appearing in the church's eucharistic praxis. The practice of elevating the host during the institution narrative had begun in some places by the end of the 12th century. In the early 13th century a synod held in Paris decreed that the elevation was not to occur until after the words: "This is my body," thereby settling a controversy regarding the moment of consecration. Reception of the body and blood of the Lord was rare at this time but there was a great desire to see the host and adore Christ present in the eucharist. The notion of spiritual communion also became popular.

The Feast of Corpus Christi was established for the entire church in 1264. The idea for such a feast had been promoted in the first part of the century by Juliana of Liège as a way of honoring Christ present in the eucharist. Devotional practices such as visits to the Blessed Sacrament, processions with the Blessed Sacrament, eucharistic exposition and benediction also made their appearance at this time. These practices which eventually became part of a eucharistic cult outside of Mass have their roots in the liturgy itself. Their emergence cannot be adequately understood apart from the social, cultural, political, economic, and religious context of the time.

Since there was little in the liturgy that supported the notion of the assembly expressing and renewing its identity as the body of Christ, the link between the eucharistic body and the ecclesial body was severely weakened in eucharistic praxis. It is interesting to note, however, that the social dimension of the eucharist did not disappear. On those rare occasions during the year when it was customary for everyone in a parish to receive, doing so signified that one was a member of the church in good standing. The idea of the church as the body of Christ was also present in the writings of some 12th and 13th century theologians. Thomas Aquinas was not alone in identifying Christ's mystical body as the ultimate reality signified by the eucharist (S.Th., III,73:1). In his book Corpus Mysticum Henri de Lubac has shown how this term, originally used of the eucharist, came to be used of the church during the theological discussions of the medieval period.

The manner in which the eucharist is the body of Christ and the identity of the church as the body of Christ were both issues in the theological controversies of the 16th century. Trent strongly reaffirmed the real presence of the body and blood of Jesus in the eucharist in response to those who denied it. The notion of the church as the body of Christ became intertwined with a distinction between the visible and invisible church that was used by some of the Reformers. Some of them identified the mystical body of Christ with the elect but not with the whole of the visible church. This was a way of rejecting the Roman tendency to equate the visible hierarchical church centered upon the papacy with the true church. The ecclesiology of the post-Tridentine Roman Catholic church, strongly influenced by Robert Bellarmine (1542-1621) emphasized the visibility of the church and the position that the pope represents Christ as head of the body which is the church. A notion of the church as a perfect society held sway far into the 20th century. Such an ecclesiology emphasizes structural and institutional components, those elements which give the church its visibility. Biblical imagery was not in the forefront of the church's self-consciousness.

The documents of Vatican II bear witness to a recovery of a variety of biblical images for the church including that of the body of Christ. There are also many statements which point to the significance of the eucharist in the life of the church. In speaking of the church as the mystical body of Christ, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church states that the visible society with its structure and the spiritual community or mystical body are to be understood as one complex reality rather than two (L.G.8). However, it does not identify the mystical body with the Roman Catholic church as Pius XII had done in his encyclical Mystici Corporis. Instead it says that this church, which is given life by the Spirit of Christ, subsists in the Catholic church and goes on to recognize that there are elements of sanctification and truth to be found elsewhere. In a similar fashion Lumen Gentium, 14 and 15, identify a variety of ways of being incorporated into Christ's body which is the church.

L.G. 7 gathers together a number of NT ideas about the body of Christ: the Spirit of Christ as source of life in the body, baptism as the sacrament of entry into the body, the fact that all members are called to be formed in the likeness of Christ, and the realization that sharing in the body of the Lord in the eucharist continually effects communion with him and with one another.

The principle that liturgy is ecclesial action permeates Sacrosanctum Concilium and the church is often presented under the image of a body. For example, S.C. 7 states that "in the liturgy the whole public worship is performed by the mystical body of Jesus Christ, that is, by the Head and his members." S.C. 26 indicates that liturgical services manifest and have effects upon the whole body of the church. The sacraments are said to have as one of their purposes the building up of the body of Christ (S.C., 59) and the divine office is set out as the prayer which Christ together with his body address to the Father. (S.C., 84) The faithful are said to offer the sacrifice of the eucharist with the priest (S.C., 48) and full, active participation by all the people is identified as the primary aim that should be operative in revising the liturgy (S.C., 14). Finally, while maintaining the familiar notion of Christ being present in the person of his minister and especially in the eucharistic species, the constitution refreshes the church's memory that Christ is present in the sacraments, in his word as it is proclaimed, and in the church when it gathers to pray and sing (S.C., 7).

The liturgical rites revised in the years following the council are faithful to these ideas. The General Instruction of the Roman Missal presents the reception of the Lord's body and blood as the normal completion of the eucharistic celebration for all who are properly disposed and several of the symbolic actions which are part of the communion rite are explained within a communal context (56). The sign of peace is described as a plea for peace and unity for the church and the whole human family as well as a sign of mutual love. The breaking of bread is identified as "a sign that in sharing in the one bread of life which is Christ we who are many are one body." The desirability of having the people receive the Lord's body from hosts consecrated at the same Mass and, when permissible, to share in the chalice is encouraged as an expression of their sharing in the sacrifice which is actually being celebrated. Finally, the communion song is supposed to be an expression of the communicants' union in spirit and a way of making the procession to receive Christ's body more fully an act of community.

The Rite for Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass maintains the validity of such practices as eucharistic reservation, exposition and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament but clearly states that these need to be understood in relation to the celebration of the eucharist which takes place in Mass and culminates in the reception of communion (2-4; 82). People are reminded that the primary and original reason for reservation of the eucharist outside Mass is the administration of viaticum (5). The unique presence of Christ in the eucharistic elements is presented within the context of his presence in the assembly gathered in his name, in his word when the scriptures are read and proclaimed, and in the person of the minister (6). Exposition of the eucharist is said to be both an acknowledgment of Christ's marvelous presence in the sacrament and an invitation to the spiritual union with him that culminates in sacramental communion (82). Prayer before Christ sacramentally present is described as something which extends the union with Christ which the faithful have reached in communion and as an action which should lead persons to become witnesses of Christ (81). The Rite of Pastoral Care of the Sick emphasizes the link between the community's eucharistic celebration, especially on the Lord's Day, and the communion of the sick and suggests that communion be taken to them from the community's celebration (73).

One of the changes made in the liturgy of the eucharist was the restoration of the ancient formula, "the body of Christ," with its response of "Amen." In 1977 the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy published a booklet entitled The Body of Christ which was intended to serve as part of the catechesis associated with restoring the practice of receiving communion in the hand. An explanation of the meaning of the formula is included. By saying "Amen" to the words "the body of Christ" "we profess our belief in the presence of Christ in the eucharistic bread and wine as well as in his body the Church" (p.21). The use of the phrase "the body of Christ" "seeks to highlight the important concept of the community as the body of Christ. . . brings into focus the assent of the individual in the worshipping community. . . and demonstrates the importance of Christ's presence in liturgical celebrations" as set out in S.C. 7 (p. 22).

This strong emphasis on the ecclesial dimension of the body of Christ is absent from the explanation of the meaning of the formula given in This Holy and Living Sacrifice, the directory for the celebration and reception of communion under both kinds issued by the U.S. National Conference of Catholic Bishops in 1985. This document is a summary of the church's liturgical laws concerning communion under both kinds. The significance of the eucharist in the life of the church is made clear in a number of places but when the act of communion is described, the communicant's "Amen" to "The body of Christ" and "the blood of Christ" is presented as an act of faith, "a profession in the presence of the saving Christ, body, soul and divinity, who now gives life to the believer." (16) The document is concerned with emphasizing that the communicant makes an act of faith in the total presence of the Lord Jesus Christ whether in communion under one or both forms and this concern seems to have eclipsed the earlier concern to call the community to a recognition of its identity as the body of Christ.

Although the formula familiar to Augustine and the church of his time has been restored, many in the church have yet to explore and appropriate the depth of its meaning. As people do realize that in saying "Amen" they are also assenting to their identity as members of the body of Christ, more attention may be given to the social and ethical implications that accompany such an identity.

BURIAL, CHRISTIAN

A. Tradition

The roots of the tradition of Christian burial are found in Judaism. In the Jewish community, burial has long been regarded as both an obligation and a work of mercy, and what scattered references we have to their ancient burial rites reflect both realism and simplicity.

Jesus, was buried according to Jewish custom. Although the nearness of the Sabbath, coupled with fear of the authorities, prevented his friends from anointing the body in the usual way, both the synoptic and the Johannine gospels, while differing in specific details, record that his body was wrapped in linen, with myrrh and aloes between the bands (Mt 27:59; Mk 15:46; Lk 23:53, 56; 24:1; Jn 14:39-40), and laid to rest in the tomb.

The Jews viewed dead bodies as unclean and therefore disposed of them before going back to prayers or going on with business as usual. Mourners were forbidden to work, bathe or have sexual intercourse for up to as long as 30 days. Male mourners were served a "meal of comfort" (labra'ah) after the funeral, consisting of eggs and lentils, prepared by friends and neighbors and served with wine.

Jewish practices were not without a hint of superstition, however. It was their custom, for example, to dispose of all water in the house after someone died. Explanations for this custom vary. Some believed that before leaving earth the soul might have cleansed itself in the water, while others feared that the soul might live in the water if there were no room in the House of the Dead. Another explanation was the belief that the Angel of Death washed the blood of the dead off its sword in the waters, or might even be lurking there, waiting for the next victim.

It is the Kaddish—the sanctification—however, that gives us a synthesis of Jewish theology with regard to death. This prayer was originally the concluding prayer of the synagogue liturgy. It is an eschatological prayer, similar to the Lord's Prayer. Traditionally, the Kaddish must be recited every day for eleven months following the death of a parent, blood relative or spouse.

In the developing funeral liturgies of the Christian community in its early days, Roman influence was strongest. Roman customs reveal an attraction to the mystery cults of the East as well as the practices of Egypt. Initially, Christians and pagans were buried side by side in cemeteries, with only decorations or inspirations to distinguish one grave from the other. Early Christian symbolism depicted Jesus as tending sheep, fishing, or presiding over the heavenly banquet. In time, however, as the theology of death became more paschal in character, symbols of deliverance began to predominate. Jesus' miracles, particularly the raising of Lazarus and the curing of the blind man, were popular representations.

We find records of "funeral meals" as customary in early Christianity. These funeral meals probably had their origin in the Roman custom of graveside feasts.

rather than in the Jewish "meals of comfort" held in the homes of the mourners. Roman funeral meals were connected with either the belief that the dead needed nourishment or the idea that the "tedium" of the dead would be relieved by such feasts. Often they became occasions of such raucous behavior that most of our knowledge of them is derived from various bishops condemning them. These condemnations addressed the scandal that such excesses caused, and encouraged prayer vigils, fasting and gifts to the needy as more appropriate customs to develop.

The weeping and wailing associated with mourning, as well as black mourning garments, were also considered to be "unchristian," because despair rather than hope was seen to be their motivation. Consequently, devout Christians developed more suitable means of expressing their grief, replacing weeping and wailing with singing psalms and hymns.

From the writings of the Fathers we learn of other "unchristian" behavior that was gradually adapted to reflect more accurately the theology of the Christian community. One example of this was the custom of placing eucharistic bread in the corpse's mouth. This custom probably traced its origin to the mystery cults where a coin was placed in the mouth of the deceased so that he or she would be able to pay the fare to Charon on the ferry across the river Styx. Various councils [Hippo (393), Carthage (419 and 525), Auxerre (578), and Trullo (692)] condemned this practice of giving eucharist to the dead, who could neither "take" nor "eat," but supported the practice of giving eucharist to the dying as "food for the journey" (viaticum). In the 2nd century Ignatius of Antioch referred to eucharist as "medicine of immortality and the antidote which wards off death but yields continuous life in union with Jesus Christ" (Ign. Eph 20:2).

The oldest Roman ritual for death and burial is Ordo 49, which dates from the 7th century. Rather than a highly structured ritual, the Ordo presents an outline for the service. The ritual consisted of two parts: the first, which ritualized death, took place in the home of the deceased; the other, a burial ritual, took place in the church and cemetery.

When death appeared to be imminent, the Christian was given the eucharist, as a token of the resurrection he or she was about to experience. From that time until the moment of death, family and friends would read the passion narrative to the one dying. When they thought the soul was about to leave the body, those gathered in prayer would respond, "Come, saints of God: advance angels of the Lord. . . ." Then, after reciting Psalm 113 they would pray, "May the choir of angels receive you."

After death, the body was placed on a litter and carried in procession to the church. There the community recited an "office," consisting of psalms, using the poignant antiphon: "May the angels lead you into paradise, may the martyrs welcome you and guide you into the holy city Jerusalem." While reciting Psalm 117, the procession continued on its way, escorting the body to the cemetery, and responding, "Open the gates for me, and once I am within I shall praise the Lord." Psalms 113 and 117 formed part of the structure of the Jewish Passover meal. The intention in using these psalms in the funeral liturgy as well might have been to demonstrate that Christian death completes the paschal "exodus."

There is a dramatic shift in focus when we move into the medieval period. Gradually the peaceful, paschal vision of the Christian's final journey was replaced by harsh scenes of the final judgment. God and the company of angels were no longer waiting to welcome Christians at the moment of death, but instead stood guard, waiting to scrutinize them before to be recognized as an accomplishment of the paschal exodus, and was seen instead as yet another ordeal.

The Ordo of 1614 included funeral rites along with rites for sacraments and blessings. The official book attempted to bring order to the collection of monastic rituals that had been developing. The funeral rite reflects two strands of belief: death as triumph or reward and death as ordeal. We see both these strands weaving in and out of the ritual.

The service began at the door of the church, where the priest met the body of the deceased and the company of mourners. He sprinkled the coffin with holy water, symbolizing purification from sin. Although trust in God's mercy underlies the prayers, they beg God repeatedly to spare the sinner from the pains of hell.

The liturgy's attitude toward death is particularly evident in the sequence, Dies Irae. Its apocalyptic character seems to be more reflective of the superstitions of pagan mythology than of a people formed in the resurrection of Christ.

The eucharistic prayer sounds a note of genuine hope in the liturgy. "For those who have been faithful, Lord, life is not ended, but merely changed; and when this earthly abode dissolves, an eternal dwelling place awaits them in heaven." This image is more compatible to Christian faith than one of being swallowed by the pit.

B. Order of Christian Funerals

The Order of Christian Funerals (O.C.F.) is a 1989 revision, reorganization and English translation of the Ordo Exsequiarum (August 15, 1969) which actualized the reform initiated at Vatican II (S.C., 81). The rites have been rearranged and developed so that they represent a cohesive theology of death and Christian burial, and can be of greater use to ministers, both in preaching and in presiding. The general introduction is an the Latin edition, and also contains pastoral notes before each of the rites. In addition, there are newly composed prayers to provide for situations not addressed in the Latin edition.

The Order of Christian Funerals provides the Roman Catholic community with a coherent means of ministering to both the social and spiritual needs of members of the community who face the searing pain of death. The progression of rites brings hope and consolation to the living by immersing the faithful again and again in the wonder of the paschal mystery.

The Praenotanda for the revised rites establishes the appropriate focus for the funeral rites, immediately making the connection between the paschal mystery and baptism. Since baptism has already united the Christian to that great mystery of faith, it is at the eucharist that this mystery is most completely celebrated. Therefore, the funeral Mass is the principal celebration surrounding Christian burial.

The Order of Christian Funerals emphasizes the fact that all members of the church share in the ministry of consolation: caring for the dying, praying for the dead, and comforting those who mourn. Although this ministry primarily involves active participation in the funeral rites, the order suggests other possibilities for members of the community.

Those members of the community who hold special office are called upon to exercise their ministry in keeping with their office in the ministries of reader, musician, pallbearer, usher, etc.

Where conditions permit, the priest is the most appropriate presider at the funeral rites. When this is not possible, however, a deacon or lay person may preside (O.C.F., 14). Other ministries in the funeral rites invite the participation of lay persons as readers, musicians, ushers, pallbearers, and as special ministers of the eucharist where existing norms permit

The church's ministry to the deceased extends beyond the Roman Catholic community. Not only may the church's funeral rites be celebrated for the child whose parents intend to have their child baptized, but under certain circumstances, the local ordinary may permit use of the church's funeral rites for the baptized member of another church, when the church's minister is unavailable (O.C.F., 18).

C. Funeral Liturgies

The funeral liturgy, which might be celebrated within or outside Mass, is the community's principal celebration for the deceased. Ideally, funerals are celebrated at a time which permits as many members of the community to be present as possible. Generally this is early in the day. In some places, however, evening funerals are feasible and occur regularly. In other situations, particularly where there are few ordained ministers, it has become more practical to celebrate funerals in conjunction with the daily eucharist.

Because the eucharist is "a sacrament of love, a sign of unity, a bond of charity, a paschal banquet in which Christ is eaten, the mind is filled with grace, and a pledge of future glory is given to us" (S.C., 47), it is most appropriate that the community gather to celebrate eucharist together when one of its members dies. Full and active participation of the assembly is encouraged and members of the larger parish assume their usual roles in the parish's celebration of funerals as they would in the Sunday celebration.

Funeral Masses may not be celebrated during the Sacred Triduum, on solemnities of obligation, or on the Sundays of Advent, Lent or Easter (G.I.R.M., 336). Therefore, when it is not possible to have a funeral Mass, the funeral liturgy takes place outside Mass before the rite of committal. A Mass for the deceased would then be scheduled at another time. In such a case, a deacon or designated lay person may preside at the funeral litur

The funeral Mass, while ordinarily celebrated in the parish church, may be celebrated in the home of the deceased or some other appropriate place, at the discretion of the local ordinary. The liturgy includes reception of the body, the liturgy of the word, the liturgy of the eucharist, and the final commendation and farewell.

Standing at the door of the church, the members of the community welcome the deceased as their own. In the name of the community the priest greets the company of mourners. National flags and/or insignia of other associations are removed before the body of the deceased is brought into the church. The priest sprinkles the body with holy water, recalling the waters of baptism, and covers the coffin with a pall, again recalling the garment with which the deceased had been clothed in baptism.

The procession, led by the priest and assisting ministers, enters the church, and the coffin is placed near the sanctuary. The paschal candle, recalling the foundational mystery of the community's faith and its source of hope, while not carried in the procession, may be placed near the coffin.

The order regards the liturgy of the word as a central element of the church's ministry in the funeral liturgy for "the readings proclaim the paschal mystery, teach remembrance of the dead, convey the hope of being gathered together again in God's kingdom, and encourage the witness of Christian life . . . tell of God's design for a world in which suffering and death will relinquish their hold on all whom God has called his own" (O.C.F., 137).

A homily based on the scripture texts is an essential part of the funeral liturgy. Rather than dwelling on the life of the deceased as is customary in a eulogy, the homilist tries to focus on God's compassionate love and the community's faith in the paschal mystery, and through these words, the community receives strength and consolation.

In the liturgy of the eucharist which follows, "all are given a foretaste of eternal life in Christ and are united with Christ, with each other, and with all the faithful, living and dead" (O.C.F., 143).

The funeral liturgy usually concludes with the final commendation. However, this may be celebrated instead at the place of committal.

Before the final commendation begins, it is sometimes customary for someone to speak in remembrance of the deceased. This may be a friend or a member of the family, and may meet the needs the community has for eulogizing the deceased. These words are spoken before the members of the community entrust the deceased "to the tender and merciful embrace of God" (O.C.F., 146). Without denying the reality and pain of separation, this farewell underscores once again the common bonds of faith that unite the gathered assembly.

The presider invokes God, aware of the sadness present in this last farewell, but taking comfort in the hope that one day we shall once again enjoy the friendship of the deceased. "Although this congregation will disperse in sorrow, the mercy of God will gather us together again in the joy of his kingdom. Therefore let us console one another in the faith of Jesus Christ" (O.C.F., 171B).

A brief period of silence gives the individual members of the community an opportunity for private prayer and remembrance before the customary signs of farewell. Then the body is sprinkled with holy water either before or during the community's song of farewell, traditionally the "In Paradisum." Other hymns are sung as well when the community processes together to the place of committal.

The procession to the place of committal, mirroring the journey of human life and the pilgrimage to the new and eternal Jerusalem, is led by the priest and assisting ministers, who precede the coffin. The company of mourners follows when possible.

When it is not possible for a funeral Mass to be celebrated, the community still gathers to be strengthened by the word of God and to commend the deceased to God (O.C.F., 177).

D. Committal

For the community of mourners, the rite of committal marks the final separation from the deceased in this life. The rite's stark simplicity underscores the radical separation between life and death, while its prayers continue to look forward to the day when the entire community will be reunited for all eternity.

The funeral rites conclude with the rite of committal, which may take place at the grave, tomb, or crematorium. This rite may also be used for burial at sea (O.C.F., 204). In this rite, the community performs its final act in caring for the body of its deceased member, and for this reason it is most appropriate for the rite to be celebrated at the actual place of committal—the open grave or other place of interment.

Following upon the funeral liturgy, the order provides two forms of the rite of committal, one of which includes the final commendation. This second form of this rite is intended for use either when the final commendation does not take place during the funeral liturgy, or when no funeral liturgy is celebrated.

When the funeral procession arrives at the place of committal, the presiding minister, who may be a parish minister, a friend, or a member of the family, invites the community gathered to pray for the deceased and for themselves, that they may one day be reunited with the deceased.

A brief scripture verse is read to focus the community's attention on Jesus' promise that heaven is our true home

The minister then prays over the place of committal, and then says the words of committal. Several selections are provided in the O.C.F., suited to the particular method of interment, whether the body is to be buried in the earth, at sea, or entombed, or the cremated remains are to be buried, entombed, or scattered. According to the movement of the rites, committal more appropriately takes place at this time, although it may take place at the conclusion of the rite instead.

The intercessions follow, which may be read by another minister. These petitions pray for comfort, consolation, strength, an increase of faith, etc., for those who mourn, as well as mercy for the deceased. The intercessions conclude with the invitation to join in praying the Lord's Prayer.

Several concluding prayers are provided (O.C.F., 222, 408), after which the minister asks those gathered to bow their heads and pray for God's blessing. All pray silently, and then the minister, with outstretched hands, prays over the people.

The traditional petitions for eternal rest follow. The minister who is a priest or deacon invokes God's blessing on the community, while the rite provides an alternative blessing for a lay minister to use.

The minister concludes the celebration by urging the community to "Go in the peace of Christ," to which they give the familiar reply, "Thanks be to God." A song may then follow or some sign or gesture of leave-taking, such as placing flowers or soil on the coffin.

The rite of committal with the final commendation has essentially the same structure, with a few exceptions.

1) The invitation to prayer includes reference to the fact that the community has gathered not only to commit the deceased's body to the earth/elements, but also to commend their brother or sister to God.

2) The final commendation follows the reading from scripture. Its form is identical to that in the funeral liturgy.

3) Committal follows or takes place at the conclusion of the rite.

4) The rite concludes with the prayer over the people described previously, a song, and/or some sign or gesture of leave-taking.

For a variety of reasons, the final disposition of the body might not follow directly upon the rite of committal. Weather, labor disputes, or other unpredictable causes, might delay opening the grave. (Cremated remains might be interred (or scattered) at another time. It would be possible, in such cases, to repeat the rite of committal when the actual interment takes place (O.C.F., 212).

When a body has been donated to science, the rite of committal is celebrated whenever interment takes place.

E. Wake Services

The Order of Christian Funerals provides ministers with a variety of rites that may be celebrated between the time of death and the funeral liturgy, or before the rite of committal in the event that there is no funeral liturgy. Sensitive to the fact that the death of a loved one brings about emotional extremes, e.g., bewilderment, anger, grief, relief, the church's ministry at this time takes the form of companionship.

Two forms of the wake service, or "Vigil for the Deceased," are provided in the order: one for use when the vigil is celebrated in the church; the other when the vigil is celebrated in the home of the deceased, a funeral home, or some other suitable place.

Vigil for Deceased at the Funeral Home

This is the principal rite celebrated by the church between the time of the person's death and the funeral liturgy. "At the vigil the Christian community keeps watch with the family in prayer to the God of mercy and finds strength in Christ's presence" (O.C.F., 56).

Structurally, the vigil takes the form of the liturgy of the word, with introductory rites, readings from scripture, intercessory prayer, and a conclusion.

The liturgy of the word consists of a reading from the OT or NT, proclaimed by a member of the family or parish community. In response, the community sings (or recites) an appropriate psalm. The gospel is then proclaimed, followed by a brief homily that draws out the message of the readings and situates it in the experience of grief through which the community is passing.

The prayer of intercession follows, consisting of a litany, the Lord's Prayer and a concluding prayer. Various prayers for the dead, which might be used as the concluding prayer, are provided in O.C.F. 398-399. This is another time when a friend or member of the family might speak in remembrance of the deceased.

The vigil concludes with a blessing. After saying, "Blessed are those who have died in the Lord; let them rest from their labors for their good deeds go with them," the minister may sign the forehead of the deceased while praying the family petitions for peace with the community. Recalling the signing that begins our celebration of the sacraments of initiation, this is a very powerful gesture for the community. It not only ties together Christian initiation and Christian death theologically, but experientially as well.

The community is also blessed by the presiding minister, whether a priest or deacon. The lay person who presides may also invoke God's blessing, signing himself or herself with the sign of the cross, saying: "May the love of God and the peace of the Lord Jesus Christ bless and console us and gently wipe every tear from our eyes: in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit" (O.C.F., 81).

Vigil for the Deceased with Reception at the Church

The Order of Christian Funerals also provides a vigil for the deceased that is celebrated in the church. Funeral customs vary from place to place, so while this option might strike some as unusual, for others it is the expected ritual.

The introductory rites begin with a greeting at the door of the church that orients that community to the consoling presence of God. The coffin is then sprinkled with holy water, recalling the waters of baptism that already united the deceased to Christ's death and resurrection. The pall, a further reminder of baptism, can then be placed on the coffin if such is the local custom. The procession then enters the church, while the community sings a psalm, song or responsory. The Easter candle may be placed near the coffin. The invitation to prayer and opening prayer then follow, as previously described.

F. Other Prayer Services

In the first section of the Order of Christian Funerals one finds "related rites and prayers," consisting of three brief services: "Prayers after Death," "Gathering in the Presence of the Body," and "Transfer of the Body to the Church or to the Place of Committal." These provide the minister with a way to meet the varying needs of mourners, especially when the priest has been called to administer the anointing of the sick, only to discover that death has already occurred.

The "Prayers after Death" (O.C.F., 101-108) give a model for the minister to use when he or she first meets the family. Consisting of a reading, response, prayer and blessing, it gives the family a simple way to begin their ritual of mourning.

The "Gathering in the Presence of the Body" (O.C.F., 109-118) provides a model service which can be used when the family gathers around the body of the deceased soon after death, or when they gather in the funeral home after the body has been prepared for burial. This service begins with the sign of the cross and a brief reading from scripture. Recalling the living water into which the Christian has been baptized, the body is sprinkled with holy water. A psalm follows, and the rite concludes with a prayer and blessing.

The "Transfer of the Body . . ." (O.C.F., 119-127) gives a third model for possible intermediary rites. This rite is intended to precede the transferral of the body to either the church or the place of committal. It begins with an invitation to prayer and a brief scripture verse. This is followed by a litany, the Lord's Prayer and a concluding prayer before everyone is invited to join in the procession.

Office of the Dead

Part IV of the Order of Christian Funerals (348-395) contains the Office of the Dead, providing a setting of morning prayer and evening prayer that may be used or adapted. In the case of 2- or 3-day wakes, evening prayer might be celebrated one night, and the vigil another night. If the funeral liturgy is celebrated at night and the rite of committal is not to take place until the following morning, the community might gather for morning prayer before processing to the place of committal. When the community cannot participate in any of the funeral rites for one of its members—if it takes place in a far-distant city, for example—they may choose to pray the Office of the Dead. This could also provide a meaningful expression of support for a member of the community whose family member died in another locality. When he or she returns from the funeral rites, the community might gather to celebrate the Office of the Dead, which unites us with the universal church and "acknowledges that spiritual bond that links the church on earth with the church in heaven" (O.C.F., 349).

G. Symbols

Since the liturgical celebrations bring together family and friends who are experiencing deep grief, the ritual itself becomes a minister. Therefore, the ritual is attentive to all the senses; marked by beauty and reverence, and with simplicity, the ritual invites the participation of the community.

The word of God ministers to the grieving as it proclaims the paschal mystery and comforts the sorrowful. Although non-biblical readings should not replace scripture, they can be used in addition to biblical readings at the non-eucharistic services (O.C.F., 24). The psalms are particularly responsive to the needs and moods of the community, expressing the depths of grief as well as the heights of praise. These ancient songs cut through time and culture to touch the core of human longing, which is why their use is encouraged in many sections of the funeral rites (O.C.F., 25, 26).

The O.C.F. provides a variety of prayers that "capture the unspoken prayers and hopes of the assembly and also respond to the needs of the mourners" (O.C.F., 28). The prayers of intercession even more directly address the needs of the deceased, those who mourn, and the entire assembly. Models are provided, which can be adapted to the particular circumstances as needed (O.C.F., 29).

Because of its power to evoke strong feelings, music has an important place in all of the funeral rites. Songs can console and uplift the mourners by their references to the paschal character of Christian death, and the community's share in Christ's victory. Full participation of the assembly is encouraged at celebrations of the funeral rites (O.C.F., 30-33).

There is also a place for reverent silence in the funeral rites, which can evoke awe as the community stands in the face of the mystery of death.

Local custom dictates the degree to which each of the following Christian symbols "speaks" in the funeral rites.

The paschal candle serves as a continuous reminder to the community of Christ's victory along with our share in that victory. This symbol recalls both the Easter celebration and the sacrament of baptism during which the newly baptized receive the light of faith symbolized by the baptismal candle.

Holy water, sprinkled on the coffin at the beginning of the funeral liturgy, likewise recalls our incorporation into Christ's death and resurrection through the waters of baptism.

Incense is used in the funeral rites to lend greater dignity to the celebration. After the bread and wine have been prepared, they are incensed, together with the altar and the paschal candle. This gives visual expression to our prayers as they rise to God.

The pall, recalling that the deceased "put on" Christ in baptism, may be placed over the coffin as it is received at the door of the church.

A Bible or Book of the Gospels may be placed on the coffin to symbolize the deceased's fidelity to God's word.

The cross, with which the Christian is first marked in baptism, may also be placed on the coffin.

Flowers, subtle reminders that life and beauty transcend present suffering also enhance celebration.

Liturgical color should reflect Christian hope, without negating human grief.

Processions, with pallbearers carrying the coffin, have a significance as we go from one ritual to the next. They recall not only early Christian funerals, but also "the journey of human life, the Christian pilgrimage to the heavenly Jerusalem" (O.C.F., 41, 42).

H. Funeral Homes and Directors

Either with the support of the pastoral team or without it, funeral directors play a leading role in the immediate care of the bereaved family. Perhaps more than anyone else, they are able to see the larger picture, by virtue of their vast experience and the fact that they must attend to so many minute and hidden details of which the rest of the team is often unaware. They complement and complete the parish's ministry. The "Code of Ethics" and the "Code of Professional Practices for Funeral Directors" of the National Funeral Directors Association of the United States explains the contribution funeral directors make to furthering the mission of the church through ministry to the bereaved.

CALENDAR, LITURGICAL

I. Description

The term liturgical calendar can be used in two ways. In its more narrow sense it refers to a schematic presentation of the months of the year, bearing alongside of the numeral indicating each day, the designation of any festival or memorial of fixed date assigned to that day. Such a calendar, if found at the beginning of a liturgical book, will sometimes present for each date a letter of the alphabet running from a to g and then repeating. This "dominical letter," as it is called, makes it possible to identify the days of the week in any year, once the day of the week for any one date is known. If, e.g., in a given year a Sunday falls on a calendar date with the dominical letter b, then every day marked with a b will be a Sunday in that year. The provision of this dominical letter points to the primary importance the church has always assigned to the celebration of the resurrection of Christ on the first day of the week.

Beyond that, many Christian feasts and seasons are ordered toward specific days of the week, and therefore cannot be assigned to fixed dates. For this reason, liturgical calendars are also prepared for a particular year; and such a calendar, commonly called an ordo (order), can show on the appropriate days of the week all feasts of fixed date as well as those moveable feasts or fasts whose dates will vary from year to year. Such calendars help to resolve questions that arise when a festival of fixed date conflicts with the date of a moveable observance, as, e.g., when Good Friday falls on March 25, normally the Feast of the Annunciation.

In its broader sense, liturgical calendar refers to the whole shaping of the week and the year by religious observances, a tradition of liturgical articulation of time that has its roots in the OT and that has continued in Christianity from the first century forward. Over the centuries variable texts appropriate to each day of the liturgical calendar (scripture readings, hymns, anthems, prayers) have been organized in books intended for the conduct of worship. The number of such books and their organization has differed widely from one moment of the tradition to another, but three general categories of observances can be recognized as common to most of the tradition: a seasonal cycle; a sanctoral cycle; and, occasional texts or votive texts.

A. The Seasonal Cycle, Proprium de iempore. Sometimes called "the Christian Year," this cycle of feasts and seasons is predicated upon the life of Christ and organized about two major poles. The first of these is the Feast of the Nativity of Christ, observed on December 25 (except by the Armenians, who continue to celebrate that event on January 6, the date once generally observed in the East). The other pole is Easter, the Feast of the Resurrection of Christ, a moveable feast whose date in the West is computed as the first Sunday after the full moon that follows the vernal equinox. (A number of factors frequently and regrettably result in different dates for Easter in Eastern and Western churches. It is always, however, a Sunday.) A number of other observances depend on the date of Easter: the preceding Holy Week, the forty days of the fast before Easter that we know as Lent, and (at times) the preceding three Sundays of pre-Lent; Pentecost (the period of fifty days following Easter and also the festival on the fiftieth day), the Feast of the Ascension on the fortieth day (therefore always a Thursday), and a series of festivals in the weeks following Pentecost. The Feast of the Nativity of Christ on December 25, Christmas, is preceded by a preparatory period, the four Sundays of Advent, and is followed by the Feast of the Epiphany on January 6 (or the Sunday following) and the Feast of the Baptism of Our Lord on the Sunday after Epiphany.

All these are tied closely to the fixed dates of December 25 and January 6, while the observances dependent on the date of Easter shift more widely from year to year, yielding a varying number of Sundays after Epiphany and a varying number of Sundays after Pentecost. These are frequently spoken of as "neutral zones," and their treatment has varied and varies still in particular traditions. In the present Latin rite, they are treated as a continuous series of thirty-three or thirty-four weeks anni circuli, a traditional Latin expression that has proved difficult to render in English. The common English translation is "ordinary time." The liturgical texts provided are used for the Sundays between the Epiphany and Lent as needed, and then the series is resumed after Pentecost. The last of the Sundays after Pentecost is now the Feast of Christ the King, on the Sunday before the seasonal cycle begins again with Advent.

Ember Days. Early Roman liturgical books included in the seasonal cycle four fasts at the four natural seasons, the quattuor tempora, and the careful attention given to these in early documents suggests that they were regarded as of great importance in the Roman liturgical year. Assigned eventually to the first, fourth, seventh and tenth months, these were a peculiar characteristic of the liturgy of Rome, and antedate the Sundays of Advent and many other important observances in the Roman calendar. In the time of Leo I (440-461), to whose preaching we owe our earliest clear picture of these observances, these seasonal fasts fell in the first week of Lent, the week following Pentecost, in September and in December. The observance consisted in a solemnization of the regular weekly fasts on Wednesday and Friday, an extension of the Friday fast through Saturday, and a vigil through the night from Saturday to Sunday, concluding with the eucharist early Sunday morning.

The once popular attempt of Germain Morin to trace these to three Roman feriae conceptivae has proved groundless, and the ultimate origin of these "Ember Days," as they are known in English (from the German contraction of the Latin designation, quattuor tempora, to Quatember), remains unknown. They seem to have been regularized, at least, in the 4th century, and the pontificates of Damasus (d. 384) or his successor, Siricius, are most frequently suggested. From the time of Gelasius I at the end of the 5th century, they were among the days designated as especially appropriate for the ordination of deacons and presbyters. The association with ordination had a deep influence on the later spirituality of the Ember Days, although their liturgy, antedating their use as ordination days, did not reflect that use.

Gregory VII assigned the precise times for them that remained in force until the reforms under Paul VI in this century: the Wednesday, Friday and Saturday of the first week of Lent, of the octave of Pentecost, and following September 14 and December 13. Their times and frequency are now expected to be established in each place by the appropriate episcopal conference, as are the Rogation Days (see below), but their once prominent role in the Roman liturgical year is now greatly diminished, if not forgotten.

B. The Sanctoral Cycle, Proprium de sanctis. This is a series of festivals of fixed date on which are commemorated the lives of martyrs and other saints who have been examples to the church, or particular events in the life of Christ or the Blessed Virgin Mary. In the case of the saints, the commemoration is assigned most commonly to the date of their death, and this is spoken of as their dies natalis, their birthday into the Kingdom of Heaven. Derivatively, that term, natale, comes to mean simply an anniversary and can be applied to the annual commemoration of the dedication of a church. Many commemorations in the sanctoral cycle are rooted in such anniversaries of dedications (e.g., Holy Cross Day on September 14, or St. Michael and All Angels on September 29). The tradition has also celebrated the conceptions and nativities of St. John the Baptist and the Blessed Virgin, as well as those of Christ.

C. Occasional Masses. The liturgical books have also provided proper texts for other occasions that arise in the lives of the faithful but are not related to particular liturgical times, though often controlled by them. These include themes that may be dictated by particular historical circumstances (such as a time of famine) or by the devotion of the community or its leaders. In general, these are known as missae votivae, "votive masses," and their celebration is variously regulated by the liturgical calendar, to which they do not strictly belong.

These three categories were represented in the three books into which one of our earlier liturgical manuscripts was divided, the Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Ecclesiae Ordinis Anni Circuli, more commonly known as the Gelasian Sacramentary (Vat. reg. lat. 316). Here Liber I is devoted to the seasonal cycle, Liber II to the sanctoral cycle, and Liber III to votive masses (although it is here as well that we find a series of proper texts for Sundays not covered in Liber I, those that are now designated as "ordinary time").

It is perhaps worthy of note that the Byzantine typikon divides liturgical observances slightly differently, distinguishing only between festivals of fixed date and those of moveable date (although, as with the ordo, these are united for each particular year in an annual publication, also known as the typikon).

II. Historical Development

Although it was once commonplace to assign the origins of the liturgical year to the time following the conversion of Constantine and the so-called "Peace of the Church," more recent studies have shown that regular annual religious observances, in addition to the weekly observance of Sunday, are much more ancient. Such primitive annual patterns constitute the primary stratum of the liturgical calendar, and the oldest of them can be said to be coeval (though not coextensive) with the observance of the liturgical week. It is, nonetheless, with the week that any consideration of the historical roots of the calendar must begin.

A. The Liturgical Week. The cycle of seven days observed in the OT is of such antiquity that some scholars, at least, believe it to antedate the settlement of the people in Canaan. The commandment to observe the Sabbath is found in all recensions of the Law, and the priestly writers even ground the seven-day week in creation itself. The term "Sabbath" means that which stops, and points to the seventh day as the determinant of the weekly cycle. Only "Sabbath" names a day of the week in the Bible, and the other days are simply numbered from the Sabbath.

Biblical and non-biblical sources suggest the possibility that a very primitive West Asiatic calendar was built upon multiples of seven, the next larger unit being a week of weeks to which was added a festival day for a total of fifty days. Seven of these periods would yield 350 days, to which two festival weeks (in the spring and autumn) were added, for a total of 364 days. While such a calendar may lie behind the Jewish week, it would have some days (the fiftieth days) that belonged to no week and to that extent would differ from the biblical week. The insistence on the unvarying observance of every seventh day as a day of rest is characteristically biblical and must be seen as Judaism's contribution to our culture.

The first Christians continued to observe Sabbath and took the seven-day cycle determined by it to be fundamental. The gospels put the resurrection of Christ on the first day of the week (hê mia tôn sabbatôn), and record his appearance to his disciples both on that day and on the first day of the following week. The Acts of the Apostles (20:7) suggests that this was the day on which the church gathered for the breaking of bread (the eucharist), but various interpretations of the relation of this day to the Sabbath are encountered. It has been suggested that the church gathered in the evening of the first day, the hour of the Lord's post-resurrection appearance, as an assertion of distinction from Judaism, recognizing Christ as "Lord of the Sabbath." More frequently it is suggested that the Christian assemblies gathered immediately upon the closing of the Sabbath at sundown, and therefore in the beginning hours of what we would call Saturday evening, already the beginning of Sunday when the day was reckoned in the Jewish manner from sundown to sundown. In later centuries we find the church continuing (with a few exceptions) the Jewish prohibition of fasting on Sabbath, which suggests a sense of continuity with Sabbath rather than a repudiation of it.

From as early as Revelation 1:10, the Christian day for eucharistic assembly was known as "the Day of the Lord" (kyriakê hêmera). Although some assign a different meaning to that phrase in Rev 1:10, a very similar expression is used for the weekly day of eucharistic assembly in Didache 14, and recent opinion has tended to assign to that Church Order a date very near that of Revelation. Unlike the Sabbath, the Day of the Lord (Sunday in the planetary calendar) was not a publicly supported day of rest, and we may be sure that the gathering of the community for worship fell outside normal working hours.

In addition to the Sunday assembly for eucharist, Didache 8 orders fasting on two days in the week, Wednesday and Friday, distinguishing these from the Mondays and Thursdays which were observed as fasts by those called "the hypocrites." While that derogatory expression surely indicates the Pharisees (at least), it has often been noted that it could reflect a repudiation of that party by Jewish sectaries in addition to Christians. The calendar of the Essenes at Qumran was structured in such a way as to assign all religious observances of fixed month dates to Wednesdays, Fridays, or Sundays.

In the course of the 2nd century the two weekly fast days came to be called "stations," a term roughly equivalent to na'amadoth, used of assemblies of Jews outside Jerusalem for prayer at the times of the temple sacrifices. Tertullian, writing in North Africa at the end of the century, relates the term statio to the military vocabulary. Sunday, during the 2nd century, came to be called also "the Eighth Day," pointing to the eschatological character of the resurrection on the first day of the week as being, in fact, the beginning of a new era, the day that follows the Sabbath, not merely the first of a series of days leading toward the Sabbath. Sunday, as the first day of a new creation, superseded the Sabbath, even as the church bound herself closely to the week defined originally by the Sabbath. Latin Christianity in the 2nd or 3rd century began to use the term feria (festival) as equivalent to Sabbath, and continued the Hebrew and NT custom of numbering weekdays in order from that day, although the first day was now never feria prima, but dies dominica, the Day of the Lord. The seventh day itself continued to be called Sabbatum.

There is every reason to believe that such a Christian shaping of the week was adopted in all parts of the church by the end of the 1st century, and some Christians of Jewish background continued a measure of Sabbath observance as well. At the very least, apart from Rome and perhaps a few other western regions, Sabbath continued to be a day on which fasting was forbidden by Christians. One Sabbath in the year was an exception to that rule, and that requires us to turn from the liturgical week to the liturgical year.

B. The Liturgical Year. The OT ordered three festivals in the year as binding upon all males, and from the time of Josiah (7th century B.C.), these were to be celebrated only in Jerusalem. Distinguished from other festivals by the term chag, these represented the oldest stratum of Jewish festivals, combining the nomadic Passover (pesach), the spring sacrifice of a lamb commemorating the exodus, with three agricultural festivals adopted in Canaan: Unleavened Bread in the spring, the Feast of Weeks (seven weeks after Unleavened Bread), and Sukkoth, Booths or Tabernacles, which marked the ingathering of the harvest in the autumn. The reform of Josiah united Passover and Unleavened Bread into a single festival kept at the full moon in the spring. At different times either the spring or autumn festival, both celebrated for a week, had marked the turning of the year. By contrast to these, the Feast of Weeks, celebrated on a single day, seems to conclude an extension of the week of Unleavened Bread to a week of weeks, although it came to be recognized as a distinct festival on the fiftieth day, called Pentecost ("fiftieth") in the Septuagint

The gospel of John puts the crucifixion of Jesus on the Preparation of the Passover, 14 Nisan, at the time of the slaying of lambs for the feast that would begin at nightfall. This same chronological tradition may lie behind Paul's assertion, ca. A.D. 55, that "Christ, our Passover lamb, has been sacrificed for us" (1 Cor 5:7). The synoptic gospels identify Jesus' Last Supper with his disciples as the Passover, eaten at the beginning of 15 Nisan, but it is the Johannine tradition of his death on 14 Nisan that has been most significant in shaping the liturgical year.

By the 2nd century, sources from Asia Minor show the Christian observance of a fast on that day, followed by a vigil from sundown to cockcrow and concluded with the eucharist. This total observance is called pascha, the Aramaic equivalent of pesach ("passover" in the English OT), and Asian Christians kept it on the same day as the Jewish Passover, albeit now with emphasis on the fast and extended vigil as memorial of the death of Jesus and a watch for his coming again. The observance of that date according to the Jewish lunar calendar was difficult since the calendar was corrected on an empirical basis by Palestinian authorities, and Asian Christians eventually adopted the local solar calendar, keeping pascha on the 14th day of the first spring month, Artemisios. The adoption of the Roman calendar after the founding of Constantinople made that date April 6. A more historical concern to establish the precise date of the crucifixion determined the year to have been A.D. 29, and 14 Nisan in that year to have been March 25. Both dates, April 6 and March 25, are found as fixed dates for the paschal observance. The content of the festival was the entire mystery of Christ: his incarnation, passion, death, resurrection and glorification, and the outpouring of the Spirit on the church.

This annual observance on a fixed date was in contrast to the observance of the first day of every week, with its eucharist as celebration of Christ's resurrection. Probably at Jerusalem, the two traditions were first elided, so that the fast was concluded with the eucharist only in the early hours of Sunday. This had the effect of making the one day of the fast fall on Sabbath, the exception to the rule against Sabbath fasting mentioned above. This also put that one day fast adjacent to the older weekly fast on Friday, and many began to fast for two days. With the concluding Sunday celebration, this constituted the original meaning of triduum sacrum, the paschal observance of Friday, Saturday and Sunday. While some churches, such as Rome, continued to observe only this triduum, in the 3rd century in Syria and Egypt the two-day fast was extended to six days, giving us the week-long observance of pascha that we now know as Holy Week.

Already in the 2nd century the celebration of the resurrection was continued for fifty days, and the earliest references to the Christian Pentecost are to this period of unbroken rejoicing. In the course of the 4th century the fiftieth day took on the character of a distinct celebration of Christ's ascension and the sending of the Spirit upon the church, and in the last two decades of the century we encounter the separation of that dual theme, and the celebration of the ascension on the fortieth day. By the final decade of the 4th century in northern Italy, at least, the tradition of unbroken rejoicing had been dismantled by a fast before the Feast of the Ascension, as Filastrius of Brescia testifies (CCL IX, p. 312).

In the next century the three days before Ascension Day were marked in Gaul by rogations (with processional litanies) that became a regular interruption of the paschal rejoicing by fasting and supplication for the state of the crops. With the introduction of these "Rogation Days" by Mammertus, Bishop of Vienne, the original meaning of the Pentecost was vitiated, but these fast days achieved great popularity in the Middle Ages. When they were adopted at Rome, they were known as the "lesser litanies," by contrast to the "major litany," a 7th-century Christian adaptation of the pre-Christian Robigalia on the day that would later become as well the feast of St. Mark (April 25). The Rogation Days are no longer assigned to paschaltide in the Latin rite, but are now to be established on whatever days seem appropriate to local episcopal conferences. This accords with the restoration of the integrity of the fifty days of unbroken rejoicing, which has been a major concern of recent liturgical reform.

For Christianity as for the OT, Pentecost refers to the fifty days of rejoicing as well as to the final festival of the single, fiftieth day. Pascha (Easter) is observed, as was Passover, for a total of eight days, but Pentecost no longer has an octave. In England, this final Sunday of the paschal season was known as "Whitsunday." Although this is commonly taken by lexicographers to mean, "white Sunday," it was suggested by Hamon L'Estrange in the 17th century (The Alliance of Divine Offices, Annotation V upon chap. V) that it derives from the French huit or huitième dimanche, the eighth Sunday of Easter.

The paschal season, from the six days of the paschal fast to the final day of Pentecost, can be understood to be in more or less direct continuity with the OT festivals of Passover-Unleavened Bread and Shabbuoth (Weeks). Evidence for a Christian continuance of the autumnal festival of Tabernacles, on the other hand, is lacking. In spite of that, patristic writers regularly appealed to OT texts regarding the three pilgrim festivals as authority for the Christian observance of Pascha, Pentecost, and the feast of the Epiphany (January 6).

There is a possible (but highly hypothetical) connection between Tabernacles and Epiphany. M. D. Goulder has suggested that the evangelists arranged their materials to correspond to the pentateuch readings that began on Simchat Torah, at the conclusion of the Tabernacles celebration, and we shall suggest below that the Epiphany marked the beginning of a gospel course reading.

The oriental nativity festival of Epiphany, with its occidental parallel of December 25, constitutes one of the more thorny questions in the history of the liturgical year. Both festivals have celebrated the nativity of Christ, but other themes have also attached to the Epiphany: the baptism of Jesus, the miracle at the Cana wedding-feast, the visit of the Magi, and even (in one source) the Transfiguration.

Two lines of interpretation are encountered for the origin of these festivals of the nativity. The "History of Religions" school sees both as derived from pre-Christian festivals, December 25 from the "birthday of the Invincible Sun" (dies natalis solis invicti) at Rome, and January 6 from the "birth of Aion" at Alexandria. Eduard Norden sought to relate both dates to the winter solstice, but his explanation would require the use of the Julian calendar in the 20th century B.C., while in fact it was devised only in the 1st century B.C. The Roman festival of the Invincible Sun on December 25, the traditional date of the winter solstice, was instituted by the Emperor Aurelian in A.D. 274, and seems to represent his attempt to offer a syncretistic monotheism that could unify the many cults practiced in the empire.

Those who argue for the derivation of Christmas from this festival lay great emphasis on the role of Constantine, who is known to have been a devotee of the Sun prior to his protection of Christianity. On the other hand, there is no indication of Christmas at Constantinople during his lifetime, and it was there rather than at Rome that his influence was focussed from 324 forward. During that time he visited Rome only once, from July 18 through September of 326.

The first clear documentary evidence for Christmas comes from 336. A list of martyrs' burials in the Chronograph of 354 begins with December 25 and indicates beside that day, natus Christus in Betleem Iudeae. That list and a parallel list for bishops have been shown to have been drawn up originally in 336. On the basis of North African evidence, especially Augustine's Sermon 202, some have argued that Christmas antedates the Donatist schism (ca. 311) and therefore the accession of Constantine, but others reject that conclusion as an argumentum ex silentio. The same complaint, however, has been made of the derivation of Christmas from the pagan festival, since the first assertion of such a connection appears in a Syriac gloss on a manuscript of Dionysius bar Salibi late in the 12th century. Quite apart from this festival on the traditional date of the winter solstice, Christ was frequently associated with the sun in early Christianity and many texts point to him as the "sun of righteousness" of Mai 4:2.

The association of the oriental nativity feast on January 6 with the "birth of Aion" festival at Alexandria rests on the testimony of Epiphanius (Pan. haer. 51.22), who describes a ceremony through the night from January 5 to 6. Messala, a Roman writer of the 1st century B.C., said that the feast of Aion was kept at Alexandria on January 5. The same date is given by Pliny (Nat. Hist. II. 106) for a miraculous flow of wine at the temple of Pater Liber on Andros, and Pausanias confirms that this was a festival of Dionysus. Some have taken this to be related to the celebration of the Cana wedding feast on Epiphany. The discrepancy between January 5 given for these pagan festivals and the Epiphany date of January 6 has not been satisfactorily explained, and the claim of a pagan background for the Epiphany, although frequently encountered, has never been made with such precision as has the appeal to the Roman festival of December 25.

An alternative to this "history of religions" approach was offered by Mgr. Louis Duchesne at the end of the last century, and his suggestion is spoken of today as "the computation hypothesis." Observing that symbolic number systems are intolerant of fractions, he suggested that the date of Christ's death was taken to be also the date of the beginning of his life at his conception, and therefore his nativity was set nine months after that date. Where, as at Rome in the early 3rd century, March 25 was regarded as the date of the passion, assignment of the conception to the same date would yield a nativity date of December 25. In the East, the association of the passion (and conception) with April 6 would give a nativity date of January 6.

As contrived as such a computation may seem to modern minds, it resembles a rabbinic tradition that identified the dates of the births and deaths of the patriarchs, and evidence that theologians in the 4th and following centuries did think in such terms is afforded by Augustine (P.L., 42.849), Chrysostom (P.G., 49.358), and others. January 6, it seems, was known already to Clement of Alexandria at the end of the 2nd century as date of the nativity and as celebration of the baptism of Jesus.

While the influence of Aurelian's festival of sol invictus on the origin of Christmas remains in contention, the computation hypothesis should not be taken to exclude influence from solar symbolism, as Duchesne himself acknowledged. Important elements of both lines of explanation are found in the 4th-century tractate ascribed to Pontius Maximus, De solstitia et aequinoctia conceptionis et nativitatis domini nostri iesu christi et iohannis baptistae (P.L., 22.2.557-568). If the date of Christmas was arrived at independently, we may be sure that the festival atmosphere of Rome around the end of the year contributed greatly to the popularity of the Christian feast.

During the later 4th century, the Western nativity festival spread to Constantinople, Cappadocia and Antioch, and to Alexandria in the following century, leaving the baptism of Jesus the sole content of the Epiphany. At Jerusalem, this separation of the taking of humanity at Bethlehem from the acknowledgement of divine Sonship at the Jordan was strongly resisted by Monophysite elements, and it was only in the 6th century that Christmas was finally adopted in the Holy City. Armenians continued to resist the festival and still do not observe it, celebrating both the nativity and the baptism on Epiphany.

A similar content for the Epiphany was found in Gaul, and its observance there by the emperor Julian in 361, evidently as the sole celebration of the nativity, is recorded by a contemporary historian. In northern Italy a bit later the Epiphany celebrates the baptism of Jesus, or sometimes the first miracle at Cana. Its focus on Bethlehem, and the nativity narrative was divided so that the visit of the Magi provided the content of Epiphany, leading to the common but regrettable narrowing of the meaning of the feast to "the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles." In Gaul, after the adoption of Christmas there, Epiphany celebrated the tria miracula, the visit of the Magi, the baptism in Jordan, and the first miracle at Cana.

The rich content of the festival of the manifestation of God in Christ is more understandable if we see the themes in relation to the beginnings of the gospels. If we may hypothesize that Epiphany was already regarded as the beginning of the liturgical year when we first encounter it in the 2nd century, then we may suppose that it marked the beginning of the reading of a gospel especially associated with a local church. Where, as at Ephesus, that gospel was John, then the festival would celebrate both the incarnation and baptism, followed quickly by the wedding at Cana. At Jerusalem we encounter a fundamental reliance on Matthew, and that would accord with the strong emphasis on the nativity, including the visit of the Magi, there. At Alexandria the favored gospel was Mark, and there the feast celebrates the baptism of Jesus. As communication between churches increased, there was an exchange of influences, and a much more complex picture emerges in the 4th century. Still, behind that complexity may lie simply the reading of one gospel, beginning from the Epiphany, and reaching to the passion narrative at pascha.

Later Egyptian sources, supported by texts as early as the 3rd century, report that the primitive celebration of Christ's baptism there on the Epiphany was followed at once by a fast of forty days, commemorative of Christ's temptation in the wilderness. This was concluded in the sixth and final week with the conferral of baptism and the feast of Palms, celebrating the entry into Jerusalem. All this was distinct from the paschal fast, begun some weeks later, at which the passion narrative must have been read. The conferral of baptism prior to Palm Sunday, retained by the Coptic church today, was in contrast to the custom elsewhere of conferring baptism at Easter, first mentioned by Tertullian in Africa and Hippolytus at Rome, but extended to other churches in the course of the 3rd century. Paschal baptism, also, was preceded by a period of fasting, exorcism, and catechesis. Such prebaptismal fasting was ordered already in Didache, chap. 7, but the one or two days called for there were extended to several weeks when the baptism came to be performed at Easter.

After the Council of Nicea (325), we encounter a general designation of this fast before paschal baptism as "the fast of forty days," and this seems to represent a continuity with the much earlier Alexandrian custom, albeit transferred to the time before the paschal fast. At Rome, those forty days ran from the sixth Sunday before Easter (Quadragesima) to the Thursday before Easter (on which day penitents were reconciled), and the two-day paschal fast of Friday and Saturday followed. At Antioch and Constantinople, the forty days were reckoned from Monday of the seventh week before Easter to Friday of the week preceding Great (Holy) Week, and that fast was broken for two days before the paschal fast of six days was begun on the following Monday. At Constantinople, as in early Alexandria, the Sunday following the close of the forty days was the Feast of Palms.

In the post-Nicene arrangement of the fast, this Feast of Palms was now the Sunday at the head of Holy Week, and in Jerusalem it was marked with a procession with palms down the Mount of Olives. Pilgrims carried that custom back to their homelands, and Palm Sunday came to be recognized as the first day of Holy Week. Although the forty days had first been reckoned as a continuous period, including days not actually fasted, by the 7th century there was a general tendency to extend the fast so that the total number of fast days in the paschal fast and the preceding "Lent" would total forty. At Rome, where Sundays were not fasted, the six weeks yielded but 36 fast days, and four more days were added from the preceding week. This Wednesday, called caput ieiunii, was the occasion for the enrollment of penitents. In Gaul and Germany this ceremony included sprinkling the penitents with ashes, a custom extended to all the people in the 11th century. Since then, the first day of Lent in the Western church has been known as "Ash Wednesday."

Although Lent (a term rooted in Teutonic expressions for spring) refers specifically to the fast before Easter, other fasts of forty days have been observed, and such a fast before Christmas, beginning on November 11, was often referred to as "St. Martin's Lent." This period of six weeks is represented in the Comes of Würzburg (a Roman epistle list dating from 602) by five Sundays, to which was added the Sunday that concluded the older December Embertide. Already in the preaching of Leo in the 5th century, that Embertide drew its themes from the expectation of the second coming of the Lord. In the epistle list, that theme is woven together with expectation of the first coming. Abbreviated at first to five weeks, and then to four, the season of Advent still moves between these two meanings of parousia, Christ's coming at the end of time and his coming in the flesh at the incarnation.

As we have seen, the Feast of the Nativity marked the beginning of the liturgical calendar in the Chronograph of 354. Later liturgical books would precede that with a vigil. Still later, the Advent season was set before the vigil, and the proprium de tempore now moves from the first Sunday of Advent to the Feast of Christ the King on the final Sunday after Pentecost.

C. The Sanctoral Cycle of the Liturgical Calendar. Martyrdom had been a significant concept in all OT spirituality, and the primitive church continued to remember those witnesses "of whom the world was not worthy" (Heb 11:38). Christ's sufferings could be seen within this tradition of martyrdom, but his passion and resurrection marked the beginning of a new age in which his disciples were called, quite literally, to take up the Cross and follow him. Already in the account of the death of the first martyr, Stephen (Acts 7:58-60), Christian martyrdom can be seen as reflecting the death and triumph of Christ himself.

The oldest of the passions of the martyrs preserved to us, The Martyrdom of Polycarp, is in the form of a letter of the Church of Smyrna to the Christian community of Philomelium, written A.D. 156. Here we see explicitly the Christian understanding of martyrdom as imitation of the passion of Christ, and this same document shows already the central elements in the cult of the martyrs: the careful collection and deposition of Polycarp's remains, and regular assemblies at the tomb, "to celebrate the day of his martyrdom as a birthday, in memory of those athletes who have gone before, and to train and make ready those who are to come hereafter" (18:3).

The same connection of the celebration of martyrs with the places of their burial is found in the Chronograph of 354, where the list of martyrs' memorials designates not only the day of the observance, but also the cemetery where it is held. By 336 when that list was prepared, however, the movement of peoples was beginning to qualify that primitive local connection, and there are two commemorations in Rome of African martyrs. No cemetery is assigned for the celebration of Perpetua and Felicity, but the notice of Cyprian adds Romae celebratur in Callisti, assigning the commemoration of the great Bishop of Carthage to the cemetery of Callistus, the preferred burial place of the Bishops of Rome.

A martyrology from somewhat later in the 4th century, preserved today only in a Syriac version dated 411 (London, BM add. 12150) but originally in Greek, reports martyrs' commemorations for the entire church, listing for each day both the martyr venerated and the city where the memorial is made. Here, too, we find one of the earlier mentions of a commemoration of all the martyrs, at Nisibis on the Friday after Easter. Chrysostom in Antioch celebrated such a feast (made necessary by the vast numbers who died under Diocletian) on the Sunday after Pentecost, and this had the effect of prolonging the paschal celebration so that normal fasting was resumed only after this celebration "of all the saints who have suffered martyrdom throughout the world" (P.G., 50.705).

Both of those dates for a feast of all the martyrs may have been known briefly at Rome, but it was the dedication of the old Pantheon by Boniface IV to the Blessed Virgin Mary and all the martyrs on May 13, 609, that provided the major celebration of all the martyrs until the adoption of the alternative western European date, November 1, by Gregory IV in 835.

The linking of the veneration of the martyrs with the Blessed Virgin in that dedication points to the role of Marian devotion in the development of the sanctoral calendar. The Jerusalem lectionaries of the early 5th century (preserved in Armenian) reveal a feast of the Theotokos on August 15, kept at a place three miles from Bethlehem, a place associated with the birth of Christ in the Protoevangelium of James (17:2). This was a celebration of her role as the mother of the Savior (the gospel is Lk 2:1-7), and seems to have had no reference to her death (dormition or assumption). The reason for the choice of this date remains obscure, but this is, nonetheless, the oldest feast of the Blessed Virgin known to us.

In the preceding century, the fortieth day after Epiphany was celebrated at Jerusalem as a commemoration of the meeting with Simeon and the prophetess Anna recorded by Luke (2:22-40), but that festival—now on February 2—has not been considered a feast of Mary consistently. It was only in the 6th century that Justinian promulgated the feast of the Annunciation on March 25, although that date had been associated with the conception of the Lord since at least the 4th century. Here, as in the Presentation or Purification, we are dealing at once with a feast of Christ and of Mary.

In the 7th century, Rome observed on January 1 its first festival of the Blessed Virgin. Eclipsed by other Marian festivals later, that original feast has now been restored to the calendar of the Latin rite.

It is clear that in the 4th century the martyrs were accorded a special place in the economy of salvation, and it could well seem that the sanctoral calendar observed them alone. Whether the list of Depositiones Episcoporum Romanorum in the Chronograph of 354 indicates liturgical commemorations have been disputed, but the dates of the burials of bishops, not martyrs, from 255 to 352 are arranged in calendrical rather than historical order (apart from Marcus and Julius, added later) and the places of burial are indicated. A Carthaginian martyrology of the 6th century bears a title that is explicit: "Here are contained the birthdays of the martyrs and the burials of bishops whose anniversaries the Church of Carthage celebrates." The annual remembrance of the burial of every local bishop, of course, would rather quickly become impracticable, but this does show that the understanding of the liturgical celebration of Christian witness was extending beyond those who gave their lives in the persecutions.

The Carthaginian list also includes the nativity of St. John the Baptist (June 24, the traditional summer solstice date). In 732, Gregory III dedicated (at St. Peter's) a chapel to "the Redeemer, His holy Mother, all the Apostles, Martyrs, Confessors, and all the just and perfect who are at rest throughout the whole world," and that broad understanding of the veneration of saints was reflected in individual feasts in the Gregorian sacramentaries of the 9th century.

III. Festival and Doctrine

The interaction of liturgy and theology is too complex a matter to be treated here, but brief notice must be taken of the ways in which these have related to the liturgical calendar. The very oldest festivals celebrated critical moments in the history of salvation, events of such depth that they included several strata of meaning. The primitive pascha, e.g., made the memorial of Christ's death by celebrating not only his suffering, but the triumph revealed in the resurrection and the glorification completed in the sending of the Spirit upon the church. Later liturgical development sought to reveal that theological richness by assigning the several strata of the complex to separate observances, from Good Friday to Pentecost. Similarly, the Epiphany celebration of the manifestation of God in human history has been a rich theological complex whose several strata were later distinguished in a series of observances from Advent through the Epiphany season.

By contrast to this articulation of the rich theological content of a liturgical mystery, the second millennium saw the introduction of new festivals celebrating a single theological or devotional theme, often a theme inherent in every celebration of the liturgy. The Feast of the Most Holy Trinity, finally acknowledged and made a universal observance in the West by John XXII in 1334 in spite of the protests of predecessors in the 11th and 12th centuries, represents a slow evolution occasioned by incomplete liturgical prescription for the time after Pentecost and fed by preoccupation with theology as an abstract science. From its appearance in the 11th century, the festival grew in importance to the point that in a great many nations of northern Europe it was from Trinity Sunday, rather than Pentecost, that the remaining Sundays of the year were numbered, a convention retained in The Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England, but relinquished in modern Anglican liturgical reforms. Adrian Nocent (Vol. 3, p. 278) has good reason to say, "a celebration of this type could become popular only at a time when the liturgical life and the proper understanding of the Bible were on the wane."

In the 13th century we encounter the first instance of direct papal promulgation of a new festival for the whole church in the Bull Transiturus of Urban IV in 1264, ordering a solemnity in honor of the Blessed Sacrament to be observed on the Thursday after the octave of Pentecost. This institution of the feast of Corpus Christi can hardly be understood apart from the scholastic theological ferment of the day regarding eucharistic consecration, as is shown by the reported miracle at Bolsena that moved the pope to act (a priest tortured by doubts of the Real Presence saw a host turn to bloody flesh).

Much less precise is the object of the Feast of the Sacred Heart, but this, too, represents the establishment of a festival as a promotional or instructional instrument. First kept on August 30 as a very local celebration by John Eudes in the 17th century, the popularity of the devotion was fed by the visionary experience of Margaret Mary Alacoque, and the feast was made universal for the Latin rite by Pius IX in 1856, set on the Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi.

In 1925, Pius XI established the Feast of Christ the King, in the hope that it might be a vehicle for spiritual teaching in the face of growing secularization, as he said in the encyclical of promulgation, Quas primas. Set then on the Sunday before All Saints' Day, it has been moved in recent reform to the final Sunday after Pentecost, where, as the Sunday before Advent, it better reinforces the older liturgical structures of the Christian Year.

IV. Deformation and Reformation of the Liturgical Calendar

We have already observed how certain of the calendrical concerns of the early church were vitiated even in the latter years of the 4th century (e.g., the introduction of a preparatory fast before the Ascension). The wider interpretation accorded the veneration of saints, when martyrdom became more rare after the major persecutions, led to ever greater concentrations of sanctoral commemorations. Further, the celebration of more and more festivals over a period of eight days, an octave, led to increasing complication of the calendar, as did the observance of vigils preceding them. The resulting conflicts between observances competing for available time in the calendar required a system of rankings and rules of precedence of dizzying complexity.

At the same time, the past hundred years have seen the historical study of the liturgy illuminate afresh the broad lines of the tradition as it emerged from the OT into the NT to give shape to the proclamation of the gospel. Those studies have given rise to extensive reformation of particular observances and of the liturgical calendar itself in most Western churches, with the Roman Catholic church taking the lead. As with the original development of the cycle of annual observances, this reform began with the restoration of the Paschal Vigil in 1951, followed four years later by the restoration of all the rites of Holy Week.

The first document of the Second Vatican Council, the justly renowned Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, devoted its fifth chapter to "The Liturgical Year." There it was decreed that the weekly Lord's Day is the original feast day of the paschal mystery on which the church hears the word of God and participates in the eucharist, and it is to be given preference over any other observance unless one of the greatest importance (S.C., 106). Revision was called for to allow the keeping of traditional customs and discipline of the seasons in accordance with modern times, so that they truly nourish the piety of the faithful (S.C., 107). The proper of seasons is to be given preference over feasts of saints, "so that the entire cycle of the mysteries of salvation may be suitably recalled" (S.C., 108). The two-fold character of Lent, as preparation for baptism and as time of penitence, is to be brought into greater prominence in teaching and liturgical observance, with restoration of such disused baptismal features as may seem desirable (S.C., 109). The penitential observance of Lent should be not just individual, but social and external, in ways that are appropriate to our times and places; the paschal fast, however, is to be kept sacred, observed on Good Friday and, where feasible, extended throughout Holy Saturday (S.C., 110). Finally the feasts of saints should not take precedence over the feasts which commemorate the mysteries of salvation, and to that end only those of truly universal importance are to be extended to the whole church; others can be observed by a particular church or nation or family of religious (S.C., 111).

That program of reform eloquently invokes the authentic tradition, and its main lines have been adopted by virtually all Western churches with strong liturgical traditions. The centrality of the paschal mystery on every Sunday is firmly established, although traditions will differ slightly as to what other festivals may be observed on Sunday. The annual celebration of pascha with the paschal fast and vigil has been restored to a prominence and solemnity that were absent in the first half of this century, and the baptismal reference of Lent has been reasserted, especially where there is an active catechumenate. The integrity of the fifty days of rejoicing has been carefully implemented, and the latter weeks of the time after Pentecost admirably build on eschatological themes leading to the celebration of Christ's reign, which leads again into expectation for his adventus. The veneration of the saints reflects the richness and the variety of the many cultures and traditions that make up the church, while those that belong to the common deposit of scripture and tradition are celebrated more widely. While not all anomalies have been resolved, such differences as still distinguish the local liturgical calendars of churches and nations are, for the most part, such differences as the tradition has always known.

That recovery of authentic tradition, however, only casts a stronger light upon the most glaring scandal in the Christian liturgical articulation of time, i.e., our continuing division regarding the date of Easter, a problem that in one way or another has plagued Christianity since the 2nd century. This division brings us face to face with the profoundly demanding problems of truly ecumenical convergence, but in 1969 a gracious initiative of the Ecumenical Patriarch proposed a universal determination of the date as the second Sunday of April, and the welcome reception accorded his proposal in the West suggests that here, too, the Spirit is moving in the church.

CATECHESIS, LITURGICAL

Introduction

The word catechesis literally means a "sounding down," a "re-echoing down to another" (from the Greek katēchein; kata = down, and ēchein = to sound). Early Christians adopted the word in their follow-up work of teaching the gospel and used it to mean "instruction given by word of mouth" (e.g., Lk 1:4; Acts 18:25; 1 Cor 14:19; Gal 6:6). The word liturgy literally means "work of/for the people" (from the Greek leitourgia; laïtos / lēitos = of the people, the laos, and ergon = work). In general usage, the word stood for "an act of public service." Early Christians adopted the word to mean acts of service to others, donations, etc. on behalf of the gospel (e.g., Phil 2:30; Rom 15:27; 2 Cor 9:12), the offering of Christian life as a sacrifice (e.g., Rom 15:16), and acts of public worship (e.g., Acts 13:2; Heb 8:2, 6). For the early community there was an obvious continuity and flow from preaching the gospel to catechesis, from catechesis to liturgy, from liturgy to further catechesis and to gospel service. The common goal of this combined pastoral ministry was to nurture the disciples on their journey of conversion, faith, Christian living, and witness.

By the 19th century, the relationship between catechesis and liturgy had been severed for the most part; they occupied separate pastoral niches. Catechesis had been narrowed down to a question-and-answer instruction in the truths of the faith which were set down in a catechism and presented, primarily to children, for intellectual assent and understanding. Liturgy had been narrowed both in pastoral practice and in theory. Pastorally, liturgy was understood as the "ceremony" performed publicly by the priest before a passive congregation for the honor and glory of God; theologically, liturgy was reduced to the essential minimum (matter and form) required to "confect" a sacrament.

In the past century, both catechesis and liturgy have gone through an extended process of renewal, and new questions now arise about how they are related and what shape liturgical catechesis might take. This article will survey the parallel renewal movements, suggest a vision of a holistic pastoral ministry which draws catechesis and liturgy into close relationship, and reflect on the nature and key qualities of liturgical catechesis.

Two Renewal Movements

The liturgical and catechetical movements have common roots in the mid and late 19th century. In church life, as in society in general, a movement of "return to the origins" was underway. The past was to be retrieved, however, not in a static form, but in an organic process. The unfolding character of human history was increasingly accepted. The same sense of historicity and process was at work in the study of human life, with attention to human growth and development. During this period, historical research in the writings of the Fathers and in the Bible spawned the patristic and biblical movements. A new ecclesiology elaborated a more active and organic sense of community and community life and action. It was in this context that the liturgical and catechetical movements took shape.

Liturgical Movement

The liturgical movement unfolded in a series of four phases. The first phase, in the latter part of the 19th century and through the turn of this century, has been called the monastic phase. At the Abbey of Solesmes in France, Dom Guéranger spearheaded a study of the liturgy and particularly a revival of Gregorian chant. In this phase the liturgical movement was more intent on restoring a liturgy to be celebrated in a monastic setting than on adapting it to the pastoral needs of the church at large.

The second phase, the pastoral phase, was inaugurated by Pius X's motu proprio on church music, Tra le Sollecitudini (1903), and by Dom Beauduin, under whose leadership a conference held in Malines, Belgium, in 1909 called for an extension and a more pastoral orientation of the liturgical movement. In this period the liturgy came to be seen as the center of Christian life and spirituality, and priority was given to the "active participation" of the people, a phrase first used officially by Pius X. Early and frequent communion was promoted, community singing was restored, the Roman missal was translated to provide a devotional manual for the people, and the liturgy's power to instruct people in Christian faith and life was rediscovered. These pastoral concerns, fostered first in Belgium and Austria (esp. by Josef Jungmann and Pius Parsch) and later in America (esp. by Dom Virgil Michel, who was equally devoted to issues of justice), found support in a renewal of liturgical and sacramental theology. In Germany, Dom Odo Casel inspired a theological discussion on the active presence of Christ in the liturgical assembly which was to influence the teachings of both Pius XII and Vatican II and contribute to the "encounter model" of sacrament later developed by Schillebeeckx and others.

The third phase began with Pius XII's encyclical on the liturgy, Mediator Dei (1947), and continued through the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (S.C.) promulgated in 1963 by Vatican II. During this period the central agenda of the pastoral phase of the liturgical movement received full ecclesiastical approval. In his encyclical, Pius XII officially set aside the purely ceremonial understanding of liturgy and spoke of it as the public worship of the entire mystical body, head and members. The Easter Vigil was restored (1951) and Holy Week was reformed (1955), returning the paschal mystery to its central liturgical position. Guidelines were given for increased participation (De Musica Sacra, 1955), and the ceremonies of the liturgy were simplified (1955). During the 1950s there was also a series of national and international conferences on liturgy which brought together pastoral and theological concerns and prepared the way for the discussions of Vatican II. S.C., 7 contains the heart of the council's teaching on the liturgy, that Christ is present in the liturgy in many ways and that the liturgy is the action not just of the priest, but of Christ and his body, the church. Several things follow: full, conscious, and active participation is the baptismal right and duty of every Christian (S.C., 14); appropriate liturgical instruction is to be provided for the faithful so that they can participate both internally and externally (S.C., 14, 19); and the rites are to be celebrated with assembly present and actively participating (S.C., 27).

The fourth phase, the time since the council, has been one of implementation and renewal. The Roman rites have been revised under the direction of the Consilium established to oversee implementation of the liturgical reforms of Vatican II, and they have been translated into English by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (I.C.E.L.). Extensive programs of instruction and catechesis have been an integral part of the liturgical renewal project.

Throughout the post-conciliar work of reform and renewal, the full, conscious, and active participation of the faithful has remained the most fundamental pastoral goal and principle.

Catechetical Movement

The 19th-century themes of return to the origins, historicity and process, and human growth and development which influenced the liturgical movement helped to shape the catechetical movement as well. Dissatisfied with the catechism approach, forged as it was in counter-Reformation polemic and speculative theology, religious educators turned to human psychology, particularly to theories of learning, and later to developmental psychology for help in renewing catechesis. This led to the concern for effective catechetical methods which characterized the first phase of the catechetical movement early in this century. The "Munich method," devised in Germany in the early 1900s and imported into the U.S. in the 1920s, later inspired parallel attempts in Italy, France, and Spain. Attention to how humans learn and to the value of action and of learning by doing are common motifs that have lasted beyond the "methods" phase into present catechesis.

In the 1930s the catechetical movement entered a second phase, usually designated the "kerygmatic" phase. Josef Jungmann's The Good News and Our Own Preaching of the Faith, published in 1936, triggered a shift of attention from method to content. The message handed on in catechesis is the "kerygma," the history of salvation centered in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. The goal of catechesis is a living faith which responds to God's call to us in Jesus. Subsequent catechetical theory and documents have retained both the Christo-centrism and the centrality of the word espoused in the "kerygmatic" phase. Another leader during this phase, Johannes Hofinger, stressed that catechesis is a form of pastoral ministry, specifically a form of ministry of the word. This theme was to become a staple of the catechetical movement as well, and it was incorporated into the Vatican II decrees on missionary activity (A.G.) and the pastoral office of bishops (C.D.). Method is not neglected, however; it is refocused on the "four languages"—biblical, liturgical, existential, and doctrinal—in which the "kerygma" is addressed to us. This "pedagogy of signs" was developed in the 1940s and 1950s, particularly at the Lumen Vitae center in Brussels, and has left its mark on the National Catechetical Directory (N.C.D.) of the U.S. National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB). During these decades there was a convergence between the catechetical and liturgical movements not only thematically, but also in major figures involved in both movements, e.g., Josef Jungmann and Virgil Michel.

The third phase of the catechetical movement, still underway, is often characterized as the "missionary" or "political" phase. Earlier stress on saving history during the kerygmatic quickly led to a complementary concern for contemporary human experience. A series of international study weeks, especially those from Eichstätt (1960) through Medellín (1968), provided a natural transition from the emerging anthropological concerns into missionary and political concerns. These study weeks, all held in third world countries except for Eichstätt, set the theme of catechesis in the context of mission. The understanding that catechesis is a form of ministry of the word, elaborated in the second phase and sanctioned at Vatican II, was expanded and nuanced in these study weeks. Catechesis is seen as the continuation of the proclamation of the "kerygma" first accomplished in evangelization, just as evangelization is the continuation of pre-evangelization. For this total ministry of the word to be effective, it must address people in their own context. As the third world experience readily illustrates, that context is a complex web of political, cultural, socio-economic, and environmental factors. Themes of justice and liberation become part and parcel of the catechetical message. And the experiential catechesis that had long been a part of the catechetical movement and an area of significant U.S. contribution can no longer be content to focus on isolated individual experience; it must attend to the larger issues woven into human interdependence on local, national, and global scales.

Convergence and Divergence

There are many points of convergence in the two renewal movements. Common themes and motifs run through both: the centrality of Christ, the preeminence of the word, the need for actively engaging the people not only as recipients but also as primary agents of catechesis and liturgy, the dynamics of process and address-response common to both activities, and the need for a more symbolic, holistic approach to the process of learning and celebrating.

The seeds of a potential divergence of interests and energy are also latent in the rhythms of the two movements. As noted, in its third phase the maturing liturgical movement won ecclesiastical approval which culminated in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II. The current phase has been one of consolidation and implementation. The signals being given in liturgical documents on the relation between catechesis and liturgy are somewhat mixed. In the constitution itself (S.C., 14, 19), as in much subsequent documentation implementing the liturgical reform, the vision of liturgical catechesis seems to be limited to an immediate program of "liturgical instruction" on the revised rites and their meaning. Nevertheless, the restoration of the catechumenate has laid the foundations for a much broader vision of a pre-baptismal and post-baptismal catechesis integrated into a process of pastoral care and ritual celebrations (R.C.I.A., 75, 244-247).

By contrast, in the current "political" or "missionary" phase, the maturation and ecclesiastical approval of the catechetical movement have taken place in obvious interdependence, and the vision of catechesis is generally much larger. The themes of Christo-centrism and the placing of catechesis within an unfolding ministry of the word so prominent in the second and third phases of the movement had a strong impact on various conciliar decrees, especially those on the pastoral office of the bishops (1965), which affirmed the primacy of ministry of the word (C.D., 12-13, 44), and on missionary activity (1965), which set the catechumenate within the pastoral task of evangelization (A.G., 13-15).

Three particular lines of mutual influence between the catechetical movement and official documents can be traced. First, the decree on the pastoral office of the bishops mandated the preparation of the General Catechetical Directory for the instruction of the Christian people (C.D., 44).

That General Catechetical Directory (G.C.D.) appeared in 1971 and influenced both the First International Catechetical Congress in Rome (1971) and the preparation of national statements and directories such as the NCCB's Basic Teachings for Catholic Religious Education (1973) and Sharing the Light of Faith: National Catechetical Directory (1977; N.C.D.). Second, the decree on missionary activity helped set the agenda and theological vision for subsequent international catechetical study weeks which explored the relationship between missionary activity and catechesis in the third world context. That linking of themes extended through the First International Catechetical Congress held in Rome (1971) to the General Synod on evangelization in the modern world (1974) and the General Synod on catechesis in the modern world (1977).

These synods led to the apostolic exhortations of Paul VI, Evangelii Nuntiandi (E.N.) in 1975, and John Paul II's, Catechesi Tradendae (C.T.) in 1979. In these two strands of mutual influence there is a consistent stress on seeing catechesis as a form of ministry of the word within the pastoral office of the church. The third line of influence reaches from the conciliar decree on Christian education (1965) to the NCCB's pastoral message on Catholic education, To Teach As Jesus Did (1972). In these documents, as in the NCCB's Basic Teachings, concern for the integral content of catechesis becomes prominent.

Catechesis and Liturgy

The above survey suggests that there is a close relation between catechesis and liturgy (C.T., 23; N.C.D., 36, 113) and that there should be collaboration between them (N.C.D., 139). In both pastoral practice and theological discussion, however, catechesis and liturgy sometimes seem to co-exist or even to go off in different directions, making the link between them tenuous at best. Closer reflection on the relationship is needed.

The first and most important task may be to recover a vision of a more integral pastoral care which embraces both catechesis and liturgy. Three memories preserved in our tradition offer such a vision.

Emmaus. The first is the story of the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, the story of the "first eucharist" in the Christian community. In that story we find two disciples journeying away from the land in Jerusalem, their world in disarray, their inchoate faith in Jesus as the Messiah shattered. Their words to the stranger, "we were hoping that he would be the one . . ." (Lk 24:21), reveal the depth of their disillusionment. The stranger, with the care of a host, draws out their experience in all its hurt and bewilderment. And when their story is finished, he retells it from another point of view, that of its victory. "Did not the Messiah have to undergo all this so as to enter into his glory?" (24:27). Their hearts captivated by his recasting of their experience, they invite him to stay with them. In return, he once again hosts them, this time in the breaking of the bread. "With that their eyes were opened and they recognized him" (24:31). Now they are able to name the burning in their hearts, and newly born in the Easter faith of disciples, they immediately rise to return to those from whom they had fled, with a mission to tell them "what had happened on the road and how they had come to know him in the breaking of the bread" (24:35).

Several comments are in order. The journey of the two is a journey from a shattered first faith to full Easter faith. To use contemporary terms, it is a journey from pastoral encounter to catechesis, from catechesis to liturgy, and from liturgy to mystagogy and mission. The catechesis was effective only because the stranger first listened to their story and only then retold it in familiar biblical words. Its effect was to set their hearts burning and to prepare them for the ritual moment that followed. It was only because the catechesis had thus readied them, that they were able to recognize him in the breaking of the bread, to know him as the Risen Lord and themselves as believing disciples. And it was only because that moment of recognition was so powerful that they were compelled into a mission of witness and service to the others. The connection between catechesis and liturgy is unbroken, and the stranger is the model host-catechist-liturgist.

Pentecost. The second memory is enshrined in the story of the "first initiation" in the early community, the sequel to the Pentecost story. In that story, two questions, two moments, and two thresholds frame the experience of the first converts to the new way. After witnessing the Pentecostal event, they are filled with amazement and even a little cynicism about new wine. Their initial question is one of idle curiosity: "What does this mean?" (Acts 2:12). This question triggers a kerygmatic moment in which Peter cites prophet and psalm to cast a different light on what they have experienced. Their question now becomes deeply personal: "What are we to do, brothers?" (2:37). In asking this new question they have crossed a threshold, from a curiosity of the mind to the searching of a heart now open to conversion and faith. Their question invites a catechetical moment in which Peter instructs them and urges them to "save yourselves from this generation" (2:40). "Those who accepted his message" (2:41) have crossed a second threshold on their journey to faith. And so they were baptized and "added (to the community) that day" (2:41). The account ends with an idealized description of their life in common (2:42-47).

Again, a few words are in order. The account reveals a nuanced connection between evangelization and catechesis staged to address the developing quest of the converts. As in the Emmaus story, their human experience provides the starting point, and their questions mark new stages along the way. And as in the Emmaus story, catechesis leads to a profession of faith set in a context of ritual action, and this moment is prolonged into mystagogy, liturgical celebration, and mutual service.

The Catechumenate. The third illustration is not only a memory, for the ancient catechumenate has now been restored in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.). In the R.C.I.A., catechesis and ritual celebration are brought back together, especially in the periods of the catechumenate proper (R.C.I.A., 75) and of mystagogy (R.C.I.A., 244-247). Together catechesis and liturgy are set into an unfolding process, a spiritual journey (R.C.I.A., 4-5). Christ in his paschal mystery stands at the center of the process (R.C.I.A., 8), and the entire community is charged with active responsibility for the initiation of new members (R.C.I.A., 9). The R.C.I.A. brings to realization what both the catechetical and the liturgical movements have sought to recover.

Catechesis and Liturgy. Gathering some motifs from the longer tradition's vision, it can be said that catechesis and liturgy are linked intrinsically to each other; liturgy without catechesis can easily become an impoverished, hollow ritualism, and catechesis which does not issue into liturgy can become too intellectualized (C.T., 23). Both are rooted in faith; in its own way each expresses, nurtures, and strengthens that faith as it enables people to reflect on its meaning in their lives. The goals of both are the same: to enable people to live the gospel, to be a prophetic voice in their world, and to share their faith and way of life with the next generation.

There is also a certain overlapping of the two that resists too radical a separation. Liturgy itself has a formative power (N.C.D., 36), exercised through proclamation of the word and symbolic ritual gesture. As a ministry of the word, catechesis also has a formative power to shape faith through reflection on what the word proclaimed and celebrated means for daily Christian life; in a sense catechesis itself is celebrative.

Catechesis and liturgy are not identical, however. In the larger sweep of pastoral care, catechesis first prepares people for full, conscious, and active participation in the liturgy and then helps them reflect back on the worship experience to relate it to daily life (N.C.D., 113), so that catechesis and liturgy are caught up in a recurring cycle in which each reinforces the other.

To clarify the relationship between catechesis and liturgy further, catechesis can be described as a systematic, sustained effort to reflect on God's word made known to us in scriptures, in liturgical proclamation and sacramental celebration, and in our experience on Christian life and service in the world, so that we may respond to God more fully. This understanding, central to kerygmatic catechesis and the pedagogy of signs, points to an important aspect of the relation between catechesis and liturgy. In catechesis the immediacy of God's call experienced in proclamation, celebration, and living service gives way to reflective appropriation of that experience. The classical theological dictum that liturgy is "first theology" and that what theologians do is "second theology" offers us a parallel. Liturgy with its formative power is a "first catechesis," while the systematic reflection on that experience done under the guidance of a catechist is "second catechesis."

Liturgical Catechesis

What, then, is liturgical catechesis and what qualities are to be sought in shaping an effective liturgical catechesis?

Scope and Range. One functional description of catechesis reads: "Within the scope of pastoral activity, catechesis is the term to be used for that form of ecclesial action which leads both communities and individual members of the faithful to maturity of faith" (G.C.D., 21). In this view, the task of catechesis is "to foster mature faith" (N.C.D., 33), to "put people not only in touch, but in communion, in intimacy with Jesus Christ" (C.T., 5). Similarly, the function of liturgical catechesis is to enable people to participate actively, both internally and externally (S.C., 19), in the liturgy which celebrates that faith.

As the name itself suggests, liturgical catechesis is only one part of that larger catechetical ministry. Naming it liturgical catechesis implies a narrowing of the catechetical focus in some way. One such focus is to make liturgy the object, the content of the catechesis. If this is the only focus, liturgical catechesis risks making people self-conscious worshippers and turning their symbols into didactic signs. Another way to narrow the focus is to give the catechetical process a liturgical framework and orientation. Various forms of prayer and celebration are incorporated into the catechetical process, so that participants experience a movement from prayer to reflection to celebration. For example, catechumens gather not only for instruction, but also around the word and for blessings, anointings, and scrutinies. A third way to focus on the liturgy is to use liturgical experience as a source for catechetical reflection, not just on the liturgy itself, but on the relationship between God and God's people celebrated in the liturgy. Though it is the most difficult of the three, this way of focusing liturgical catechesis is most central to its task.

In keeping with the model established for initiation, two kinds of liturgical catechesis should be distinguished. The R.C.I.A. calls for pre-baptismal catechesis and post-baptismal catechesis (mystagogia). The norm for every sacrament would then be both pre-sacramental and post-sacramental catechesis. The first prepares recipients for a sacramental rite, takes place in a specific period, and is of a more general, elementary kind; the second is life-long and leads people to reflect on their sacramental experience and its meaning for their lives (N.C.D., 6). In pre-sacramental catechesis, rehearsal of the rites and detailed interpretation of the symbols are far less important than a spiritual readying of the recipients to live into the liturgical moment when their growing relationship with the Lord is marked with a distinctive sacramental sign. Invitation into that relationship and formation in the symbolic ways, both human and religious, in which it is expressed take pastoral priority for this catechesis. In post-sacramental catechesis, the liturgical experience of God's presence and action provides the starting point and focus for the catechetical reflection. In broad strokes, this mystagogia might simply be described as the reflective continuation of the "opening up of symbols" begun in the liturgy itself (N.C.C.B., Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, 15).

Desired Qualities. Liturgical catechesis should be Christ-centered, formative-transformative, communal, and experientially-based.

Christ-centered. The first concern of liturgical catechesis is to help people develop the individual and communal relationship to the crucified and risen Christ first nurtured and sacramentalized in the experience of Christian initiation (R.C.I.A., 8). Christ is the center of Christian life, liturgy, and catechesis, and his paschal mystery is the focal point for all Christian spirituality. The ultimate concern of liturgical catechesis is not liturgical history, the rites, symbolic objects, or the truths "taught" by the liturgy, but the person of Jesus and how the assembled people meet God in him. The key sources for liturgical catechesis are to be found where that Jesus is revealed to his disciples: in the proclaimed word, in sacramental gesture, and in the living witness of those who live as his disciples.

Formative-transformative. Liturgical catechesis, like all catechesis and like the liturgy itself, is a formative experience. Formation in faith and conversion would thus seem to be the appropriate goal for both. But entering into and growing in a relationship with Christ is ultimately a transformative experience accomplished only through the work of the Spirit. The appropriate goal of both liturgy and catechesis is to form people in a way that invites them into transformation; neither can be so programmed as to transform people automatically. The same holds true of liturgical catechesis; it forms for the sake of transformation. And since transformation is a journey of faith and conversion that takes a lifetime, liturgical catechesis is needed by disciples of every age according to their level of development (S.C., 19; N.C.D., 177-189), with a certain primacy accorded to adult catechesis as the "chief form of catechesis" (N.C.D., 188).

Communal. By its very nature liturgy is a communal action. The assembly itself is the most important of the liturgical signs (N.C.C.B., Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, 28). The very act of gathering, the constant use of the first person plural in public prayer, the common hearing of the word of God, and the one sacramental action in which all participate shape the liturgical experience as a communal one in which the people meet Christ together. Liturgical catechesis needs a setting and a format in which the reflection on the meaning of the liturgical experience can be done in common, since the meaning is a public, shared meaning. Liturgical catechesis should also be communal in the sense that it is the common work of all in the community. All are to accept the formative role their witness has for others (R.C.I.A., 9) and adults in particular are to play a central role in their own catechesis (N.C.D., 185).

Experientially-based. If catechesis in general should be concerned with making people attentive to their more significant experiences (G.C.D., 74), this holds especially true for liturgical catechesis. And if it is crucial for any learning method to take account, not only of goals and the learners, but also of the subject to be studied, liturgical catechesis needs to devise methodologies that are attentive to what is most characteristic of the liturgical experience. Four such characteristics stand out.

First, liturgical celebration is repetitious. General structural patterns of gathering and sending, word and action, prescribed ritual dialogue, and patterned action repeat themselves in almost every rite. Within a given liturgical rite most words are prescribed, even prescribed, and the ritual interactions are stylized and predictable. Like all ritual, liturgy is a "known language" in which people dwell and which they use, not to create a totally new story, but to tell of and mark a journey of discipleship already underway.

Second, liturgical celebration is symbolic in expression. This is true not only of ritual actions, but to a great extent of the words as well. Liturgy conveys its meaning not in an explanatory, didactic fashion, but in a metaphoric, evocative way. Symbols speak to the whole persons in whole ways, not just to the mind for the sake of information-sharing. Space, time, action, and speech form a highly non-verbal array of interlocking liturgical languages. In addition, the symbols used in the liturgy have roots not only in religious tradition, but also in human usage. For example, bathing and anointing someone, or sharing food together, serve as both human and religious symbols. Religious symbolism typically incorporates and builds on human symbolism.

Third, liturgical celebration is at its core symbolic ritual action. Ritual is its own way of valuing and knowing, prior to and often without words. Liturgical rites enact meaning rather than talk about it. In liturgy, God and people literally keep covenant in Christ, in the remembrance of his dying and rising. Liturgy is a saying-doing of the complete God-human Amen uttered in Christ (2 Cor 1:20).

Fourth, liturgical celebration is repeated symbolic ritual action which the people do together. Though each one in the assembly can find personal meaning in the rites, the meaning symbolically enacted is a shared, public meaning which goes beyond personal meanings. In the moment of ritual, individual stories and journeys are transposed and become part of the larger story told and enacted in memory of what God has done in Christ.

These four characteristics together urge that liturgical catechesis follow a procedure which does several things. From the perspective of human experience, liturgical catechesis first evokes the experience beneath liturgical symbols such as bathing with water and anointing with oil, and not just in its individual expression but also in its cultural, political, and socio-economic context. It attends to the dark side of the symbols as well as the bright side, e.g., that we both bond and fight with food. Second, it enables people to interpret that experience in its fullness and in the light of God's word revealed in Jesus and handed on to us in the community, such as the memory of the breaking of the bread. Third, it entrusts to people the task of living out that human experience in the world in full consonance with the faith, so they may spread the story of how they came to know him. What this means from the religious point of view, first, is that liturgical catechesis will start with the people's experience of the liturgy itself and pay careful attention to the ways in which symbol and ritual help them to see and mark the place of God's presence and action in their lives and to hear the call to further conversion. Second, the larger liturgical tradition will be presented as a living history of a people at prayer to the God who walks as a companion on the journey, so that we can more easily relate to that story. Third, the meaning liturgy is to have for people today and tomorrow will not be imposed but called forth in the creative meeting of contemporary human experience and the received tradition.

Conclusion

The twin renewal movements in liturgy and catechesis have opened the way to a closer collaboration between these two ministries. A more holistic vision of pastoral ministry in which liturgy and catechesis support and complement each other can now be recovered. Out of that vision, a liturgical catechesis that is Christ-centered, formative-transformative, communal, and experientially-based can take shape.

CATECHUMENATE

The catechumenate is a period of formation of undetermined length during which an individual desiring incorporation into the Christian community prays, studies and discerns in conjunction both with others who seek the faith and with members of the faith community who are chosen to assist these individuals.

Incorporation into the Christian community demands a conversion of life, a transformation of the individual in Christ. Erik Erikson demonstrates the significance of stages in development of the human person within the human community. Ritual plays a significant role in Erikson's process of becoming an adult member of a given society.

Generally, initiation into any society places a balance between the needs of the individual and those of the community. The individual needs to be accepted, to experience a sense of belonging, to accept as one's own the philosophy of the group. The community on the other hand needs assurance that the new member will be one who will live the life professed by the group and will support the members of the group in their pursuit of life within the community.

The Christian community lives the life of Christ. Conversion to this life in Christ implies acceptance of the challenge offered by Christ to his followers to bring about the kingdom through the proclamation of the gospel. Thus one who desires incorporation into this body, the church, evidences a passion for this mission of Christ. Membership in the church is not limited to an adherence to rules and teachings. It is a way of life: a life lived in relationship with Christ, particularly through prayer; a life lived in relationship with the Christian community, particularly through the proclamation of the gospel as evidenced in an approach to life and in the expression of the unity which exists within the church in the liturgy.

Historical evidence points to the presence of a catechumenate in the ante-Nicene communities. During the period of the catechumenate (which lasted from several months to years), the individual experienced a growth in the acceptance of the Christian way of life. Members of the community worked with the individual to enter into a change of life style. During the period of the catechumenate, the candidates led a life of prayer and fasting. Various rituals were used to mark transition moments during the course of these years of discernment on the part of the individual and of the community.

Included among the decrees of the Second Vatican Council is the call for the restoration of the catechumenate: "The catechumenate for adults, comprising several distinct steps, is to be restored and brought into use at the discretion of the local ordinary. By this means the time of the catechumenate, which is intended as a period of suitable instruction, may be sanctified by sacred rites to be celebrated at successive intervals of time" (S.C., 64).

The challenge set forth in the Liturgy Constitution was met with the promulgation of the Rite for the Christian Initiation of Adults in January of 1972. Included in the decree from the Congregation for Divine Worship is the reception of the council's call for the restoration of the catechumenate.

The catechumenate is preceded by a period of evangelization often referred to as the pre-catechumenate. During this period, the Good News of salvation is heard for the first time by the individual who begins to inquire into the faith. Those who are not yet members of the Christian community are introduced to gospel values as they meet informally with Christians and begin to hear of the love of God for them.

The catechumenate is a period of formation in the Christian way of life; it is a time for discernment and prayer. While the various dogmas and precepts of the church are introduced by priest or catechist, primary emphasis is placed on hearing the word of God within the context of the assembled faithful and then discussing how that word might transform the lives of all, in particular, the lives of the catechumens. The catechumens are formed by their participation in the communal life of the assembly including its apostolic works, by instruction and through participation in the various liturgical rites.

The individual seeking incorporation into the Christian community generally participates in the order of catechumens, a group of individuals who participate in the formation process together, sharing faith with members of the community and participating in the various apostolic works of the community. While responsibility for the formation of the catechumens is given to the entire community, some members are chosen to minister directly to the process. It is with these individuals that the catechumens meet to listen to the word and share faith within the context of a liturgy of the word.

Catechists and other ministers encourage the catechumens to enter into reflections on the word in dialogue with their life experiences. This lectionary-based catechesis is based on readings from the Bible which yield the church's self-identity. Rather than being didactic, this liturgical catechesis breaks open the word of God for the catechumen. Catechesis is not simply education but conversion, and conversion takes time.

Catechesis takes place within the context of prayer. Liturgical rites during this period are designed to assist in the formation of the catechumens. The public nature of these rites underscores the fact that not only the catechumen but the entire Christian community is in the process of entering into a new relationship.

The first of the rituals of the catechumenate is the "Rite of Acceptance into the Order of Catechumens." In the presence of the assembly, the priest or deacon greets the catechumens and their sponsors. During the liturgy, the catechumens are marked with the sign of the cross and are given the book of gospels during the liturgy of the word. The names of the catechumens are written in the registry and, after the community prays over them, they are dismissed. They will not participate in the liturgy of the eucharist until the Easter vigil.

While these are the general signs of acceptance suggested by the ritual, other optional rites are permitted where a particular culture might have a distinct ritual act associated with such an acceptance.

Once accepted into the order of catechumens, the individual now enjoys a particular relationship with the Christian community. Each catechumen will hear the word proclaimed within the context of the assembled body weekly. In the event of death during this period, the catechumen will be buried as a member of the community.

The length of time spent by any individual in the catechumenate will depend on the particular needs of that person and of the community. While catechumens enter into the conversion process with others seeking incorporation, the group is not a class but rather individuals sharing faith as they hear the word in common. Therefore, some members of the group might be ready to enter the next period of formation before others.

In addition to participation in the weekly gatherings for the celebration of the word, various liturgical rituals are suggested during the period of the catechumenate. Great flexibility is suggested in the use of the various minor exorcisms, blessings and rites of anointing offered for use during this time in the life of the individual undergoing conversion. Catechists, priests, deacons or other ministers lead the catechumens in prayer and offer the various rituals when deemed appropriate.

Of great significance to the entire catechumenate is the season of Lent often called the great retreat of preparation for the celebration of the sacraments at the Easter vigil. On the first Sunday of Lent catechumens appear before the assembled community where testimony is given of those involved in their formation. The church then accepts this testimony and chooses the catechumens for entry into the church. Generally, the election on the part of the church is presided over by the bishop. The ritual of election is followed by the enrollment of names of the catechumens in the book of those seeking initiation.

Now, the "elect" participate in the Lenten celebrations as the final stage of their preparation. During this period of purification and enlightenment their spiritual formation is more intense. Godparents play a more direct role in the process as they assist the catechumen to achieve an ever deeper awareness of the presence of Christ working in their lives.

Particular ritual components assist the process. Within the liturgy, during the Sundays of Lent, scrutinies with their accompanying exorcisms are included in the liturgy of the word to assist the catechumen in the conversion process. During the final days of Lent, after the completion of scrutinies, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer are formally presented to the candidates.

CHALICE, MODES OF DISTRIBUTION OF

When communion under both species of bread and wine was partially restored in the Roman rite in 1965, the Apostolic See permitted four different modes of distributing the consecrated wine: (1) direct administration of the cup, (2) intinction, (3) the rite with a tube, and (4) the rite with a spoon. The directives to be observed for these four modes of administration are found in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal, nn. 244-252.

Among the four modes, the Holy See has judged that the direct administration of the cup to the communicant is preferable, that it "ranks first" (D.O.L., 2115). The National Conference of Catholic Bishops (N.C.C.B.) has made this the policy for the United States: "Because of its ancient sign value 'ex institutione Christi,' Communion from the cup or chalice is always to be preferred to any other form of ministrin blood" (N.C.C.B., n. 44). The gospels record Jesus' command to eat the bread and drink from the cup of wine given to his disciples at the Last Supper, and to continue doing this in his memory. Direct reception from the cup most effectively signifies fidelity to this dominical command.

The cup is administered by a deacon, assisting priest, acolyte, or special minister of the eucharist. When presenting the cup, the minister says, "The blood of Christ," and the communicant responds, "Amen." If there are no other ministers present, the presiding priest himself separately administers the bread and wine, or he can request from the assembly the assistance of one or more persons, observing the "Rite of Commissioning a Special Minister to Distribute Holy Communion on a Single Occasion" in the Roman Pontifical. There must always be a minister of the cup; the minister is part of the sign of communion, signifying Christ's giving himself through the ministry of the church. Church discipline prohibits communicants from taking the cup directly from the altar, or passing it from one to another.

By intinction is meant communion in the form of bread which the minister dips in the wine and places on the communicant's tongue. Church discipline prohibits recipients from taking the host and dipping it in the cup on their own because the sign value of the minister is neglected. Historically certain Roman popes and councils had forbidden intinction because Christ gave the bread and wine separately, and only Judas dipped his bread in the cup. Today the N.C.C.B. disapproves of intinction because everyone in the assembly may not be able or may not wish to receive the precious blood, and because intinction eliminates the option of receiving communion in the hand (N.C.C.B., nn. 51, 52).

For the distribution of the precious blood through tube, the communicant goes to the minister of the cup, receives the tube from the minister, places it in the cup, and drinks a little. The communicant then removes the tube, places it in a container of water held by the minister, sips a little water to purify the tube, then puts it on a paten or in another container presented by the minister.

For the rite using a spoon, the minister of the cup pours a small spoonful of the consecrated wine on the tongue of the recipient, taking care that the spoon does not touch the lips or tongue. The rites using a tube or spoon, although they are lawful options, are by and large mere historical curiosities; neither is customary in the Latin church today.

JOHN M. HUELS, O.S.M.

CHARACTER, SACRAMENTAL

In its narrowest and most straightforward meaning, the phrase sacramental character refers to the Roman Catholic teaching that for three sacraments, viz., baptism, confirmation and orders "there is . . . imprinted on the soul a character, that is, a certain spiritual and indelible mark, by reason of which they cannot be repeated" (Council of Trent: Session 7, can. 9).

More broadly, and in an historical context, this is a rich and complex notion. While the term character gained popularity from its use by St. Augustine, it does have scriptural precedent in the concept of seal, sphragis (Eph 1:13; 4:30; 2 Cor 1:22) whereby the Spirit of God's ownership of the soul is expressed. Cognately, the idea of sealing, stamping, or tattooing was used by the Greek Fathers to indicate the "marking for God" that occurs in our reception of baptism.

St. Augustine used the word character when arguing against the Donatist practice of rebaptizing heretics who returned to the church. For Augustine, and for subsequent Catholic theology, baptism effects in us an irreversible and permanent reorientation of our lives towards Christ (2 Cor 5:17ff; Gal 3:27). Whether our baptism bears greater or less fruit, or even if we deny or repudiate it, once baptized, we are baptized for ever and that action is not to be repeated (cf. De Bapt. contr. Donat. 5, 24, 34 et al.).

As confirmation became separated from baptism it, too, was considered to be a once-and-for-all action. In Aquinas, e.g., the character of confirmation is a power to confess the faith publicly by words (S.Th. III q. 63 art. 3).

Likewise, the sacrament of orders was regarded as bringing with it a radical and permanent commission to act in the name of Christ.

Apart from the observable rite, sacramentum, of a sacrament, the fact of a sacramental character, sacramentum et res, was generally accepted for several centuries prior to the Reformation. The Council of Trent's Canon 9 (see above) is a response to Luther's denial in his Babylonian Captivity of the existence of a sacramental character. Calvin and Zwingli followed Luther's thinking. All of them saw such dynamism in the word of God that it could not be managed or controlled by any human person or "priestly" character.

We can find also, in Augustine's writings, the foundation for the later development of a theory that not only do baptism, confirmation and orders have the character of non-repeatability but that, in a looser sense of the word, each of the Catholic sacraments has a "character" of its own. Obviously this usage of the phrase sacramental character refers rather to the particular dimension under which each of the other sacraments presents us with the opportunity of encounter with Christ.

Today perhaps the most commonly accepted view of the sacramental character of baptism, confirmation and orders is that these sacraments begin and then particularize or deepen within their recipients an irreversible consecration to worship God (L.G., 11) to grow into Christ and to witness to him (ibid.), and to act in the name and person of Christ (P.O., 2). The ritual celebrations of the beginning of this process and also of its key moments of realization are of such significance both to the individual recipient and to the community as not to bear repetition (see also, C.I.C., 845.1).

PATRICK BISHOP, S.J.

CHILDREN AND DEATH

Research in child development has helped us to know a little more about how the minds and thinking of children develop, but we still have scant knowledge about how they think about death. It is perfectly understandable, in a society that has often been described as death-defying and death-denying, that the topic of death is rarely discussed among children. With significant decreases in the incidence of childhood mortality, fewer children die. A relatively small percentage of children during their childhood years experience the death of a sibling or a parent. Since personal encounter and experience with death is exceptional among children, questions remain: how do children think about death, the death of others, or their own personal death?

An understanding and appreciation of the processes of life and death, growth, maturation, and development are the products of learning and experience. Since a child's experience with death is limited during the childhood years, many adults have assumed that children have little awareness of death and little fear of it.

Until the 1940s, there was no systematic study of children's understanding and attitudes toward death. Maria Nagy, a Hungarian psychiatrist and a follower of the renowned child developmentalist, Jean Piaget, researched the application of developmental stages to children's understanding of death. In her work, she concluded that children under the age of five relate to death in egocentric ways, considering death to be reversible and subject to the same magical powers which they think govern many other physical phenomena.

In the middle years of childhood, between the ages of five and nine years, Nagy observed that children tended to give death a personality, acknowledging it as permanent, and conceptualizing death in concrete terms, yet as something external to the self. She concluded that children after the age of nine have a realistic knowledge about death as an inevitable and irreversible human experience that has its genesis within the body. Children at this age grasp the finality of death and, with this understanding in place, display more affective responses to death than younger children characteristically exhibit.

Nagy's early research has been criticized for its methodological inadequacies. Common to critiques of her theory is the claim that it does not sufficiently take into account the roles of environment, culture, and experience as contributing factors to a child's understanding of death.

For example, one would have to conclude that, until approximately age ten.

children are not generally aware of the nature and the implications of death. However, we all know that a child's close, personal experience of death concretizes for that child what death is all about, even though his or her thoughts may exhibit some ambiguity about what happens on the philosophical or the biological level. In certain cultures and environments, and especially where there is personal experience of death, children are in fact more aware of death at far earlier ages than many cognitive developmentalists would have considered possible.

Unawakened by immediate personal experience, children's awareness of death appears to be tied to the normal processes of cognitive maturation. However, any significant and personal exposure to death may impress upon a child a sophisticated awareness of death at an earlier age than normal development would anticipate. For children, even very young ones, who live in an environment in which either they themselves, a parent, a grandparent, or a sibling is diagnosed with a life-threatening illness, one can expect that the child's awareness of death will be keener than might have been considered possible.

Coping with the Reality of Death

As adults, we rely on a wide repertory of coping skills. These skills begin to take shape in childhood. An essential skill is the ability to cope with loss. Death represents a primary loss. For a child, death in a family context can threaten the base of security within the family itself. Children are not protected from feelings of sadness and loneliness, fears of abandonment and betrayal, anger at the deceased, and worry about themselves and about others within the family who survive.

Because the experience of death for a young child accelerates the child's understanding of death, it is reasonable to expect that children, likewise, need to grieve just as adults. Although the manifestations of grieving among children are comparable to adults, they are distinct in their characteristics and intensity. Children will sob and cry and express sadness and longing. They will remember the deceased and will tell stories of shared experiences, will imitate actions performed by the deceased, and will talk to pictures of the deceased. As grieving adults do, children will also deny the fact of death and will avoid the subject of death, particularly during the early stages of bereavement.

In clinical studies of children's grief reactions, certain findings are common. Children's grief is not simply a set of symptoms that begin after a loss and gradually fade away. Rather, children's grief is more accurately a succession of responses that blend into and replace one another. It should be anticipated that any child who experiences the death of a significant member of the family to whom he or she was attached in important ways will react to that death with an emotional response involving pain and grief. Children between the ages of two and ten will cry, will display moodiness, and will display a variety of expressions of longing. It is not unusual to expect that children are prone to speak about the deceased as if they continue to live. In very real ways, this is an attempt on a child's part to deny the reality of death, and, in a way, to buy emotional time for their grieving.

As children progress in their grief, they come to a certain understanding and acceptance of the loss, together with a decrease of the primary defensive measures that they drew upon in the early stages of their grieving. It is not uncommon to see these primary defenses replaced by a broad repertory of fears. Principal among these fears is the expressed concern about being abandoned or left alone. If the death experience involved a parent, children often are quite worried about the surviving parent's possible death. This apprehension is often verbalized. These fears can easily translate into anxiety, since death has a way of shattering the securities of a child's world and introducing dangerous and threatening possibilities. In these situations, it is not unusual that children will exaggerate their dependence upon other members of the family and find it more difficult to achieve even temporary separations from care providers. Children can become overly aggressive and hyperactive in their behaviors, creating behavioral disturbances within the family and school contexts. These somewhat dramatic changes in temperament and behavior are related to their experiences of loss.

The literature on children's understanding of death supports the conclusion that youngsters entertain basic concerns about losses, endings, and separation. It is axiomatic that the more a person understands phenomena, the more he or she is able to deal with the consequences of such realities. In the case of children, immaturity in age, understanding, experience, and ego defenses can leave a child more vulnerable than an adult to the threats and realities of death.

It is easy for significant adults to deny a child's understanding of death. In these cases, the child will suffer alone the inner experiences and fears of death and will often seek solace in defensive fantasies. The evolution of these fantasies is tied to cognitive development. It is not surprising that many of the fantasies that support children's play involve the attribute of omnipotence. Children picture themselves able to fight off monsters and beasts of gigantic proportions much in the vein of the biblical David in combat with the mighty Goliath. This dependence upon fantasized power and strength is a primitive defense that children frequently use to cope with the subjective threat of death.

Pastoral Intervention and Support

an event that upsets his or her characteristic patterns of thought and behavior, children resort to primitive problem solving strategies until equilibrium is restored. A crisis is a situation where habitual emotional and behavioral responses prove insufficient. Crisis leads to a state of upset that is ordinarily accompanied by heightened fear, anger, or guilt. Because a child cannot remain long in a state of disequilibrium, crisis is frequently self-limited.

The new balance that is achieved by resolving or facing a crisis, such as the experience of a death represents in the life of a child, may be either an adaptive behavior that promotes either personal growth or a maladaptive response that may indicate psychological problems. A crisis, therefore, is a transition or turning point that significantly impacts on a child's adaptation and ability to meet future crises.

In general, we have suggested that a child's understanding of death seems to follow rather closely a cognitive developmental model. However, we have also asserted that a child's view of death seems to be shaped heavily by life experiences. When death enters into a child's experience, he/she experiences crisis. Although death is a stressful life event, it may also enrich a child's beliefs and values, forcing the child to assimilate these new experiences and to integrate those experiences into his/her understanding. In this sense, a life crisis, such as dying, can accelerate development in the child of new, cognitive, and personal skills because such skills are needed for effective adaptation.

In pastoral practice, there are several issues that need to be identified in working with children who are dealing with the crisis of death. The first task involves helping a child to understand the meaning of the situation. This, of course, is a principal task of parents and significant other family members. However, in some instances, pastoral counselors will become part of this conversation. Parents may look to pastoral workers for assistance in mediating discussion of death with children. Whenever a death occurs, the loss must be accepted intellectually and be explained appropriately. These explanations need to be communicated in language that children can understand, and at a level of explanation that is age-appropriate.

A second set of tasks involves dealing with the reality and responding to the requirements of the external situation. If death occurs within the family system, this has immediate and direct impact on the life of the child. Certain supplies, both material and emotional, may be interrupted by the death. A child will need help in readjusting his or her needs that have been disrupted by the situation of death.

A third set of tasks is to sustain as much as possible the other relationships that exist with family members and significant others who can be of continued help as the child works to resolve the crisis. Because adults within a family are often engaged in managing their own concerns during the crisis triggered by the death of one of its members, children are often neglected and are not as able to supply for their own needs during this period. Particular attention needs to be paid to helping the family system to be supportive to itself, and for others to supply whatever additional support may be necessary on a temporary basis during the period of the crisis.

Likewise, it is important to help maintain emotional equilibrium in the entire family during a crisis. Crises have a way of catalyzing many powerful emotions, including a sense of failure and self-blame, anger and grief, tension and fear. These powerful emotional states within a family can be perceived as significant threats to a child's security, and a child needs to be reassured in the face of these powerful emotions that they are, in fact, temporary and that things will be better.

Finally, a child needs to realize that he or she will have the ability to survive this significant loss and continue effectively with his or her own life. Although many of these concepts are adult, they need not only to figure into the pastoral intervention and support for adult members of a family system, but also to be a particular concern of those who provide assistance to children in crisis.

There are many excellent books about death that have been written for young readers. These stories, based on human experiences of death, can be enormously helpful in supporting children who face loss related to death, or who themselves are raising important questions, seeking understanding about this human experience.

Summary

Death is a reality for children as it is for their adult counterparts. Children are capable of understanding what death involves and what it means. Children, likewise, mourn and grieve at the death of a loved one. Although the dynamics of a child's grief are different in certain aspects from that of adults, there are many characteristics that they share in common. A child's grief is frequently short-lived, but one will see many aspects of grieving in a child's play, in other behaviors, and in verbal and non-verbal communications.

If adults are aware and sensitive, they can be of significant help to a child's integration of his or her understanding of death, and this integration can be of great importance to the ongoing development of the child. Adults need to be sensitive to the understandings and the fantasies that dominate a child's thoughts about death if we are to be able to talk effectively with children about death and to assist them in the grief that attends such loss. Adults need to enter the world of the child with respect and sensitivity. Children do understand death and are affected by it.

In pastoral and liturgical ministries, these realities need to be in the consciousness of those who minister to children who are attempting to understand and assimilate the experience of death.

CHILDREN, DEATH OF

Research supports the assertion that among the most stressful human life crises is the death of a child. For a parent, the death of one's own child is among the most painful losses one can experience. The death of a child, however, also impacts upon the couple, upon the family unit, and upon society as a whole. It is important to comment on each of these human experiences of loss, since each of them suggests distinct approaches in ministry and pastoral care.

Grief of an Individual Parent

Parenting is a unique expression of human bonding, on the physiological, psychological, and social levels. It is one of the most powerful relationships that human life can generate. Relative to the meaning, strength, and duration of this bond with a child, an individual parent's grief response can be measured.

There are some common characteristics observed in the grief reaction of many parents who have lost children. The individual experience of grief is often reported as severe. This means that the sense of loss is profound. Secondary effects of the loss, including depression, eating and sleep disruptions, emotional outbursts of sobbing and crying, are also intense. In comparison with other losses of friends or adult family members, the symptoms associated with normal grieving of a deceased child tend to be longer lasting and more complex.

Each child commands a special meaning for a parent. This specific meaning includes the hopes, dreams, fantasies, and wishes that a parent treasures for the child and for his or her life. A parent normally tends to be invested significantly in a child. This investment is not always apparent to a spouse or to another member of the family. When the death of a child interrupts the unique relationship that exists between parent and child, all aspects of the lost relationship bear on the individual parent's grief responses.

Each child, even a very young child, has a unique personality, differing traits and characteristics, differing abilities and talents. All of these variables contribute to the distinctive role that a child exercises in relationship to each of his or her parents and to the family unit. When a child dies, all of those qualities of relationship are lost to the parent who survives, as well as to the family unit.

Parents whose children have died speak a common language; they frequently say that they have lost a part of themselves. Because this expression is common in the experience of so many bereaved parents, it signals a particular characteristic of parental grief. By this expression of personal loss, they indicate not only a loss of an important part of their physical and emotional relationship with the deceased child, but they disclose a perception that they have lost a part of each other, their family, and indeed, their future.

While the focus of this discussion has centered on children and adolescents, it is important to note that parents at later stages of the life-cycle experience comparable feelings when they survive the death of their adult children. One cannot minimize a parent's pain associated with the death of a child, no matter when it occurs in the life course. An eighty-year old parent can report intense feelings of loss when confronted with the death of a sixty-year old son or daughter. The timing and circumstances of the death, however, do contextualize and interpret the specific grief reactions that one observes in surviving parents.

Impact of a Child's Death on the Couple Relationship

While it is important to consider the individual parent and the particular experience of loss that he or she sustains, it is also necessary to consider the couple relationship. In an intact couple relationship, both parents face the experience of grief simultaneously. This is particularly the case when the child's death is sudden, as in Sudden Infant Death Syndrome (SIDS), or in an accidental child death, as in a drowning.

In these contexts of child loss, parents display a particular vulnerability to a wide range of feelings. It is not uncommon that parents experience guilt, helplessness, or blame when confronted with a child's death, and it is not uncommon that parents have a tendency to project their feelings onto the other spouse.

Just as an individual parent's relationship to a deceased child is unique so, too, will the grief reaction be particular. Not only will parents grieve different aspects of the lost relationship with the child, but the grieving process itself will be varied. This creates obvious difficulties for a couple relationship. One parent's style of grieving may be more open and emotive, while the other's style may be more interior and non-expressive.

These differing styles can create misunderstandings, alienation, and open conflict within the couple relationship. One spouse, for example, may be desirous of speaking about the loss at a time when the other spouse wishes to avoid discussion and turns attention to other things. This lack of synchronicity between spousal needs and desires creates an environment of tension. Spouses do not always understand the dynamics discussed above and may be helped in a context of pastoral care where these issues are appropriately identified and discussed.

The birth of a child inaugurates a new identity for the couple as parents. These roles develop continually throughout the course of a parent's lifetime relationship with the son or daughter. The role of parent changes and modifies through the adult years. However, the parental role becomes an important part of the identity of the individual. When death of a child occurs, changes in the parental identity also take place.

A couple who had consciously encouraged in each other the appropriation of parental identity and roles during the pregnancy and early childhood of their offspring confessed that, when their first and only child died at fifteen months of age, they experienced a significant conflict in their understanding of their identity. While they felt that they were still parents, they also felt awkward in talking about themselves any longer as parents since they no longer had a child who was alive. In a bereavement group of parents, they were able to articulate this perception of their loss, which other parents of a single child immediately understood. This tends to be less problematic for parents who have other children. The situation of being parents of a single child dramatizes the ways in which identity as parent is significantly affected by the death of the child.

Effects of Death on the Family

The death of a child also has an impact on the family system itself. Regardless of the age of the deceased child, each child exercises certain roles within the family context. The death of a child introduces changes into the dynamics of the interrelationships within the family. The death of a child also interrupts the assumed "pecking order" of death within a family. Unconsciously, at least, we expect that older members of the family will predecease the younger members. When a child dies, this introduces dissonance into the comforting assumption about the "pecking order" of dying. Not only does this confront individual members with their own mortality, but it challenges the fundamental assumptions about control and predictability.

It is not uncommon that survivors tend to idealize the memory of the deceased. This is also true about the ways in which children are idealized by their parents, grandparents, and other members of the family. This can create a certain tension within the family for surviving members who may feel neglected and underappreciated, almost as if they would be of more value to the family were they also to die. Parents, in working through their own grief for a deceased child, can fail to see how their memories of the deceased child and preoccupation with the idealized aspects of that child create new problems for their surviving children.

Finally, it is not uncommon to observe compensatory behaviors in parents toward their surviving children. They often-times become more vigilant and overprotective with respect to their other children, almost as if defensively attempting to prevent a possible repetition of the death event in their surviving children.

A Child's Death and Reactions Outside the Family

A final concern touches on the ways in which the wider social network deals with the death of children and with the family members in which a child's death has occurred. Death, in all of its aspects, touches a sensitive nerve in many adults. The death of a child has a particular poignancy in focusing the issue of mortality. A child's death will often precipitate persons will attempt to manage their anxieties and fears by denial and avoidance. This defensive posture presents difficulties for bereaved family members. At the very time in which they need the presence and support of other friends, these persons may not be available emotionally to them. This phenomenon occurs in other contexts, such as in widowhood, but the death of a child has a particular way of focusing those anxieties.

Adults may empathize with the sadness and loss experienced by a parent and family, but be unable or inadequate to respond to their perceptions of these feelings. The lack of positive responsiveness and availability of friends to bereaved parents and families is an additional source of burden for the grieving individuals. Not only are they faced with coping with the loss of a child, but also in managing the negative feelings of anger and resentment they feel for those friends and relatives whom they judge to have abandoned them.

Pastoral Initiatives

If one considers the death of children from within these various perspectives, the pastoral worker will be better equipped not only to understand the particular needs of bereaved individuals, but be more creative in planning ways to assist individual family members in coping with the loss of a child. There are some issues which a pastoral worker should keep in mind in assisting family members in this experience of loss.

It is very important that parents and other significant members of the family actualize their loss. This means concretely that opportunities be given to them to speak about the child, to express their feelings, both negative and positive.

Because the work of grief involves a certain emotional withdrawal from the deceased child, pastoral care needs to help to facilitate this process. In some significant ways, pastoral care can provide the environment, time, and space for a family to appropriately grieve the lost child. It is important to communicate the appropriateness of taking this time and doing the work of grieving. A pastor can be helpful in interpreting the "normal" behaviors that are associated with grief. Some parents experience grief for the first time in the death of a child. This may be, for some, the first significant death they have had to grieve. It is important that their experiences of grief be legitimated. This means helping them to know that their reactions to their child's death are normal and appropriate.

Also, it is important to assist them to see that there are different ways in which members of the family deal with this loss, and that each individual bereaved member of the family has a right to grieve in his or her own manner. A pastoral care provider can be a dependable source of continuing support for a bereaved family, particularly when other members or other friends or relatives may not be able to be the kind of support that the family needs.

Finally, a pastoral care worker can be a useful source of referral for professional treatment of those individual members of the family whose grief responses indicate pathology. In those exceptional situations, a pastoral care worker who has been of ongoing support to the family during its crisis can be a useful point of connection to appropriate professional care.

Because other parents' experiences of loss are important sources of connection, self-help groups of bereaved parents can be of assistance to a family in crisis. Local chapters of Compassionate Friends offer immediate and personal support for parents who have lost a child. These groups tend not only to be supportive to parents during the period of early bereavement, but are effective bridges to a future in a world forever impoverished because of the death of a child.

CHILDREN, EUCHARIST AND

We are historically far enough removed from a mentality that children are merely adults in miniature. Studies in the social sciences, especially child psychology, educational theory and method, and the sociology of the family and childhood, enable us to minister to children as Jesus did. "And he took them in his arms and blessed them laying his hands upon them" (Mk 10:16). The gospel heritage also indicates that all who come to the table must learn a sense of childhood. "Truly, I say to you, whoever does not receive the kingdom of God like a child shall not enter it" (Mk 10:15). Three items are important in dealing with children and eucharist. We ask: what children are we talking about and what is the context of their lives? Secondly, we address the eucharist celebrated by children. This includes an assembly of children alone or with adults present. Finally we draw out one pastoral consequence.

1. What Children and What Context

Each local church is entrusted with the pastoral care of its children. We want to be specific about what children we are dealing with. First, they are pre-adolescent. Secondly, their situations may vary widely. Some children are baptized as infants and their faith is nurtured by a dedicated parent or parents. These children will be confirmed later and then will come to the table to complete their initiation. "The sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and the most holy eucharist are so interrelated that they are required for full Christian initiation" (C.I.C., can. 842, 2). (It is important to note that the legal and educational praxis continue to be in conflict. The former reaffirms the classical shape of baptism, confirmation and eucharist. The latter continues to place communion before confirmation.)

Other children are baptized without family catechesis. These children need the involvement of baptismal sponsors, parish members, pastors, catechists and other children in order to assist these uncatechized children in their faith development and to assure readiness for communion. Still other children, neither baptized in their infancy nor nurtured in faith, become catechumens and await communion as the climax of their initiation (See R.C.I.A., 252-330). This may sometimes involve adolescent and adult family members in the same conversion process or it may not. Thus there is need to clarify what children we are talking about in each instance.

In addition, children's home environments are also a factor in their readiness to celebrate the eucharist. This includes the cultural context rooted in their ethnic and racial heritage, the kinds of bonding children have experienced, and where these children are on the economic spectrum running from affluence to poverty. Their ability to celebrate the eucharist can be influenced by their ability to be attentive, how well they have developed their imagination, whether they are nutritionally healthy or malnourished, and whether they are cared for in safety or are the victims of abuse.

A final, crucial factor is the assembly of adults in the midst of whom children learn and live out their Christian lives. Is this assembly open to children, receptive to them and their needs? Is it willing to take responsibility for them? Is this assembly able and willing to be involved with children from the time of their baptism until such time as they are communicated? Certainly no assembly is, or will be, perfect or ideal. Yet each assembly carries responsibility for witnessing its faith, holding out a sense of hope and expressing its love for its children.

2. Children and Eucharist

Pre-adolescent children, including those physically, mentally and environmentally disabled, are the concern of each assembly. The Directory for Masses with Children recognizes that children live in circumstances that do not favor their spiritual progress (Directory, 1). But it acknowledges that children are capable of celebrating eucharist. This is especially true when the words and signs of the liturgy are adapted. This does not mean that liturgy is trivialized or childish in its celebration. What it does mean is that pastoral care and liturgical action draw out children in their openness to mystery, the numinous and the mystical as well as the incarnational stories and images of God found in the Bible (Directory, 2-6). Readiness and formation for eucharistic celebration are helped by how children grow and come to know Christ, each other and by other humanizing experiences. "All who have a part in the formation of children should consult and work together toward one objective: that even if children already have some feeling for God and the things of God, they may also experience, in proportion to their age and personal development, the human values that we present in the eucharistic celebration" (Directory, 9).

This is spelled out further. Children become able to celebrate eucharist by learning community activity. They learn by doing, i.e., by exchanging greetings, by listening to one another, by seeking and granting pardon, by giving thanks, by sharing meals of friendship, by celebrating festive events and by acting out symbolic actions. These kinds of operational values are taught in family circles. Often parents are the first teachers of prayer. In addition, assembly members are a school which teaches by its sense of welcome, its exercise of charity and its manner of celebrating eucharist. A kind of reciprocity exists where the witness of adult belief influences children and where adults benefit by experiencing the part children have within the Christian community (Directory, 16).

When children celebrate eucharist with adults, there are a number of ways in which the children can be enriched. Children, like adults, need to be acknowledged as celebrating members of the assembly. This can be done in the introductory rite immediately after the sign of the cross, in the homily and in the prayer of the faithful. Children can be dismissed in order that they may share the word among themselves while the adults remain to hear the entire number of readings assigned to a particular Sunday. Both the dismissal and the reunion become noticeable to children and adults. Children can also involve themselves in tasks such as presenting the gifts of bread and wine and in song (Directory, 17-18).

When children celebrate eucharist alone or with only a few adults present, there are a number of ways in which they can be actively engaged. Children can ready the liturgical space, decorate it, attend to its visual elements (seating, lighting, art and placement of cross, candles, etc.), and assist in making the space one of ease and hospitality (Directory, 25, 29, 35, 36). There are also a number of ways to involve them in the actual liturgical action. This includes their participation in specific ministries such as reader, cantor, musician, choir member, respondent during the homily, leader of intercession and presenter of the gifts of bread and wine. Adults who join children do not act as monitors, but as co-celebrating members of the assembly (Directory, 20-23). Children, whose attention levels vary among themselves and differ from those of adults, are able to remain engaged in eucharistic action when musical acclamations are used and are suited to their capabilities, when processions at the beginning, at the gospel and at communion are done, when gesturing is developed, and when visual elements are integrated into the principal liturgical actions (Directory, 29-36).

Three adaptations hold the most promise for children celebrating eucharist. The first is the development of lectionaries for children. This allows for a single reading rather than multiple readings. It includes a desire for quality over quantity (Directory, 43-44). The second is the option that an adult, other than the presider, may speak after the gospel in instances when the presider has a hard time adapting to the mentality of children. This means that the preacher, whether the presider or another adult, needs to fashion the homiletic message in such a way that the word shapes the spirit of children. This can include the use of dialogue in the homily (Directory, 24, 48). The third adaptation is the composition of three eucharistic prayers for children. These try to adapt to children without being childish. They recognize the limits of children's attentiveness by including ample spoken or sung acclamations. These responses help foster a sense that the eucharistic prayer is the assembly's prayer of offering and that the nature of the prayer is both dialogical and doxological (Directory, 51). These excellent adaptations for children may eventually teach the entire assembly how to pray well.

The Directory (27, 54) also encourages that eucharist be complemented by meditation, spontaneity and celebrations of the word as well as expanded forms of blessing so that children be helped to encounter Christ readily and joyfully and to stand with him in the presence of his Father. In short, children at eucharist are nurtured in liturgical action and are deepened in other forms of prayer.

3. Pastoral Consequence

No celebration of the eucharist is without its pastoral, missionary consequence. If we develop children's eucharist well, we also want to involve the children in the mission of Christ in the world. Children who celebrate the eucharist, if they learn to use symbols well, will include the full range of God's creation in their celebrations. This calls for assemblies to teach their children to be responsible for the well-being of the earth, its eco-system and its future survival as icon of the holy. Children who celebrate the eucharist in the U.S. and other affluent countries will learn that there are children, in both their own and other countries, who are victims of famine, malnutrition, war and poverty. This calls for assemblies to involve children in justice and peace for other children. Children who celebrate the eucharist in an environment of care and belonging will learn to encounter the paschal mystery in children who are homeless, alone, neglected and abused. This calls for assemblies to engage in advocacy for children and in outreach to the victims of violence. Finally, children who come to the eucharist as people made up of many races, colors, languages and ways of life will learn the true universality of the church and the sacredness of humankind. This calls for assemblies to cherish the many fabric pieces that weave together to become the quilt called church and to work for the ending of racial, language, ethnic and gender prejudice.

JOHN J. O'BRIEN, C.P.

CHILDREN, FIRST PENANCE AND

The issue of admitting children to first penance before first eucharist or delaying it until after first eucharist has generated debate on theological, pastoral, catechetical and canonical levels since Vatican II. Two schools of thought formed during the post-conciliar decades: one encouraged the practice of children receiving first communion while allowing some years to elapse before first confession; the other maintained the more familiar practice of first penance before first eucharist.

The conviction of sacramental theologians, the experience of pastors and the research of developmental psychologists as well as insights of confessors, catechists, parents and children led to the practice in the United States and other countries of delaying first penance for two or three years after first eucharist. Since the 1917 Code of Canon Law which was operative through the 1970s did not prescribe the sequence of these sacraments, pastors freely accepted the claim of theologians, religious educators and psychologists that a later admittance than seven years of age to the sacrament of penance would be more beneficial. When children confessed sins in kind and number but failed to perceive the motives of their actions they would inevitably develop a mechanical and formalistic attitude toward both sin and repentance at an early age. Proponents of this position claimed that tendency was avoided in the new practice.

By the early 1970s more than half the parishes in the United States adopted this new practice. Religious educators testified that clearer and more meaningful catechesis for each sacrament was possible when first penance was separated from first communion by two or three years. The delay also had the benefit of avoiding a potentially distressing experience; the child may already be aware of the difference between right and wrong though not yet developed in a sense of either personal sin or the communal dimension of sin. An older child with a more developed notion of a relationship with God and the beginnings of a sense of responsibility to a social group and interdependence within it showed less fear of individual confession and more understanding, freedom and faith. Thus the proper disposition for the sacrament was more readily demonstrated.

Proponents of the opposite position supporting the reception of first communion after first confession grounded their stance on the principle of protecting the child's right to receive the sacrament of penance. Complaints came to the Holy See from parents who claimed catechists and pastors blocked their children from first penance. Those who wished to retain confession before communion argued that children with the use of reason are denied a right to which the law entitles them when they are refused the sacrament of penance. They are also deprived of an opportunity for development in the Christian sense of penance and conversion as well as the efficaciousness of the sacrament itself. Furthermore, since first penance before first communion had been considered a safeguard and protection for worthy participation in eucharist at least since the beginning of this century, it seemed the pastor's responsibility to judge the child's proper disposition to receive first eucharist without prior sacramental confession was further complicated.

Widespread experimentation with delaying first confession until after first communion provided the context in which the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy issued the General Catechetical Directory and its addendum on "The First Reception of the Sacraments of Penance and Eucharist" (1971). The addendum addressed the "experiments" of permitting children to receive first eucharist without first penance while allowing two or three years between them: "The suitable age for the first reception of [penance and eucharist] is deemed to be that which in the documents of the Church is called the age of discretion." The authority cited for imposing a return to this practice was Pius X's Quam singulari (1910) and its principle on the age of admission to first communion which the Sacred Congregation on the Sacraments had used in the decree's conclusion: "The age of discretion, both for first confession and first communion, is the time when a child begins to reason, that is approximately the age of seven years. From that time on the obligation of satisfying the precept of both confession and communion begins." The citing of this principle in the addendum significantly changed the meaning of the original decree. Quam singulari never condemned delaying confession until after first communion nor did it make a statement that the age of seven was suitable for first confession. Its intention was that children have access to confession from that appropriate age. The decree only ensured the possibility of confession from the age of discretion; it did not take a position on the suitability, value or propriety of confessing at that age. Pius X was not primarily concerned with children's obligations but more with their basic rights as baptized Christians. He was convinced that children must not be kept from receiving communion. He assumed the existing discipline of confession before communion but did not make a judgment about the propriety of such a practice. Therefore, to build an argument for retaining the more familiar practice on a cloudy interpretation of the 1910 decree was to base conclusions on a weak foundation which was sure to cause continuing confusion and conflict. And so it happened.

At the International Catechetical Congress held in Rome in September 1971, Cardinal John Wright, prefect for the Congregation of the Clergy, was questioned regarding the status of the addendum. He assured catechists that it did not have the force of law but aimed to offer guidance to national hierarchies. Despite repeated remarks reassuring that stance, the addendum's binding force remained uncertain.

The following year the bishops of the United States surveyed patterns in pastoral practice. Their findings showed that eighty-five percent of the ordinaries agreed that the delay of first penance was more pastorally effective. After the results were presented at the November 1972 meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Cardinal John Krol, president of the conference, sent a letter to Wright requesting a two-year extension of the experiment to admit children to first communion before first confession. This request in a sense confused the issue; the desire was not to administer communion before confession but to delay confession until children were better equipped to understand and celebrate the sacrament in faith.

While the American bishops waited for a response to Krol's letter, the Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments and the Congregation for the Clergy jointly issued the declaration Sanctus pontifex in May 1973. It reaffirmed the addendum's position and mandated the end of all experimentation by the close of that 1972-73 school year. Quam singulari was "to be obeyed everywhere and by all." Once again, citing that decree to support the 1973 declaration was an attempt to secure an argument on foundations that simply were not there. Although this document appeared to raise the binding force of the addendum to a new legislative status, pastors and catechists received it as an unreasonable request within the given time frame; they also remained unconvinced by its argumentation. As a result several dioceses soon asserted their pastoral prerogatives and issued their own guidelines.

At their November 1973 meeting the American bishops called for a broad pastoral interpretation so that no impression of obligation to confess before first communion would be given. Around the same time a committee of the Canadian Catholic Conference met in Rome with the two congregations and requested a clarification of Sanctus pontifex. The Canadians were assured that the declaration did not impose the obligation of confession before first communion since it was not a decree. Nor did it seek to foster conditions that would keep children from first penance before first communion. Apparently the Roman authorities' desire was to safeguard the child's rights to penance and to ensure adequate catechesis in order to exercise that right.

At this juncture it seemed the controversy was finally approaching a resolution. However, a March 1977 letter from Cardinals John Wright and James Knox further confused the issue. While catechists had been assured that neither the addendum nor the declaration implied legal obligation of penance before first communion, the letter treated both documents as carrying the force of law despite that distinction already made between a declaration and a decree. The letter also referred to Quam singulari as assigning the same age for first confession and first communion. Then it concluded that the child had the obligation to receive both sacraments at the appropriate age of seven and in the designated sequence, that is, confession before communion. In point of fact Quam singulari made no claim about an obligation to receive the two sacraments in any particular order. Simply listing one sacrament before the other hardly sets up an obligation to receive them in that order. Another erroneous claim on the content of canon 854 was made in the 1977 letter. It claimed the pastor's judgment on proper disposition for first communion could not be made without the child's confession before communion. However, the canon actually stated that the judgment on proper disposition for first communion remained the responsibility of a confessor and the parents. Therefore, the code did not imply that the priest arrives at a judgment only in the confessional.

The confusion generated by this 1977 letter is typical of the tension which characterized this debate since the 1971 publication of the General Catechetical Directory and its addendum. The source of the conflict can be located in the varying interpretations of Quam singulari. Then it is no surprise that the bishops of the United States decided to leave the question open in the National Catechetical Directory, Sharing the Light of Faith (1979). They did not want to offend the Roman congregations by explicitly stating that children were under no obligation to confess before communion. Nor did the bishops want to imply any sense of obligation whatsoever. So they discreetly steered a middle course. In a similar way, since the Roman authorities wanted neither to acquiesce nor close off exchange, they recommended the insertion of a sentence: "Reception of the sacrament of reconciliation should normally precede first communion." The American bishops incorporated a reworked version: "The Sacrament of Reconciliation normally should be celebrated prior to the reception of first communion." The word "normally" was included to describe the priority of first penance and to respect the fact that it is not always mandated before first eucharist. The recrafting of that final formulation is significant. Its precision preserved continuity with the Roman suggestion while it reduced the practical legal requirements. The short though carefully constructed sentence states that penance should be celebrated before first communion; it does not state that any or all children must receive the sacrament of penance before first communion.

Once more, when an agreeable resolution seemed to be reached, an unexpected intrusion stirred up the issue anew. Two canons in the revised Code of Canon Law (1983) deal directly with preparation of children for first eucharist. Canon 913 secures adequate catechetical and spiritual formation for children before first eucharist. An oblique reference to the sacrament of penance appears in canon 914 which deals with the responsibilities of parents, those who take their place, as well as pastors to provide preparation for children of the appropriate age to receive eucharist "preceded by sacramental confession." The insertion of this phrase may appear problematic only if it is not interpreted in its text and context (c. 17).

A way into these canons is to pose the pastoral question: can a child who does not wish to approach first penance be denied first communion? The law yields a negative response. Canon 913 deals with the minimal prerequisites for a child's admittance to first eucharist ("sufficient knowledge and careful preparation so as to understand the mystery of Christ according to their capacity" and an ability to "receive the Body of the Lord with faith and devotion") but there is no indication that "careful preparation" includes sacramental confession. Such an addition would be expected if it were the code's intent to establish confession as one among the minimal requirements for licit admission to first eucharist.

Canon 914 ensures provisions for catechesis before first eucharist and advises pastors to limit admittance to those sufficiently prepared. Since these requirements are not directed to children but to parents and pastors, the children themselves are not explicitly the subject of an obligation to confess before making first communion. Children then are similarly bound by canon 916 as adult Catholics are: confession before communion is normally required in the case of anyone conscious of grave sin unless serious reason dictates otherwise. Therefore, this applies only to children who are aware of grave sin and thus helps to clarify canon 913. Furthermore, the confessing of venial sins was never a legal requirement but a recommendation; no mention is made of it in the context of first communion (can. 988.2). Freedom and a reverent disposition are required for the proper reception of a sacrament; then no one should be forced to receive a sacrament. Therefore, if a child does not wish to receive the sacrament of penance, especially when the parents also feel the child needs some time, a pastor cannot assume on this basis alone that the child is not ready for first communion. The right to receive first communion cannot be denied to children solely because they do not choose to approach the sacrament of penance.

The law then suggests that the requirement of penance before first communion is not absolute. As many exceptions as there might be, it would be problematic to set up the experiment of the post-conciliar years as a general policy. That practice of penance after first eucharist would effectively deny or restrict the child's access to the sacrament of penance. Although parents and pastors are obligated by law to provide catechesis on penance before the child's first communion, the choice of actually going to the sacrament must always be primarily that of the individual child with respect to the views of the parents (can. 226.2).

The controversy generated from the debate of admitting children to first penance before first eucharist or delaying it until afterwards continues to influence not only the practice of the reception of the sacrament of penance but also the theological and catechetical understanding of the sacraments of initiation. The promulgation and implementation of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.) has restored the integral unity and proper sequence of the sacraments of initiation. If the underlying significance of these sacraments is to realize an initial union with Christ, the practice of first penance prior to first eucharist is to claim the reactualization of a union with Christ for a small child who has not yet realized the fullness of the initial union in baptism, confirmation and eucharist. The entry of first penance prior to the completion of that sequence ruptures that unity and alters the processive flow of the sacraments of initiation. This theological and pastoral dilemma calls for a re-examination of the current pastoral practice of admitting young children to first penance before first eucharist.

CHILDREN, LITURGIES FOR

A child's first sacramental experience—the first experience of God even before birth—is in the loving passion and tenderness, the security and care, the prayer and respect, the playing and joking voices of a man and a woman devoted to each other and to their offspring in Christian marriage. The climate of trust in the marital covenant spills over into a welcoming, faith-nurturing, peace-and-justicebuilding, parent-child bond: the household church (oikos tou Xristou [see 1 Cor 1:16; Heb 3:6], ecclesia domestica).

The life-bearing and life-sustaining bond between mother and child—the privileged, totally giving, totally receiving symbiosis that leads to successful individuation—flows from the sacrament of marriage.

When the marital covenant is weak or absent or when the parent-child bond is weak or absent, God still breaks through with healing love, strength, joy, peace, and community. Sin and death impede human action but not God's sacramental action.

Introduction

Why Liturgies for Children? Jesus said, "Let the children come to me, do not stop them; the reign of God belongs to such as these" (Mk 10:14). For this reason, the universal church (ecumenical: "household of the world"[see Rom 10:18; Ps 19:4]), diocesan church ("local household"), and parish church presume with care and confidence to celebrate the love of God mirrored in individual household churches—and to pray for God's healing and to reach out with help when households are broken—in liturgies for and with children.

When the church on any scale decides to welcome children into sacramental worship, we say to God, "We are open to your Holy Spirit in these children, we are willing to receive your truth through them, and we take responsibility for nurturing them in the faith of your son, our Lord, Jesus Christ." In every liturgy, as the source and summit of life—whether for children or adults—God invites the church to celebrate the love of God that we receive in creation and redemption through Jesus Christ, to participate in the healing and comforting work of the Spirit, and to reach out as instruments in building communities of peace and justice that mark the coming of God's reign (S.C., 5-13).

General Requirements of Liturgies for Children. The first and most important requirement of liturgy for children is that it be good liturgy, that it fulfill the requirements of all liturgy, which are outlined in S.C., General Instruction of the Roman Missal (G.I.R.M.), fourth edition of 1975, Music in Catholic Worship (M.C.W.), promulgated in 1972 and revised in 1983, Liturgical Music Today (L.M.T.), 1982, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (E.A.C.W.), 1978, and in such fine studies as Elements of Rite: A Handbook of Liturgical Style by Aidan Kavanagh (New York: Pueblo Publishing Company, 1982), Strong, Loving and Wise: Presiding in Liturgy by Robert W. Hovda (Washington: The Liturgical Conference, 1976), Liturgy with Style and Grace by Gabe Huck, second edition (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1984), and Liturgy Made Simple by Mark Searle (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 1981). "The church earnestly desires that all the faithful be led to that full, conscious, and active participation in liturgical celebrations. . . . Such participation by the Christian people as 'a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people' (1 Pet 2:9) is their right and duty by reason of their baptism" (S.C., 14). These requirements for all good liturgy apply with double force for children.

But Jesus also "put his arms around the children and blessed them" (Mk 10:16). Adaptation to the needs, interests and capacities of children is also important. "With zeal and patience pastors must promote the liturgical instruction of the faithful and also their active participation in the liturgy both internally and externally, taking into account their age and condition, their way of life, and their stage of religious development" (S.C., 19).

The Directory of Masses with Children (D.M.C.) of 1973 is a deliberate effort by the Vatican to follow the adaptive example of Jesus and the mandate of the Second Vatican Council. Edward Matthews, in Celebrating Mass with Children: A Commentary on the Directory of Masses with Children, discusses the elements of adaptation and education proposed by the D.M.C.. Before any other catechetical or educational consideration, however, the D.M.C. must be understood clearly: "Even in the case of children, the liturgy itself always exerts its own inherent power to instruct" (D.M.C., 13). There are additional ways to introduce children into full participation in sacramental worship. The sections on sacraments and liturgy in the General Catechetical Directory of 1971 and Sharing the Light of Faith: National Catechetical Directory for Catholics of the United States of 1979 shed helpful light on cognitive, informational topics. In To Dance with God: Family Ritual and Community Celebration (New York: Paulist Press, 1986), Gertrud Mueller Nelson discusses how sacramental formation in the household church and in the parish church interconnect, especially around the liturgical calendar. And in Teaching and Religious Imagination: An Essay in the Theology of Teaching (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1987), Maria Harris offers rich pedagogical insight into the dreams, hopes, visions and awe that lie at the core of the sacramental life of children and adults.

Sunday Eucharist

For Children. Masses for children—or what in the United States used to be called "Family Masses"—are not appropriate for the Sunday or weekend celebration but belong during the week (D.M.C., 20). Rather, the weekend eucharistic liturgy is for the whole diocese, the entire parish, the full assembly (S.C., 26, 42). It is public and inclusive, a dynamic coordination of orders: catechumens, servers, penitents, deacons, the newly baptized, veteran members, presbyters and bishops. And it addresses itself primarily to the assembly's complete ministry, the world (Kavanagh, Elements, 45-46).

The tradition of the Lord's Day functions as the ongoing and deepening plunge of all baptized persons "into the paschal mystery of Christ: they died with him, are buried with him, and rise with him; they receive the spirit of adoption as children 'in which we cry: Abba, Father' (Rom 8:15), and thus become true adorers whom the Father seeks. In like manner, as often as they eat the supper of the Lord they proclaim the death of the Lord until he comes" (S.C., 6).

Sunday eucharist is not just for God's chronological children. It is for all God's children: the child in everyone.

With Children. Usually both adults and children benefit from each other's presence in the Sunday assembly. Children learn from the example of adults who are committed to the faith, and adults are reminded by the presence of children of the attitude needed to be a true follower of Jesus Christ. Infants and children who have not yet received full initiation into the church through baptism, confirmation and eucharist, however, may best have their own separate places for child care or for catechumenal celebrations of the word according to the capacity and age of the individual. The catechetical aid, Sunday, by Christiane Brusselmans, Paule Freeburg, Edward Matthews, Monique Piret, and Christopher Walker, published in several countries in several languages, is useful for this need. These infants and children may be brought in to join the rest of the assembly for the final blessing and dismissal (D.M.C., 16).

Whenever children are present in a Sunday assembly that includes a majority of adults, even though the celebration is directed primarily to those adults, great care must be taken that the children do not feel neglected. There are several things that can help them feel welcome; if they can participate in the action of the assembly, they will feel more at home. Can they see the action of the sacred celebration? (D.M.C., 35) Can they sense simple dignity, grace, a certain self-discipline, some order and a lot of respect? (D.M.C., 33) Can they pray with the assembly? Can they participate in special dialogues? Can they sing acclamations, hymns, responses and psalms? (D.M.C., 30). Can they hear and understand the proclamation of the word? Can they follow the gestures of the sign of the cross, invitation, greeting, blessings, epiclesis, sign of peace and observe the movement of processions, communion, and dismissal? (D.M.C., 34). Can they smell the incense, Easter lilies, Christmas trees, aromatic chrism, wine, burning beeswax, or even the distinctive scent of a familiar room? Can they hear sounds that convey sacred celebration: melodies, instrumental music, bells, tones of voice, censer chains, water, applause or special familiar words? (D.M.C., 30-32). Can they use silences constructively? (D.M.C., 37, 46). Can they be comfortable in the furniture? Can they feel the touch of blessings and greetings?

Can the presider address respectful, caring words of welcome to children at the beginning of a Sunday Mass at which they are present, confirming their dignity and calling their attention to things for which they should listen or watch? Can the homilist spend a minute summarizing the message of God's word in language directed specifically to the children present? Before the final blessing and dismissal, can the presider in a sentence or two invite the children to go forth to the ministry of evangelizing the world in their own special way?

On the occasion of the gospel reading from Lk 17:11-19, the story of the healing of the ten lepers, one homilist included ten children in the entrance procession. During the proclamation of the gospel, one by one the children turned away from the lectern and silently walked out of the assembly. After the proclamation was completed, one boy turned back again toward the lectern and shouted at the top of his voice from the back of the church, "My God, I forgot. Thanks." Neither children nor adults missed the point of the story. And it added only three seconds to the length of the celebration. This—along with bringing forward wine, water and bread for the preparation of gifts, passing out palms, music, bulletins, and candles, or singing a song for the Mass—is the kind of task children can perform for the benefit of all (D.M.C., 18).

Unless the homilist addresses children directly in the homily, if only for a sentence or two, it is appropriate—even if the children are fully initiated into the church through baptism, confirmation, and eucharist—to celebrate the word "in a separate but not too distant room. Then, before the eucharistic liturgy begins, the children are led back to the place where the adults have meanwhile celebrated their own liturgy of the word" (D.M.C., 17; see also 24).

The "separate but not too distant room" can be made into a place for sacred celebration with inviting furniture, a candle, lectionary, freedom from distractions, flowers, or appropriate works of art. The celebration may include dismissal from the larger assembly after the opening prayer, a somewhat orderly walk to the room, regrouping prayer, sung acclamation, proclamation of one or two (always the gospel) readings, drama or mime, a homily of story sharing in which the form and content suit both the word proclaimed and the capacity of the children, a profession of faith, and general intercessions. Some parishes divide age levels for these celebrations. Some age levels find a carpeted floor serves best for sitting. Some parishes have timekeepers; others have intercom systems to get fully initiated children back with the larger community in time for the eucharistic prayer. In some parishes, catechetical aids are handed out for the celebration of the word, while in others, the minister of the word may hand them out to the child or guardian after Mass for use in the home or classroom later.

Adaptations of lectionary texts for proclamation with children should be faithful to original biblical languages, consistent with central doctrinal traditions, respectful of the vocabulary and cognitive ability of the age group, and sensitive to the emotional needs of children for self-esteem.

"Avoiding any childish style of speech" (D.M.C., 23) is one reason that for proclamation with children, some highly respected sacramental catechists like Mary Perkins Ryan and Mary Reed Newland favor the use of a good, standard lectionary for adults rather than adaptations for children. They are concerned lest a dilution of the important biblical images and church traditions result not only in a loss of verbal challenge for the children but also in a waste of liturgical and biblical catechetical opportunity. "How sad," they might say, "to miss a chance with four-year-olds to homilize about the simple, powerful transformations in nature, for example, if you must use the phrase 'come to life' rather than the word 'resurrection,' because the latter has too many syllables."

Weekday Eucharist

"Weekday Mass in which children participate can certainly be celebrated with greater effect and less danger of boredom if it does not take place every day (for example, in boarding schools). Moreover, preparation can be more careful if there is a longer interval between diverse celebrations" (D.M.C., 27). Weekday eucharistic celebrations with children in which only a few adults participate (D.M.C., 20-54) should not detract from the Sunday parish celebration. Lectionary readings for a subsequent Sunday are not to be anticipated on a weekday. Weekday Masses can undermine a child's or teenager's motivation for the parish Sunday liturgy. The reason is that now more emphasis is placed on careful preparation for the celebration (D.M.C., 29) and on full participation in the celebration (D.M.C., 22-24). "Sometimes it will be preferable to have common prayer, to which the children may contribute spontaneously, or else a common meditation, or a celebration of the word of God. These are ways of continuing the eucharistic celebrations already held and of leading to a deeper participation in subsequent celebrations" (D.M.C., 27).

Singing and Music. "Singing must be given great importance in all celebrations, but it is to be especially encouraged in every way for Masses celebrated with children, in view of their special affinity for music. The culture of various peoples and the capabilities of the children present should be taken into account" (D.M.C., 30).

Despite immense strides in liturgical music for children over the past 30 years, there is still far to go. Latin plainsong gave way to the vernacular first in the form of 19th-century romantic, subjective, sentimental hymns. Children of the late 20th century seldom found themselves at home here. Then, in response to M.C.W. and L.M.T. of the United States Catholic Conference, came some liturgically stronger works (in antiphonal, responsorial, acclamatory, and litanic forms) but musically uninspired, this time in a general Broadway or "pop" style. "Pop" is the widest-spread trend in the liturgical music industry in the United States today. Spiritually hungry children are still asked to sing weak words to poor melodies.

Liturgical music in folk idioms (like jazz, ballad, American spiritual, dance and other forms) rendered authentically with evocative, rhythmic, improvisational and narrative forms sometimes breathes fresh air into children's liturgies. Occasionally children are heard to sing even the old sacred classics: the Renaissance masterpieces of Palestrina, Praetorius, or Byrd; the baroque works of Rome's Vivaldi, Saxony and London's Handel, and Germany's Bach; the classical marvels of Mozart; romanticism's later Beethoven with his Ninth Symphony's choral finale and its setting for Schiller's "Ode to Joy"—have you heard children sing that?—or a Schubert with his "Ave Maria."

In 20th-century music, although the "classicism" of Stravinsky differs from that of Mozart, for example, the rational approach remains. It is this rationality and purity in good taste of the classical traditions, along with the commitment of many composers like Bartok, Britten, Copland, Hovhanness, Ives, Kodaly, Orff, Rutter, Gelineau and those at Taize to the bodily element, passion, feeling—as opposed to sentimentality—that is lacking in much contemporary liturgical music. Some rock has helped free children for this important bodily aspect of music.

The great choral settings of the Jewish, Anglican, Lutheran, Methodist, Orthodox, Roman and Shaker traditions, the great vocal and instrumental works of the classical and folk traditions yesterday and today—this great music might well replace much of what is currently used in liturgies for children.

Within limits, perhaps because they have less to unlearn, children can sing harmonically and rhythmically "more difficult" music than most adults can. There is a fine line between great music for adults and great music for children but a giant chasm between great music and poor music.

Point: there are three qualities needed in liturgical music for children. First, liturgies for children need fine music with roots in the classical and folk traditions of the past and present. Second, liturgies for children need liturgical music—acclamations, litanies, psalms, responses, Gloria, Alleluia, Credo, Sanctus, Amen, Agnus Dei (D.M.C., 31), and Lord's Prayer—rendered in a manner appropriate to the liturgy. Third, a strong, developmental musical repertoire is needed—a pedagogical sequence with inner coherence that helps children build lasting

Teachers and directors of liturgical music for children who are better trained in all three of these areas are much needed. Even harder to find is the great contemporary composer with skills in these three areas. Noteworthy exceptions include composers in the style of Jerome Collier, Bernadette Farrell, the early Bernard Huijbers, Augusta Thomas, and David Wilcox.

Children Need an Expanded Narthex. Even more than adults, children need an intermediate space to gather en route to the work and play of sacramental worship and, after the dismissal, en route to the work and play of the evangelization of the world. The direct transition from assembly to world is too abrupt. A chance to meet, greet, inquire, share, and become the body of Christ informally enhances the sense of assembly at liturgy. A chance for peers to reinforce each other in the evangelizing task for which members of the body are sent forth gives the liturgical experience a stronger link with daily life.

Initiation

Of Infants. With a few brief, local exceptions, Christians always have and always will baptize infants. It is unlikely that John the Baptist imposed age restrictions in his ministry, that Jesus did not welcome children or place them at the center of the reign of God (Mk 9:33-37; 10:13-16; Mt 18:1-6; Lk 9:46-48; 18:15-17), that the apostles ignored the infants when they baptized entire households (Acts 2:37-39).

Christians hold up children as models of faith for all people approaching baptism: "Rid yourselves of all malice and all deceit, insincerity, envy, and all slander; like newborn infants, long for pure spiritual milk so that through it you may grow into salvation, for you have tasted that the Lord is good" (1 Pet 2:1-3).

Vatican II called for the revision of the rite of confirmation "in order that the intimate connection of this sacrament with the whole of Christian initiation may stand out more clearly" (S.C., 71). According to the revised rite of confirmation, 11, promulgated in 1971, the confirmation of those baptized as infants is to be postponed until the age of reason. The word "postponed" recalls the original practice in the Roman church of confirming immediately after baptism. In the 1983 Code of Canon Law, canon 891 likewise prescribes "the age of discretion," that is, about seven years of age, as the age of confirmation. Canon 889 does not require that a confirmand have the use of reason. Rather, "if they have the use of reason, they must be suitably instructed, properly disposed, and able to renew their baptismal promises." The rite of confirmation, 13, states that Christian initiation "reaches its culmination in the communion of the body and blood of Christ. The newly confirmed should therefore participate in the eucharist which completes their Christian initiation." The modal verb in the last sentence is "should," not "must." This means that confirmation is optimally conferred on children at about the age of seven during the eucharist at which they also receive first communion.

Since 1910, the practice in most dioceses and parishes of the United States has been to change confirmation from a sacrament of initiation to a sacrament of transition into adulthood, conferring it on teenagers outside its traditional order several years after first communion. Restoring the traditional order of the sacraments of initiation—baptism, confirmation, eucharist—accords with scripture, the patristic writings, Vatican II, the rite of confirmation itself, canon law, the clear witness of the "Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults" (R.C.I.A.), liturgical and sacramental theology and pastoral practice in Roman Catholic churches in many other countries and in all Orthodox churches. Restoring this order is discussed with pastoral examples at the diocesan and parish level in When Should We Confirm? The Order of Initiation, edited by James A. Wilde (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1989).

Of Children of Catechetical Age. The section of R.C.I.A. entitled "Christian Initiation of Children Who Have Reached Catechetical Age" (252-330) adapts the order for adults to the needs and capacities of children between the ages of about seven and fifteen. The steps include: acceptance into the order of catechumens, election or enrollment of names (optional), penitential rites (scrutinies), and sacraments of initiation.

Baptism, confirmation, and eucharist are to be conferred in that order at one, single celebration of the eucharist, "preferably at the Easter vigil or on a Sunday, the day that the church devotes to the remembrance of Christ's resurrection" (see Rite of Baptism for Children, Introduction, 9; R.C.I.A., 304).

The North American Forum on the Catechumenate (Forum) sponsors consultations and institutes on the order of Christian initiation of children, having discovered that the need is far greater than formerly thought. The sacramental, catechetical, spiritual, ritual, and pastoral observations of Forum are available in Catechumenate: A Journal of Christian Initiation, 11 (March 1989). See also the broad discussion in Issues in the Christian Initiation of Children, edited by Kathy Brown and Frank C. Sokol (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1989).

Reconciliation

The experience of reconciliation begins early in the life of a child. The acknowledgment and celebration of reconciliation early within the household church can strongly and positively affect the deep experience of self-respect and respect for others throughout a person's life. The experience of God's forgiveness, a function of God's mercy, can subtly, powerfully, and permanently change the life of a child or adult. The parable of the prodigal son and the even more prodigal father (Lk 15:3-32) needs to be acted out by children in the domestic and parish church. Growth in appreciating reconciliation—intimately linked with esteem—is gradual. This growth reaches several high points in life, one of which is usually during the teen years. In fact, it may be that the fuller implications of the sacrament of reconciliation are best drawn in those years—seldom earlier.

Canon 914 makes some good pastoral points: "It is the responsibility, in the first place, of parents and those who take the place of parents as well as of the pastor to see that children who have reached the use of reason are correctly prepared and are nourished by the divine food as early as possible, preceded by sacramental confession; it is also for the pastor to be vigilant lest any children come to the Holy Banquet who have not reached the use of reason or whom he judges are not sufficiently disposed."

With canons 213, 226, 843, 913, and 914 (above), we can conclude that obligations are imposed on parents, guardians and pastors to prepare a child according to her or his capacity. If a child does not wish to approach the sacrament of reconciliation, that does not by itself constitute grounds to deny her or him the right to receive first communion. "The requirement of reconciliation before first communion is not absolute; it can admit of exceptions" (John M. Huels, "First Confession," Disputed Questions in the Liturgy Today, Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988). The right and obligation of parents and pastors to catechize children about God's love and willingness to forgive is always the first and last word.

Liturgies of Morning and Evening Prayer for Children

Adaptations of the liturgy of the hours for children are greatly needed in the domestic churches, parish churches, and church schools. Frequently it may be better for both children and adults to celebrate these liturgies of the word rather than liturgies of the eucharist during the week (D.M.C., 27). The same creative principles of art, environment and music apply to morning and evening prayer. Devotion to the real presence of Christ in the word, in the assembly, and in the ministers is there. The treasures of the lectionary, the patristic and other writings, and the church calendar with its feasts, fasts, seasons, cycles, saints and Sundays are opened amply. Simplicity and progressive solemnity remain options (D.M.C., 14).

Vatican II envisioned the liturgies of morning and evening prayer as celebrations for the whole church (S.C., 83-101). With hymns, psalms, readings, canticles, prayers, and blessings, these celebrations can open children to a rich tradition of liturgical prayer. They complement and enhance the Sunday eucharist. And they allow the heroes and heroines of the sanctoral cycle to be powerful sources of encouragement in the faith for children, if presented in an emotionally healthy way. The faith of martyrs, the dedication of Mother Cabrini, the generosity of Vincent de Paul, the consuming love in John Bosco, or the missionary zeal of Francis Xavier can challenge children to begin creating the work of art that is their own life.

Morning and evening prayer can ring out the spirit of high seasons like Lent/Triduum/Eastertime or Advent/Christmas/Epiphany just as effectively as liturgies of the eucharist can. All these liturgies point joyfully to the central paschal mystery of Christ. The liturgies of eucharist, morning prayer and evening prayer can constructively and powerfully link children in the domestic church, school, parish church, cathedral church, or universal church together through the liturgical calendar.

Pastoral Liturgical Possibilities for Children in the Future

A few of the many areas of emerging practice under current discussion and that may point toward the future are:

Adaptation of the Catechumenate for Infants. In household churches strong in Christian faith, parents may opt for their infant's acceptance into the order of catechumens rather than immediate baptism. Whether for a period of weeks or years, the status of a catechumen as a member of the household of Christ allows for blessings, other suffrages, marriage or burial in the church (National Statutes for the Catechumenate, 8-10).

If and when the faithful and actively practicing Christian parent(s) of an infant or child catechumen request full initiation for her or him, after a suitable time of election and catechesis, the sacraments of baptism-confirmation-eucharist are conferred at a single eucharistic celebration. The triadic unity of the sacraments of initiation is acknowledged, therefore, for infants also. Baptism-confirmation-eucharist constitute a coherent whole according to the most ancient and pervasive Christian traditions. Just as the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are one, so are baptism-confirmation-eucharist one, and they are celebrated as one, any time between birth and death. (Communion by intinction works well for infants and toddlers.)

Sacrament of Reconciliation for Teenagers. Catechesis and celebration of reconciliation begins in the household church already for infants. When household members esteem one another, forgive one another, acknowledging weakness and sin in everyone but giving intensely to help heal that brokenness, the stage is set for happy experiences of wholeness and reconciliation. These directly prepare for experiences of sacramental reconciliation.

Such preparation has not worked effectively when first confession before first communion at about age seven meant that the quality and intensity of catechesis for that sacrament relaxed afterward. People in mid-life were catechetically arrested at age seven regarding reconciliation, and their attitudes and words showed it. Adults confessed sins the way they were taught in the second grade, their social consciousness was stunted, or they stopped availing themselves of the sacrament entirely. The path leading to adult sacramental reconciliation could well be lengthened—a lengthening accompanied by household-church, peer-church, and parish-church catechesis, awareness raising, and experience. Delay without suitable catechesis, social consciousness expansion, and experience serves no one. But if there is a sacrament that marks the adult assumption of responsibility for oneself and others, it is reconciliation, which may best occur first in the late teens.

Point: Jesus Christ and the church are for sinners who want to be one with God, themselves, and their neighbor. All Christians are children growing in love and union fractions becoming integers. The child in us all cries out to experience, acknowledge, and celebrate this wholeness, this communion.

CHRIST, FEASTS OF

Vatican II reminds us that the Lord's Day, the "eighth day of the week" which commemorates Christ's Resurrection as the beginning of the New Creation, is "the original feast day" of Christ (S.C., 106).

The reforms of that same council directed the church's focus of attention to those feasts of Christ in which the Christian community celebrates the central mysteries of salvation (S.C., 108). Thus feasts of "idea" (J. Jungmann), such as Corpus Christi, are clearly subordinated to celebrations of the principal saving "events."

The primary feast of Christ is Easter, celebrated in a cycle which moves from Palm Sunday to Pentecost Sunday. Next to Easter in importance is the celebration of Christmas, commemorated in a cycle which goes from Christmas Eve to the Feast of the Baptism of Our Lord.

The Easter Cycle

Palm Sunday. Christ's entrance into Jerusalem amidst acclamation expresses his own determination to bring his message to the center of Jewish faith and authority for a final confrontation. The entrance is thus a provocative one, but, more deeply, it is the expression of Christ's passionate longing that Jerusalem open itself to his message. His journey up to Jerusalem now becomes the way to the cross where acclamation gives way to desertion and jeers. In this liturgy the Church community carries the palm branches as a sign of its readiness to accompany Christ as he enters upon his Pasch.

Holy Thursday. The Pasch of the Lord begins with the Last Supper and the institution of the Holy Eucharist. On the night he was betrayed Christ affirmed the relation between his imminent death and the blessings of the Kingdom (Christ's primary symbol for salvation) which during his ministry had been mediated in a principal way to his disciples and others through table-fellowship with him. He thus showed his trust that God's promised salvation would occur not simply despite but rather by means of his self-giving on the cross into the hands of sinners and into the hands of his Father. On Holy Thursday the complete freedom of Christ's self-offering comes to expression, as well as its character as service (expressed in the washing of the feet). Israel's primal themes of exodus and covenant, blessing and commemoration provide the interpretive framework for Christ's words and actions at his Last Supper. In the light of Christ's Pasch the liturgy views the great saving events of Israel's history as "types" which receive their definitive fulfillment in Christ's passover. Indeed, while differing in their chronology, both the Synoptics and John indicate that Christ's last meal possessed characteristics of the Jewish Passover. Christ's command, "do this in memory of me," establishes the eucharistic action as the church's unbloody sacrifice of praise which sacramentally re-presents Christ's self-offer as the means of continued participation in the blessings of the Kingdom and in the New Covenant wrought by the Lord's life, death and resurrection.

Good Friday. The liturgy of Good Friday in its overall simplicity of word and gesture draws the Christian community into reverent and grateful relationship to the mystery of the cross. While the last words of Christ differ according to the different evangelists and reflect each one's religious and theological concerns, they also express the various dimensions of the cross as saving-event. Christ dies stripped of his habitual experience of God yet calls out to that same God (Mark). He dies with forgiveness in his heart for those crucifying him (Luke), so different from some OT voices which cried out for the vindication of the just at the expense of their persecutors. Finally, his death is the consummation of his life because both were pure diakonia in full commitment to God's saving will (John). On the cross Christ reconciles sinners to God as in his body he represents three things: the destructiveness of sin, his own faithful and forgiving love for sinners as the historical expression of the Father's love, and the meeting of both, in which sin is no match for that love when they meet head on (2 Cor 5:21). Christ is compassionate priest, free victim and gracious offering: he offers himself to God fully and to sinners fully and, as the very incarnation of God's love for sinners in extremis, absorbs in himself the destructiveness of their sin.

Easter Vigil and Easter Sunday. Easter and Good Friday may not be exaggeratedly contrasted as if on the cross God abandons Christ who supposedly bears the full brunt of God's wrath in the place of sinners, while at Easter God becomes reconciled to Christ and sinners. More faithfully to the NT it can be said that on the cross Christ died into the resurrection (K. Rahner). Christ's death and resurrection are distinct events but, for all that, inseparable. The unity of life and intention bonding Christ and his Father, which became hidden from Christ on the cross, brought him through his suffering and death into the depths of God's life, filling him with God's glory. That glorification, in turn, rendered him, in the Spirit, present in a wholly new way to the world. In and through the church, the visible continuation of his presence, the Risen Lord is redemptively involved in all the joys and the numberless crucifixions of ongoing human history.

In the Easter event a double movement occurs: Christ's going to the Father in the Spirit and a coming to his own in a new way in that same Spirit. Accordingly, his resurrection is bodily in a two-fold way: first, God's Spirit transforms and glorifies all of Christ's personal being and, secondly, that same Spirit, in the raising of Christ, creates a community of witnesses to that saving event, a community which provides the historical sacramental sign of Christ's victorious presence, viz., the church as the body of Christ. The church has needed many expressions to give witness to the import of Christ's resurrection. Easter, as the definitive arrival of God's reign, is the divine vindication of Christ's message and person in the face of his rejection and death. Inseparably united to the cross, it spells God's victory over the law of sin and death and God's triumph over the Evil One. Through the cross and resurrection sinners are justified and their guilt expiated. Finally, Easter is the most profound sign of God's creative fidelity to the covenantal promises made to creation and to Israel, which all along were groaning for redemption.

Ascension Thursday. Drawing on the Lucan periodicization of the season of Easter the church celebrates Christ's ascensus to the Father as a chronologically separate event, while in John it is related more closely to Christ's glorification. This feast reminds the faithful that the risen Christ is present in the church and to the world in mystery and not as a reality "at hand." The experienced absence of the Lord on one level invites the church to deeper experience of him as one present in the living faith of the community and recognizable, not by looking up to heaven, but in the "breaking of bread" together and in deeds of loving service for the least of the brothers and sisters.

Pentecost Sunday. Again the Lucan schematization holds center stage as yet another primary dimension of the total Easter event is commemorated: the prophetically promised outpouring of the Holy Spirit "in the last days." Through Christ's Pasch, the Father bestowed the life-giving Spirit on chosen witnesses, creating the church and its ministry of reconciliation. This Spirit manifests itself in prophecy, in parrhesia (bold speech in confession of God's saving deed in Christ), and in multiple charisms of service. The church lives out of the power of that Spirit who continually calls it to renewal of life and service and into a future when there will be a new heaven and a new earth. As the creation of the Spirit and as spatio-temporal institution, the church is the earthen vessel of election, combining free grace and stable structures, where structures are meant to give grace a body and grace is the raison d'être of the structures. The church is the fundamental sacrament of the ongoing presence of Christ in history, Christ who is himself the primary sacrament of God.

The Christmas Cycle

The feast of Christmas is the celebration of the incarnation of the divine Word and the birth of Our Lord for our salvation. Its celebration on December 25 was intended to replace the pagan observance of the birthday of the sun, Natalis Solis Invicti, which itself was timed to fall on the winter solstice. The most tangible and human of feasts, it has claimed the Christian imagination more powerfully than the events of the Resurrection, and thus has traditionally been the more popular festival. Modern scholarship shows that we really know very little historiographically about the circumstances of Christ's birth. Both Matthew and Luke, in the light of their resurrection-faith, feel free to narrate the story of Christ's birth as the fulfillment of OT prophecy and the recapitulation of Israel's and Moses' history (Matthew), as the revelation, in all poverty, of the Good News to the poor and marginalized members of Israel's society (Luke), and as the time when he receives his primary names as Christ, Lord, Son of David, Emmanuel, Son of God and Savior.

The Incarnation is classically understood as the creative assumption by the divine Word, in the power of the Holy Spirit, of the integral human nature of Christ from the first moment of conception. Christmas expresses this truth of faith more narratively and evocatively as the birth of a baby whose vulnerability is the disarming foreshadowing of the vulnerability, thoroughly adult and freely chosen, which will mark his ministry of action and of suffering. The shepherds' responsive action upon hearing the divine ("angelic") revelation (Lk 2:8-14) and the contemplative silence of Mary (Lk 2:19) presage the two dimensions of authentic discipleship (Lk 10:29-42).

The Logos of John's Prologue, the pre-existent Wisdom and creative Word of God, comes to dwell among God's people, thus revealing that God has all the room in the world—for the world: for its joys and pains, its anxieties and tyrannies, its longings and its addictions. Pure hospitality and transforming grace are the ways of the Word in the Spirit, revealed as such in the gracious ways of Christ as babe and, later, as itinerant preacher and charismatic healer in the service of God's Good News.

At the adult feast of Christmas, the one for whom there was no room at the inn offers room to our own "bloody births" as we suffer losses, relinquish parts of ourselves and identify with the oppressed in their struggle for freedom, as we seek under grace to accompany Christ on his way.

The Christmas cycle continues with explicitation of further dimensions of the revelation of God through Christ in the Spirit.

The Solemnity of the Epiphany of Our Lord celebrates, in the Western churches, the adoration of the Magi from the East as the story of the revelation of the mystery of God's saving will (Eph 1:9) as embracing Gentiles as well as Jews. In the Eastern churches Christmas (January 6, an ancient date for the winter solstice and formerly the pagan feast of Dionysus) commemorates the birth of Christ and the homage of the Magi, while Epiphany marks Christ's baptism. The mystery of Christ as one sent by the Father in the Spirit to all nations and races and the essentially missionary character of the church both find memorial in this feast. Moreover, the Magi's following of the star to the crib has always expressed the longing of philosophers and sages for the fullness of truth, which only is found in full surrender to God in Christ, the Wisdom of God. For Western Christians the feast can be a reminder as well of the profound riches of worship, theology and spirituality which the Eastern churches bring to the catholica.

The Christmas cycle ends with the Baptism of Our Lord. This is at once an event of revelation, naming and anointing on God's part and, on Christ's part, an event of prophetic gesture of self-emptying solidarity with sinners as he identifies with their longing for redemption and desire to be part of the "saved remnant." The story of the washing in the Jordan and (in an anticipation of Easter) the descent of the Spirit upon Christ in its various synoptic versions brings the mystery of incarnation forward to the adult stage of Christ's life as he stands poised for public ministry. As at the baptism so too in his ministry he will be empowered by God's continual naming of him in the Spirit, and thus will be able to pour out himself in compassionate service of sinners and those oppressed in body and spirit. For present-day Christians, the feast is a celebration as well of the discipleship-way which began with their own baptism into Christ and into his life of service. Furthermore, it is a reminder that they can learn, over a lifetime, to draw strength from the sacrament's washing and anointing in the name of the Trinity.

Secondary Solemnities and Feasts of Christ's Saving Events

Feast of the Presentation of the Lord. The customary Jewish ritual of the consecration of the first-born son to God as an event of Christ's life becomes, in this feast, the celebration of his being "born of a woman, born under the Law" and living a life of total dedication to his Father's will in and through the gifts and limitations of his own humanity and of his religious, social and cultural milieu, whose deepest aspirations he will fulfill as the crucified and risen one.

Solemnity of the Annunciation of the Lord. The divine election of Mary and her gracious "yes" to God's initiative in the incarnation comes to focus in this feast, which highlights the freely chosen dependence of Almighty God on a human freedom exercised in co-operative grace. In the incarnation of the divine Word all happens totally of grace and all happens totally in human freedom (St. Bernard).

The Feast of the Transfiguration. On the mountain of revelation, Christ is shown as the fulfillment of the law (Moses) and the prophets (Elijah), and as the beloved Son who shares God's glory. For a moment this glory fills him and becomes evident to the three chosen disciples who will later be asked to enter the Garden of Gethsemane with their Master. That same glory will permanently suffuse him only after and because (Phil 2:9) he has suffered "many things" in fidelity to God and sinners.

Solemnities and Feasts of Christ Which Do Not Focus on a Saving Event

Feast of the Holy Family (December 30). Celebrated within the Christmas cycle, this feast commemorates the saving truth that Christ grew up nourished by human love and subject to human authority, yet was destined, in the Spirit, to be oriented to God the Father's will and word in a way which relativized all fleshly ties (Mk 3:34-35).

Solemnity of the Most Holy Body and Blood of Christ (second Sunday after Pentecost). This feast, which traditionally involves a solemn procession with the eucharistic bread, developed in the 13th century when the visual experience of the eucharistic host as such was accorded greater value than in the post-Vatican II church. Corpus Christi retains its theological significance as a celebration of God's gift of Christ in the Spirit to the church and world as its food and drink of everlasting life. Moreover, in the celebration of this feast the church as the body of Christ experiences itself called to let the Spirit fashion it more and more into bread and drink for the world.

Solemnity of the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus (Friday after the Solemnity of the Most Holy Body and Blood of Christ). The theological significance of this feast consists, fundamentally, in the worshipful celebration of the divine and human mystery of love revealed in Christ. The specific focus on the heart of Christ amounts to a focus on his freely chosen love for sinful humanity, taking the physical heart as the real symbol of his (relatively autonomous) human center of freedom and choice. In the Son, the free "victim" of sin's violence, both God's constant love and sin's destructive power are revealed in an encounter that is full of grace and death. The feast can best avoid false sentiment and bad theology when the praying community remembers the victims of oppression, abuse, warfare and addiction as those with whom the glorified Christ (who can die no more) chooses to identify. The call to offer reparation, traditionally associated with this feast and devotion, then becomes an invitation to enter into the graced struggle, motivated by love of the whole Christ, for a more just, peaceful and loving world.

Feast of the Triumph of the Holy Cross (September 14). Associated historically with the conversion of Emperor Constantine and Helena's "finding" of the true Cross, the feast has its theological significance in the paradox which the feast's name itself contains. On the cross Christ resisted evil in the sense that he refused to conspire with its dark power. But, even more fundamentally, in the power of the Spirit he absorbed the destructive force of sin, by relating to sinners not as the holy one, apart from and superior to them, but as one who chose to be in total solidarity with them, without sinning. Thus God in Christ triumphed over sinners by absorbingly conquering sin and offering nothing but mercy to the sinners. This weakness of God, this "foolish" love on the cross, showed itself more powerful than the violent power of sinful human beings (1 Cor 1:25).

Solemnity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Universal King (last Sunday in ordinary time). The feast was established by Pope Pius XI in 1925 in the consciousness of the increasing secularization of the West. The meaning of kingship, when said of Christ, must be derived from an understanding in faith of the ministry, death and resurrection of Christ. In this feast Christians offer to Christ all their concerns expressed in naming him "king"—concern for order, for respect for the church, for the final triumph of the Good News of christianity, for the conversion of atheists and agnostics, etc. Christ in turn accepts these concerns and does them justice, while freeing the Christians who express them from all anxious ecclesiastical self-concern and self-justification and invites them to loving service of, and prophetic challenge to, the world in the manner of Christ himself.

CHRISTMAS SEASON

The Christmas season officially encompasses that part of the liturgical year from evening prayer I of Christmas (Christmas Eve) through the Sunday after the actual celebration of Epiphany or after January 6 according to the General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar. Theologically and culturally however, the Christmas season includes extensions both before and after the feasts of Christmas and Epiphany. These are specifically the season of Advent, "which begins with evening prayer I of the Sunday falling on or closest to 30 November and ends before evening prayer I of Christmas" (GNLYC v, 40); the Feast of the Baptism of the Lord which is celebrated on the Sunday following January 6; and two feasts intimately related to Christmas but separated in time, namely the Presentation of the Lord on February 2, and the Solemnity of the Annunciation on March 25. In addition to these extensions of the Christmas season proper, Christmas itself has an octave day, celebrated on January 1 as the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God. Within the octave week are several other feasts: that of the Holy Family on the Sunday within the octave; Saint Stephen, First Martyr on December 26; Saint John, Apostle and Evangelist on December 27; and the Holy Innocents on December 28. The three remaining days within the octave (December 29, 30, and 31) are marked by their own Mass propers as part of the Christmas octave. Lastly, if there is a Sunday between January 2 and January 5 it is celebrated as the Second Sunday after Christmas.

Historical Development

The center of the liturgical year in the early church was the Pascha, the annual celebration of the passover of Christ who was the "firstborn" from the dead, and consequently of all those baptized in his name. This, in turn, may have been a development of, or at least a coincident occurrence with the weekly celebration of the Resurrection each Sunday. Subsequent to the beginnings of the annual Pascha was the development of an annual commemoration of the Nativity, a commemoration which took different forms in the Eastern and Western parts of the church. In the East it centered on January 6 and had multiple emphases, in the West it centered on December 25 and was focused on the actual nativity of Jesus.

Christmas. The origins of the Western Christmas feast are elusive; our first evidence from Rome comes from the Chronograph of 354, a list of important dates and personages for the city of Rome which includes, at the top of its list of burial dates for martyrs, the entry on December 25 for the birth of Christ in Bethlehem of Judaea. By taking into account some discrepancies in the chronological order, the chronograph reveals a celebration of Christmas dating back to 336. This dating and evidence provides the basis for one of two main theories on the origins of Christmas in contemporary scholarship.

The first theory uses the history of religions, specifically the deliberate replacement or countering of a pagan festival with one of Christian content. In 274, the emperor Aurelian re-established a specifically Roman version of the sun festival related to the winter solstice, called natalis solis invicti. Both the popularity of this festival and the long history of sun worship in Rome provided fertile ground for the development of a Christian feast of the unconquered sun, building on the already existing symbolism which described Jesus as the "Sun of Righteousness." Nature also contributed to the Christian feast with the rebirth of light following the solstice, adding a symbolism of renewal to the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem of Judaea.

The second theory in contemporary scholarship on the origins of Christmas relies on calendrical computation, specifically the relation of December 25 to March 25, the death date of Jesus. In the West by the time of Hippolytus (early 3rd century) March 25 was already believed to have been the historical date of the passion. The significance of the death date to the establishment of a nativity date lies in a theological belief inherited from Judaism and prevalent in the early church, namely that the death and birth dates of the religiously significant are the same. Not only are the patriarchs' birth and death dates the same, but also the creation and parousia will align, a belief that contributes to the eschatological dimension of the origins of Christmas. The specifically Christian twist to this dating is the establishment of March 25 as the death date and the conception date, thereby establishing the birth date nine months later on December 25. Also connected to this computation theory is the birth of John the Baptist six months prior to Jesus, based on the story of the annunciation to Mary in Lk 1:36 where Gabriel announces that Elizabeth was in her sixth month of pregnancy. John's birth would fall at the summer solstice with his conception at the autumn equinox, while Jesus' birth would fall at the winter solstice with his conception at the spring equinox. This dating not only lends itself to rich theological symbolism but exemplifies the double-dating (or balancing) evident in the establishment of liturgical feasts in the early church. Contributing to this theory of the origin of Christmas are some supportive documents from North Africa. Augustine of Hippo, in an Epiphany sermon (Sermon 202) relates that the Donatists do not celebrate the Feast of Epiphany, celebrated by Augustine's Catholic church, but makes no mention of their not celebrating Christmas, a feast established prior to Epiphany in the West. If the Donatists were celebrating Christmas it would have been established prior to the Donatist schism in 311 as they would not have adopted a Catholic feast after the schism. This earlier dating of Christmas in North Africa is supported by two anonymous writings, De pascha computus (c. 243), and De solstitiis et aequinoctiis (4th century) which both reveal the birth/death dating and the theme of "sun of righteousness" (Mal 4:2). Both of these works may be from North Africa, giving rise to the speculation that the Feast of Christmas may have originated in North Africa, independent of Aurelian's festival of natalis solis invicti. Although this theory may prove to be more sound for the origins of Christmas, the influence of the pagan Roman festival certainly contributes to the development of the Feast of Christmas.

The development of Christmas in Rome during the 5th and 6th centuries is easier to trace than its origins. Most notable is the triple celebration of Christmas within the city of Rome, each celebration with its own station. The earliest liturgy is the celebration at St. Peter's on Christmas Day with its gospel reading of the prologue of John. Following the building of the church of St. Mary Major in the 5th century, a creche in imitation of Bethlehem was added in an adjacent oratory and a nocturnal liturgy (vigil) was added there, eventually becoming another eucharistic celebration. The third station was a Mass at dawn of Christmas day, celebrated at the Church of St. Anastasia, the center of the imperial Byzantine presence in Rome. Originally celebrated by the bishop of Rome as a recognition of the significance of St. Anastasia to the Eastern Christians, the liturgy gradually acquired Christmas themes. This papal stationary pattern of Christmas liturgies for the city of Rome was adopted by Charlemagne in the 9th century and standardized throughout his domain.

Christmas Octave. The octave day of Christmas was established in the 7th century as the first Marian feast in the Roman calendar, Natale S. Mariae (Anniversary of St. Mary). Prior to this, the pagan New Year's celebration was countered in the church by fasting and penance as exemplified by the Second Council of Tours in 567, ascetical practices which were observed primarily in Gaul and Spain. After the establishment of a liturgical celebration of Mary and the recognition of an octave day for Christmas, another Gallican feature, the Circumcision of Jesus, was added to the January 1st celebration. The Gallican observance of the circumcision was added to the Roman calendar in the 13/14th centuries, creating a multifaceted celebration which was unified only in 1969 as the Solemnity of Mary, Mother of God.

Of the three days following Christmas the first two, Feast of Stephen, first martyr, and John, apostle and evangelist, were originally eastern feasts. Both date from the 4th century Syriac tradition and were adopted in the West a century later. The third feast, that of the Holy Innocents on December 28, appears first in North Africa in 505. In the Middle Ages the three celebrations were given the name Comites Christi (Companions of Christ) and epitomized as representing the three types of martyrdom. The Sunday within the octave of Christmas, the Feast of the Holy Family, has no early origins; it was established as an idea-feast in 1921.

Epiphany. The Western feast of Christmas, celebrated on December 25, was adopted in the East in Cappadocia and Antioch in the 4th century, in Egypt in the 5th century, and in Jerusalem as late as the 6th century (the Armenian church has never adopted December 25 as a nativity feast). These adoptions by the Eastern church were only half of the exchange. The West in turn also adopted the celebration of the Eastern Feast of the Epiphany by the second half of the 4th century in Rome and earlier in Gaul and Spain. But while the adoption of the Western Christmas in the East was uniformly that of a nativity celebration, the transferral of the Eastern Epiphany to the West was part of a complex evolution and disintegration of the original feast.

Our first written traces of an Epiphany celebration are from the hand of Clement of Alexandria at the end of the 2nd century, writing in his first book of the Stromateis about the Basilidian Gnostic celebration of the baptism of Jesus on January 6, which was also the date of Jesus' birth according to Clement (Strom. I, 21, 146, 1-2). Other Eastern writers confirm the identification of January 6 as the birth date of Jesus like Clement. As with the Western Christmas, there are theories from both the history of religions and calendrical computation as to the origins of Epiphany. It has affinities in place and date with the Egyptian celebration of the birth of Aion, the god of time and eternity. Also related was the festival of the drawing of water from the Nile, the source of life in Egypt. The Coptic tradition of bathing in living water (i.e., running water as in a stream) and later in special pools built into the church floor may be a reflection of the pagan festival and the Christian emphasis on the baptism of Jesus at Epiphany. The argument from computation is based on the quartodeciman pascha of April 6, a date perhaps derived from the Eastern Christian adaptation of the Jewish 14 Nisan (Passover date) based on a revision of the Julian solar calendar. The use of April 6 as the death and conception date would yield January 6 as the birth date.

Although the January 6 date was widely accepted in the East, the meaning of the feast varied widely. The literal meaning of Epiphany is manifestation, but the manifestations of God were many, and different aspects of the feast were celebrated together as complementary theophanies. In Egypt, the original stress was apparently on the baptism of Jesus, which may reflect the fact that their gospel of choice, Mark, began with the baptism story. Even in Egypt, however, the tradition was also familiar with the nativity of Jesus on that date, and eventually added to that the changing of water into wine as another expression of the manifestation of God. The celebration of the baptism of Jesus on Epiphany is widespread in the East, especially in the East Syrian and Armenian traditions. The dual emphasis on birth and baptism may have found its clearest liturgical expression in their baptismal theology, where the baptisms of all Christians were modelled on the baptism of Jesus and proclaimed as a birth into the family of God, rather than stressing the Pauline assimilation to Jesus' death found elsewhere. There is not much evidence to establish Epiphany as the common date for the celebration of baptisms in spite of the theological connection. After the adoption of the Western Christmas on December 25, however, the unity of the birth/baptism of Jesus on Epiphany is split, leaving Epiphany as a baptism-only celebration in places such as Constantinople. Although the Byzantine tradition continues with preferred times for baptism (including Epiphany and Easter) the traditional times of the year begin to break down in the centuries following, as fewer adults present themselves for baptism and infants become the norm throughout the year. The centrality of Epiphany is still seen in the Armenian church which commemorates the birth and baptism of Jesus on January 6; in the Greek church the nativity is celebrated on December 25 and the baptism on January 6, a pattern far more common among other Orthodox churches. The central rite on the Feast of Epiphany is the blessing of water, a practice recalling the importance of Jesus' baptism and the hallowing of all waters by that act.

The adoption of Epiphany in the West resulted in a very different celebration. The West's aversion to focusing solely on the baptism of Jesus may have been a reaction to the christological controversies of the time, and perhaps as a result, the secondary themes of Eastern Epiphany became primary in the West. The first Western account of Epiphany is from Gaul, where the emphasis was on the nativity. By the 5th century, however, there developed many dimensions: in Gaul the three miracles of the Magi, the baptism, and the wedding at Cana were stressed; in Northern Italy the transfiguration was added to these. Rome adopted the feast after 354 (perhaps during the pontificate of Damasus, 366-384) where the stress is a repetition of December 25 and the nativity. As a result, the proclamation to the shepherds remained on December 25, and the manifestation to the Magi moved to January 6. By the time of Augustine and Leo, the feast was narrowed to the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, whom the Magi represent. This theme which focuses on the Magi in the West led to the identification of the Magi as three kings by the 6th century, and the popular naming of the kings in the 9th century. The Gallic extension of Epiphany by the addition of an octave in the eighth century led to a further disintegration of unified celebration by moving the baptism of Jesus to the octave of Epiphany, a feast which did not officially become part of the Roman calendar until 1960. Since 1969, the Sunday after January 6, or the Monday following Epiphany if it falls on the 7th or 8th of January, is celebrated as the Baptism of Christ. (In the United States, Epiphany is a Sunday celebration, regardless of the actual calendar date).

Advent. The development of a liturgical season preparatory to Christmas is Western in its origins and celebration. The dual origins of Advent are still visible in the double focus of the contemporary season which reflects both the end time, the second coming of Christ, and prepares for the celebration of Christmas, the commemoration of the first coming of Christ.

Our first accounts of Advent come from Spain and Gaul. In the canons of the Synod of Saragossa (380), the laity are reminded of their obligation to be in church on a daily basis from December 17 through January 6. In 5th century Gaul we hear of an ascetical fast of three days a week beginning on or near St. Martin's Day (November 11) and extending to Christmas. While fasting on Wednesdays and Fridays was an ancient Christian tradition (Didache, 1st century), the addition of Monday appears to mark off the season. Neither of these pre-Christmas or pre-Epiphany accounts defends the earlier theory that Advent began as a catechumenate prior to Epiphany baptism. Baptism, while celebrated in Spain on Epiphany, was also celebrated on Christmas in the 380s (to the dismay of the Roman bishop). The designation of December 17-January 6 would coincide with the pagan celebration of Saturnalia, an event of much concern in later Christian synodical writings. The beginning of Advent's core (December 17-December 24) could be in this case a Christian ascetical practice to counter the ribald pagan celebration. The Gallican fast, on the other hand, may have found its origins in the Celtic monastic practice of triannual forty-day fasts, a practice which soon became mandatory for laity also. These ascetical practices of Gaul seem to provide the criteria for the later liturgical season. In Gaul, the season of Advent (varying from four to six weeks) took on a penitential dimension paralleling the early medieval Lent, with the use of the color purple, the dropping of the Gloria and the Alleluia from eucharistic liturgies, and the dropping of the Te Deum from the liturgy of the hours. The adoption of Celtic penitential practices and the rising emphasis on judgment at the parousia color the Gallican season of Advent, exemplified by the sequence Dies Irae, a hymn composed for the beginning of Advent.

In Rome, the origins of Advent seem to be a combination of Gallican influence and indigenous tradition. There is already evidence of a pre-Christmas fast at the end of the 4th century in Rome, a fast that may not have any relation to Christmas. Also related to the time of year but perhaps originally independent of Christmas are the Ember days, quarterly fast times of recollection. Gregory the Great (late 6th century) witnesses to a liturgical tradition of four Sunday Masses and three Ember day Masses in preparation for Christmas, which stresses the coming commemoration rather than the judgment themes seen in the Gallican tradition. In the 7th century, the composition of the poetic "O Antiphons" exemplifies this preparation for the solemnity of the nativity, and by the 8th and 9th centuries, the sacramentaries reveal the position of Advent at the beginning of the church year, replacing Christmas as the head of liturgical new year. The liturgical traditionalism of Rome made itself felt in the widespread adoption of the Roman four week Advent (replacing the longer Gallican and Spanish Advents) but by the 12th century Rome was influenced by the penitential aspects of the Gallican Advent and dropped the Gloria from the Mass, retaining the Alleluia as a vestige of an earlier non-penitential approach to Advent.

Feasts of Christmas Outside the Season. The Feast of the Presentation begins its official greeting with "Forty days ago we celebrated the joyful feast of the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ. . ." (Sacramentary, February 2), but its direct liturgical focus back to Christmas and forward to the redemption of all Christians is obscured by its very placement in the Proper of Saints, far removed from the Christmas season. This Christmas feast is first attested to by Egeria (c. 383) in her diary of 4th-century Jerusalem liturgies. It was known as Hypapante or meeting (the meeting between Simeon and Jesus). By the 5th century, the liturgy had been augmented by a procession with candles, a procession that becomes widespread and a central aspect of the feast. The feast was accepted in Rome in the second half of the 7th century, where under Pope Sergius I the procession took on a penitential character, following a common stationary route from the forum to St. Mary Major. By the mid-8th century, its adoption in the Frankish empire found it being renamed the Purification of Mary, a designation which existed simultaneously for two centuries before the Marian aspects overwhelmed the christological origins. The accompanying blessing of candles dates from a 10th century Germanic custom, finding its way to Rome by the 12th century. The Roman calendar re-adopted the feast as the Presentation of the Lord in 1969, and the sacramentary still includes a candle blessing and procession echoing the light imagery of the feast's Christmas origins: "May we who carry these candles in your church come with joy to the light of glory."

The Feast of the Annunciation is also a feast of the Lord which was restored as such in 1969, before which it was known under the title of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This feast is intimately linked with the whole process of calendrical computation discussed above. It forms, very probably, the basis of Christmas as determined from the date of the conception of Jesus. The distinct celebration of this feast, however, has often been obscured since the expansion of the penitential aspects of Lent, the season during which March 25 most often occurs. Solutions to this problem historically saw the Annunciation moved to a different date, such as December 18 in Spain and to the Sunday before Christmas in Milan. Today its celebration is restored to March 25, but again often overlooked for the same reason of conflict with Lent.

CHRISTOLOGY AND LITURGY

In its public worship the church both continues the priestly office of Jesus Christ and gives full public expression to its faith (Mediator Dei; Neuner-Dupuis, p. 346). Thus it is not surprising that the traditional principle of lex orandi, lex credendi ("the law of praying is the law of believing") obtains in a classic way for the emergence of christological dogma in the early church.

Amid the struggles to formulate an orthodox view of Christ's relation to God at the time of the Arian controversies, Athanasius made appeal to the centuries-old church practice of worshipping Jesus Christ as one equal with God the Father to justify, and provide the ultimate context of signification for, the affirmation that the divine Word or Son was homo-ousios ("consubstantial") with the Father. To be sure, the fact that the church regularly addressed its prayer to the Father through Jesus Christ became for the Arians an argument in favor of the subordination of the Son to the Father. Yet the Fathers argued that Christ's role as the definitive mediator between God and humankind demanded, rather than called into question, his full oneness in being with the Father. Furthermore, they could point to the devotional life of the church in which, from earliest times, prayer was addressed directly to Christ. Thus the church's prayer was a primary source for the dogma of the First General Council of Nicaea (325) regarding Christ's full divinity. Once the church came to a firm consensus about the meaning of homoousios, the dogma became in its turn a firm support for the liturgical practice of the church wherein Christians were invited to surrender all to Christ in discipleship to the glory of God.

The church's practice of worshipping Jesus Christ raised the further question of the basis for worshipping Christ's humanity. The Council of Ephesus (431), in condemning and deposing Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople, anathematized a view attributed (mistakenly) to him at the time that Jesus Christ is two sons, son of God and son of Mary. Making Cyril of Alexandria's second letter to Nestorius its own, the council affirmed that the divinity and humanity in Christ are united "according to hypostasis" and thus there is one Christ and Lord who is worshipped. In affirming against Nestorius that the already traditional name Theotokos (Mother of God) was a proper title for Mary which implied a true statement about Christ, the council re-affirmed the traditional understanding and practice of the communicatio idiomatum according to which divine attributes and human attributes could be predicated not only of the respective natures in Christ, but also of the one subject, the eternal Word or Son of God, Jesus Christ. The council thus affirmed that the church worships Christ's humanity with the worship reserved for God alone (latría) insofar as the humanity is united to the divine Word or Son. Once again the rule of prayer led to a rule of belief which, in turn, became a clarifying support for the church's life of worship.

The traditional and very modern question of the authentic humanity of Jesus Christ provides another dimension of Christology which relates profoundly to the church's worship. The liturgy of the word, which the reforms of Vatican II restored to its proper role in sacramental worship, involves the proclaimed narrative of the saving deeds of God in the OT and NT, with special honor accorded to the gospel accounts which witness to Christ as the subject of a life and destiny which can and must be narrated.

The narrative character of Jesus' life expressed in the church's central public act of proclamation of the gospel has not always received support from Christology as it has been elaborated by theologians and has taken hold on Christian imaginations. The affirmation of the divine Word or Son as the sole subject of the human life of Christ with the human nature conceived as an "instrument" of the divine person has often hampered the recognition that the human experiences and/or Jesus were intrinsically significant for himself in his own human development. Beginning with certain motifs in John's gospel, some Church Fathers taught, for example, that Jesus' ignorance was feigned, and that all he humanly did and said was meant to be exemplary and instructive for others but not part of the process of his own growth as a human "someone" before the Father and other people and in relation to himself. Following the General Council of Chalcedon's (451) affirmation of Jesus Christ as one prosopon and hypostasis in two complete natures, divine and human, the Third General Council of Constantinople (681) affirmed, against certain forms of Monophysitism, that Jesus Christ possesses two wills and two activities, human and divine.

This further explicitation of Chalcedon's commitment to Christ's integral human nature has encouraged modern theologians to attribute to Christ a human center of consciousness and freedom in dialogical relation with his Father, while seeking to preserve the divine Word as the ultimate "uniting unity" of the total reality of Christ. Indeed, Pope Pius XII's encyclical Sempiternus Rex (1951) on the 15th centenary of the Council of Chalcedon did not rule out christological theory which would affirm a relatively autonomous human center.

In any case, the interpretation of Christ's "hypostatic union" cannot be such that it undermines the humanity of Jesus as the immediate source of an authentically human and narratable life while it affirms that that humanity is rooted totally in the divine Word, and thus the source of a narrative which discloses in human terms the very nature of God. In other words, the rule of prayer, i.e., the church's delight in narrating the events of Jesus' life as real experiences constitutive to various degrees of his human life as well as occurring "for our sakes," encourages the development of theological interpretations of Christ's personal unity which are "narrative-friendly."

The church's liturgy expresses the identity of Christ as not only a personal but a corporate or social identity as well. For the action of the worshipping community as animated and united to its Head in the Holy Spirit is ultimately the action of Christ himself, for Christ is present in the word, in the sacramental signs, in the priest and in the praying community (S.C., 7). Thus in the liturgy one recognizes the most explicit action of Christ in our world.

Finally, recent theology has drawn attention to the context in which theological statements most fully convey their point. Church dogmas make their point finally and fully not as a result of an examination of the technical terms involved or their mutual relations, but when they are reinserted into the performative language-context which is the church's worship and service of others in Christ's name. For in the church's liturgy and in its service of the world, Christ's full consubstantiality with God and with ourselves becomes persuasive Good News when it translates, again and again, into the worshipping church's continuing self-surrender to God in Christ as an offering which extends hospitality to all that is human, graced and broken about us (Incarnation). That hospitality then becomes an invitation for all that is human to submit itself to the Lordship of Christ in the Spirit (Cross) who transforms it and draws it into the future which God has prepared for it and all that is destined to be part of God's reign (Resurrection).

CHURCH ORDER

The concept of church order is not strictly univocal. Sometimes discussion of church order is paramount to the discussion of ordained ministry and ecclesiastical office. At other times, it has to do with states of life and distinct ways of participating in the life and service of the church among all its members. In still other contexts, what is intended is the ritual and regulatory ordering that offers a pattern to follow through the cycle of the day and of the year in living the common life of the church and in celebrating its worship. These diverse understandings are interconnected.

To address the topic in as clear a way as possible, this article will first look at the concept of church order that comes from early canonico-liturgical documents. This serves as a constant point of reference. Second, it will look at the vocabulary of order in its more ecclesiastical usage and in its vocational usage. How these two usages interconnect or separate has much to do with the development of ecclesiology and of the ordering of church life. Third, the article will give more detailed and specific attention to the issue of ordering mission and ministry. Finally, it will offer a contemporary approach to an understanding of church order that is inspired by the early canonico-liturgical material but is organic rather than hierarchical. It is divided as follows: The Canon of Church Order; Order as Ecclesiastical Group; Order as Vocational Group; Order, Office and Ministry; An Ecclesiology of Organic Order.

The Canon of Church Order

A number of documents dating back to early Christian centuries are referred to as church orders. Principal among these are the Didache, the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, the Testament of the Lord, the Didascalia and the Apostolic Constitutions. They are collections of practical directives for the following of Christ, intended to regulate the common life of particular churches and subsequently adopted in part or in whole by others. They include instructions about the right way of celebrating the church's worship and some texts to be used in it. They give directives about such things as fast days, common and private prayer, the use of charisms of healing, how to receive guests and the care of the poor of the community. In the course of these directives mention is made of different groups in the church, such as the kleros, widows, virgins, charismatics, confessors, deaconesses, readers, porters and cantors, specifying the duties of each or what is expected of them. Many of these church orders follow the convention of claiming apostolic authority so that they might carry greater weight, but in fact the exact origins and even the textual history of most of them are clouded in obscurity.

Nonetheless, they were clearly important in early centuries as canonico-liturgical documents helping to order the life of churches and subsequently appealed to as authoritative sources. They might be a nightmare to persons trying to codify law for the contemporary church, and yet it is their comprehensive quality that constitutes their particular appeal. From them one sees how the ordering of worship, private prayer, the moral life, ecclesiastical discipline, and credal formulation all belong together as one organic unity. Later centuries make clearer distinctions between liturgical books, codes of law, credal pronouncements, moral treatises and methods of prayer, but sometimes at the cost of obscuring the connection between them. It belongs however to theology to reflect on the relationships and to maintain the comprehensive vision of church life mirrored in these ancient church orders and encompassing questions of ministry, vocation, mission, church law and sacrament.

To explain the relation between the different groups, especially in the assembly, some of these treatises resort to nautical imagery. Thus we have this passage in the Apostolic Constitutions 2, 57, 2-10: "When thou (O bishop) callest an assembly of the Church as the one that is commander of a great ship, appoint the assemblies to be made with all possible skill, charging the deacons as mariners to prepare places for the brethren as for passengers with all due care and decency. . . . In the middle let the bishop's throne be placed and on each side of him let the presbytery sit down; and let the deacons stand near at hand. . . . In the middle let the reader stand upon some high place; let him read . . . let some other sing the hymns of David. . . . Let the porters stand at the entries of the men and observe them. Let the deaconesses also stand at those of the women, like shipmen." (English translation by James Donaldson, The Ante-Nicene Fathers 7, 421).

There is already a concept of ordering in the sense of ranking in this passage as elsewhere in these documents, springing from the distinction between the clergy and the people. This was, however, to be accentuated later with the enlargement of the ranks of the clergy to include others besides bishops, presbytery and deacons and by the adoption of a paradigm of hierarchy.

Order As Ecclesiastical Group

It seems to have been Tertullian, followed closely in this by Cyprian, who introduced the word and notion of ordo and ordinatio into ecclesiastical Latin and into church life. In classical Latin, ordo was used to designate particular groups of persons who had roles to play in the ordering of public life or who had a particular public profile. Thus, there were the ordo senatorius, the ordo equester, the ordo iudicum, the ordo scribarum, the ordo decurionum, the ordo matronarum and the ordo canentium. The verb ordinare and its substantive ordinatio meant such things as determining public ordinances, putting order into the life of a group, or naming somebody to public office, as, for example, to the order of magistrates. Tertullian used ordo and ordines in this rather generic sense to refer to such groups as bishops, designated ministers of different kinds, virgins and widows. At the same time, we find him distinguishing between the ordo sacerdotalis and the plebs, or faithful in general (De Exhortatione Castitatis VII, 2-3; CCL II, 1024f).

It is in this connection that ordinare and ordinatio began to take on a more precise meaning in Cyprian's Latin usage: Epistolae

55.24:	C.S.E.L. , III	642;
59.5:	ibid. ,	672;
66.9:	ibid. ,	733;
67.5:	ibid. ,	739.

These references pertain to the appointment to church office, to investiture in it by whatever process or ritual was followed and even more specifically to the laying-on of hands for the induction of bishops.

Beginning with these two writers, through late antiquity and through the early Middle Ages, one finds this parallel usage of the Latin terminology. On the one hand, any group that is given a distinctive place in the church's public gathering, especially in its worship, is an order. Thus there is mention of the order of bishops, the order of presbyters, the order of deacons, the order of readers, the order of virgins, the order of widows, the order of catechumens and even the order of penitents. In passing it may be noted that in the East the concept of taxis or economy allows for such groupings of church members. On the other hand, in church Latin there is the distinction that becomes more markedly noted between the order of the clergy and the people, paralleled in Greek by kleros/laikos. Fostered by local councils and most of all by the Roman church, the binomy clergy/laity prevailed and led to the ordering into ranks of the ordo clericalis itself, as well as to its absorption of offices and liturgical ministries that would otherwise have belonged within the body of the faithful. Such are the liturgical ministries of reader, acolyte, subdeacon, cantor and psalmist, and the offices of porter, notary, defensor, gravedigger and body-servant or chamberlain to the bishop. Designations for these clerical groups or their offices that serve as alternatives to ordo are gradus, officium, honor, munus and dignitas.

The history of the clericalization of church life is complex. It appears to have had much to do with preoccupation over what ought to be expected of those designated to the service of the altar. The canonico-liturgical church orders mentioned earlier make a clear distinction between installation into office by cheirotonia or the laying-on of hands and other forms of appointment, such as simple naming to office, giving of instruments or praying over. Only bishops, presbyters and deacons received the laying-on of hands because they alone were to minister at the altar. At first, it is they who constitute the ordo sacerdotalis or the kleros. Demands of sanctity were quickly placed on them, for otherwise it was not seen how they could exercise so holy a service.

The development of a greater order of clergy, ranked within itself and markedly distinct from the body of the faithful, is well-exemplified in the cursus honorum of the Roman church. It begins with the sacralization of the offices of bishop, presbyter and deacon and with the moral demands made of them. In papal decretals of the 4th and 5th centuries there is an increasing parallelism between the ordained ministry of the church and the levitical priesthood of the OT, centered around the offering of sacrifice. The parallelism grounded the expectation that bishops and their attendant clergy practice continence, poverty and a life of constant prayer. Introduction into the ranks of the lower clergy at an early age provided a school of spiritual learning and discipline for those who would later receive the laying-on of hands and greater ecclesiastical responsibility. By reason of association, lesser offices, whether liturgical or otherwise, assumed the sacred aura of the higher. All official service in the church thus came to appear as a sacred duty and dignity that separated the clergy from the plebs and imposed on them a distinctive way of life.

Disciplinary though it was in part, the distinction was given theological legitimation through a broader concept of order or hierarchy that represented the very nature of creation. In such an influential writer as St. Augustine, the idea of ecclesiastical order was already allied with a broader conception, one connected with the universe as it comes from God's hands and with the whole progress of history. Since it is of the very nature of the human that there be leaders and that the lesser be guided by the higher, the church too has to have its leadership. This leadership is marked by the intensity of the following of Christ and is one through which Christ himself may be said to act as leader of his people.

That Augustine should have expected the clergy of Hippo to follow a common rule of life under the bishop is not at all surprising, given this theological vision. It is, however, by no means confined to Augustine and can be found in the ordination prayers for bishop, presbyter and deacon of the Sacramentarium Veronense which praise the providence of God for its serried ordering of the world, as well as of the OT people and the church of the NT.

In the Middle Ages, however, the concept of hierarchy and its application to the church received its strongest and lasting support from the writings of the Pseudo-Dionysius, who distinguished both ecclesiastical and spiritual hierarchies in the church, comparable to the hierarchies of the heavenly hosts. Of the visible ordering of groups, only the clerical orders seemed to hold their place. Virgins, widows, catechumens and penitents might still be mentioned in the liturgical litanies and intercessions, but little sign of this was retained in the actual ordering of the assembly. So marked off were the clergy from all the other parts of the church by the second millennium that an acute commentator like St. Thomas Aquinas could ask whether the lesser orders actually represented some modicum of participation in the sacrament of priesthood (S. Th., Suppl., Q. 37, art. 1 ad 2).

Medieval treatises with titles such as De Ordinibus or De Ecclesiasticis Officiis continued to establish the ranks within the clergy and the offices included within ecclesiastical order. The Gallican canonical collection Statuta Ecclesiae Antiqua (ed. Ch. Munier, Paris 1964) and the Pseudo-Hieronimian work De Septem Ordinibus Ecclesiae (ed. A.W. Kalff, Ettal, 1938) appear to have been the principal ancient sources for these treatises. The former had the sequence: doorkeeper, lector, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon, presbyter, and bishop. The latter listed: gravedigger, doorkeeper, lector, subdeacon, deacon, presbyter and bishop. In the Roman church, the eventual listing included bishop, presbyter, deacon and subdeacon in the higher orders, and acolyte, exorcist, lector and porter in the lower, with tonsuring as the entry into the clergy.

One of the ways in which the clerical orders were given special dignity was to relate them to the life and works of Christ, so that each order could be said to be in some measure representative of Christ. One of the principal instruments in establishing this connection was the development of the treatise on the Ordinals of Christ. This probably had its origins in Egypt in the 4th century. It showed up extensively in different forms throughout the Latin West, from Ireland to Italy, so that there are over seventy versions of it in all. One important example of its use in the 11th century is that of Yves of Chartres. For Yves, Christ acted as doorkeeper when he used the whip in the temple, as reader in the synagogue of Nazareth at the beginning of his ministry, as exorcist in casting out demons, as acolyte when he declared himself the light, as subdeacon when he washed the feet of his disciples, as deacon when he gave the chalice of his blood to the twelve at the supper, as priest when he changed bread and wine into his body and blood, and as bishop when he blessed the disciples on his ascent into heaven (Sermo de Excellentia: P.L. 162, 514-519). This reflects both the respective liturgical ministries of the orders and the christological concept of the clerical state. It is an even more concrete way than that of Thomas Aquinas of relating all the clerical orders to the sacrament of order.

The 16th-century Reformers took exception to the clergy/laity distinction, especially when it was bolstered by the theory of an ontological distinction of sacramental character. While they retained the idea of a divinely instituted ministry of word and sacrament, and of a divine call to minister, they rejected the ideas of a sacrificing priesthood and of a sacred hierarchy. In their own church orders, some of them found place for pastors, deacons and elders as well as for ministers of word and sacrament, and they subjected appointment to office to variant measures of lay control, whether exercised by public officials or by local congregations. All of this was a conscious attempt to adopt patterns that reflected NT usage.

From time to time in the course of history, there have been attempts to regain some greater sense of church order and to lessen the gap between clergy and laity. Within the latter part of the 20th century there has been a more concentrated and universal trend in this direction. For one thing, the liturgical movement and then the liturgical directives of the Vatican II recognized that public worship is the prayer and concern of all and that it allows for a diversity of ministries not all associated with the clerical state but rooted in baptismal membership of God's people. Similarly, Catholic Action, the teachings of the same council and recent movements in church life have fostered the participation of the baptized in the mission and ministry of the church in quite a comprehensive way.

Greater participation does require ordering and cannot be left to personal whim or regulated purely on the basis of competency, even when this is a necessary criterion for selection. The canonical and liturgical regulation of this broader activity offers a chequered history and shows that basic notions about the church, its liturgy and its mission are not yet securely developed nor commonly shared. In a motu proprio of 1972, (Ministeria Quaedam, A.A.S., 64 [1972] 529-534), Pope Paul VI attempted to reinstate the ministries of reader and acolyte as baptismal rather than clerical acts, but the directives included compromises with clericalism that made them ineffective so that even now installation into them is more common in seminaries than elsewhere. There is much dissension at different levels about the ministries that can be exercised by women in the liturgy and about whether lay ministers may do what is proper to them when there are ordained ministers or clerics present in the assembly to do it. There are even odd quarrels here and there about whose feet are to be washed by whom on Maundy Thursday. In non-liturgical matters the provisions of the 1983 Code of Canon Law have by no means settled all questions of the laity's rights and ministries in the church, or about their participation in decision-making at parish, diocesan and universal levels.

In his 1989 post-Synodal document on the laity (Christifideles Laici, A.A.S. LXXXI [1989]), Pope John Paul II repeated the importance of the liturgical ministry of the baptized, of their part in the teaching and caring ministry of the church, and especially of their apostolic role in serving God's reign in human society. Many practical questions however remain for further clarification, as do the gender questions that have so deeply affected the development of church order throughout the centuries. How some of the theoretical and practical questions are to be addressed cannot be seen without taking account of the notion of order as vocation that has always mingled with the notion of ecclesiastical order.

Order as Vocational Group

St. Paul clearly thought that an apostle could not be genuinely such without evident personal configuration to the mystery of Christ, and Ignatius of Antioch was anxious to see his own apostolic ministry crowned by martyrdom. Neither of these, however, was under the illusion that all who served the church in a public way were necessarily more holy than others, however much they wanted to see service sanctioned by sanctity.

From the time of Origen, it has been customary to distinguish between a ministerial hierarchy and a spiritual hierarchy in the church and this was given, as indicated, firm comprobatation by the Pseudo-Dionysius. The works that go under that pseudonym enumerate the ministerial hierarchy of bishop, presbyter and deacon and the spiritual hierarchy of monk, baptized faithful and catechumen. The modes of living the inner life of the Spirit were incorporated into the understanding of the church and brought to influence the very concept of church office by way of a particular application of the universal notion of order.

This idea of order as a particular vocational group is much associated with St. Augustine but it is already found in Origen. In referring to Ezek 14:14, both Origen (In Ezech, hom. 4: G.C.S., 33, 358-370) and Augustine (Quaestiones Evangeliorum I, 12 and II, 44: P.L. 35, 1326 and 1357; Epistola III, 4: C.S.E.L., 34, 8; De Excidio Urbis Romae Sermo I, 1: C.C.L., XLVI, 249; De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione II, 10, 12: C.S.E.L., 60, 83-90; Enarratio in ps. 132, 4, 5: C.C.L., XL, 1929) took Noah, Daniel and Job as representatives of three kinds of people: churchleaders, contemplatives, and those who followed Christ in the midst of the affairs of the world. Then in such writers as Cyril of Alexandria (In Ezech hom: P.G., 70, 1457-1459) and Gregory the Great (Moralia I, 14-20: B.L., 75, 535; In Ezech hom. lib. II, hom. 4, 5: P.L., 76, 976) and it became common place in Latin medieval literature.

In medieval Latin writings the constant reference is to tria genera hominum or to tres ordines fidelium. Alternative terms to ordo are gradus, conditio, status and professio. The three groupings however do not always exactly correspond to those given by Augustine. Thus for Gregory the Great the distinction was between preachers, the continent and spouses. However it was used and whatever the penchant for the number three, the idea of order allowed for different ways in which people could follow the Christian vocation. It also made it possible to relate the spiritual life to ways of participating in church ministry, in the life of prayer and in the affairs of the world.

In the High Middle Ages, the recognition of different categories of Christian vocation was of considerable importance. Though the number three kept cropping up, and Noah, Daniel and Job still served their purpose as exemplars, the actual categories mentioned far exceeded this number. It included prelates, doctors, the married, virgins, monks, mendicants, contemplatives and preachers. As for those who followed Christ in pursuing the social enterprise, the orders included kings, lords, peasants, knights and even burghers. Numberings mixed the vocations and one categorization mentioned those who governed, those who prayed and those who took arms to defend Christendom or the defenseless of society. What is of particular interest here is how much attention was given not only to monks, clergy, mendicants and other obviously churchly groups, but also to the secular walks of life such as those of farmer, merchant and knight.

The analogy sometimes used was that of the body of Christ and its diverse members. One side of this body was said to be made up of those following spiritual pursuits and the other of those following temporal. Speaking of the organs by which the body was compacted. Honorius Augustodunensis listed these orders: praelati, ecclesiā subditi, doctores, religiosi, magistri, milites armis defendentes, coniugati, agricolae, virgines and lastly, continentes orantes (In Cant. tr. II, c. 5: P.L., 172, 444).

There was some tension in the ordering of walks of life between a hierarchical conception of the church and an organic one. As long as authors had participation in the life of Christ in mind, they seem to have used organic imagery whereby in one body all contribute diversely to the growth and health of the whole. In turning to structure and the exercise of power in diffusing the life of Christ, however, they mostly adopted hierarchical patterns. Discussion of the states of life allowed for an influence of person upon person or of persons on the health of the whole body. This was however obscured in discussions about church office and ordained ministry. As a result, there was no clear perception of how personal charism and official ministry converged nor of how ministry was exercised by those not holding office.

To see this ordering of walks of life in proper perspective, two things need to be kept in mind. First, church and society were coterminous and the law of Christ was to keep it so. The ideal was that of a Christian order, maintained by spiritual and temporal power alike. The enemies of one, whether heretics or Islam, were considered the enemies of the other. Second, the issues of church order in larger or narrower sense were solved in terms of a universal church and its organization rather than primarily in terms of a particular or local church. What was at stake was what had to be done if a Christian order were to govern the totality of life and of civilization.

It was this concern with the universal that was one of the primary factors in allowing vocation to diverse forms of religious life and ecclesiastical ministry to intersect. Disputes between monks.

mendicants and regular clergy over pastoral ministry and privilege were tempestuous and rancorous. They were often resolved in favour of the mendicants by appeal to the sovereign and universal jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff.

St. Bonaventure's treatment of the role of the papacy is noteworthy in that regard. He shows the hierarchy of jurisdiction in any part of the church to flow from pope to metropolitan to diocesan ordinary to parish priest, each of these authorities having the right to intervene in the jurisdiction of the lower should the greater need require it (cf. Commentarium in Sententias Dist. XIX, III, 1, 4; Dist. XXIV, II, II, 4). Through such argumentation the religious orders who claimed the authority of the pope in their favour could claim exemption from the jurisdiction of the closer prelate, both in regulating their own lives and in many aspects of their pastoral work. If they had a sovereign mandate to preach or to confess penitents, or to minister a place of public worship, who could impede them? Such exemption was bolstered by the ideals of a higher calling that ranked mendicants above regular clergy in their state of life.

In earlier times, pastoral ministry had been confided to monasteries in the interests of the faithful when local men an ideal of the good pastor. With the appearance of the mendicant friars, more mobile in their ministry and at first unpropertied, regular clergy and religious functioned alongside each other, claiming different jurisdictions and often quarrelling over the right of access to the people. Not only jurisdiction but virtue could give the edge to the religious.

While St. Thomas Aquinas saw the episcopacy as a state of perfection because of its high calling (II-II, 184, 5), he also believed in the ideal of combining the contemplation of divine things with their transmission through teaching (II-II, 181, 3). A religious order of universal expansion could be seen to offer a distinctive ministry and to serve an order of communion beyond the particular church. It could also be seen as following a higher call. On both counts, the change had its effect on diocese and on regular clergy, whose scope and image began to take on some of the properties of the universal religious order. Earlier called upon to imitate the monk in the following of Christ, the diocesan priest was now expected to model himself on the friar. Clearly here was an issue of church order that served the option for an ecclesiology of universal institution and of higher states of life as principle of organization.

On the side of the laity, the relation of Christian life to concerns of the world became more complex and varied. It escaped the categorizations where it was enough to list ascetics, widows, virgins and the married. It was not even enough in due course to list the ruler, the ruled and the knight defender. The social and economic life of Europe underwent great upheaval during the High Middle Ages and beyond. Merchant classes found their place on the scene and looked to theologians, often among the friars, for an ethic suited to their class and trade. The whole social order passed beyond the feudal to the life of the commune and the city state. Within what is more narrowly called ecclesiastical life there were the popular evangelical movements, the aspirants to the devout life who pursued their own rule of life without joining a monastery or convent, and in time the sodalities and confraternities of rich diversity. Having attempted to embrace this state of affairs through use of the concept of order, theology's eventual response was to develop the treatise on the states of life and to give more attention to the life of the individual person in tracts on grace and on the virtues.

In conjunction with this kind of treatment of the human person, there emerged a canon law and a theological vision that depended greatly on the distinction between clergy, religious and laity. This was less an organic vision than an organizational and societal one. It bolstered that view of the church which in the post-Reformation era saw it as a society of hierarchical order, designed to meet the spiritual needs of persons and be a presence in society pursuing the interests of God's rule and kingdom. Women religious and some branches of the laity might be very necessary to this plan, but they took their place in a society completely ordered by hierarchy and clergy. They were offered a spirituality that exploited the distinction between priest, religious and laity, itself a kind of spiritual hierarchy providing different rules of life and leading to different degrees of perfection.

It is of note that even within the newly developing and more organic ecclesiology of the Vatican II, there is a reliance on this threefold distinction. Paragraph 33 of the Constitution on the Church differentiates between the ordained, religious and laity by placing them in relation to the church and to the world respectively. The ordained are said to be responsible for the sacred ministry, the religious to be witnesses to the beatitudes of God's reign, and the laity to have a call which has a clearly secular character immersing them in the affairs of society. It has been much argued whether this is a constitutive or descriptive definition, but in any case it continues to be pursued in the teachings of the magisterium as a key to church order and the fulfillment of its mission. The sense of a spiritual hierarchy has been toned down. However, a clear canonical and theological distinction between the three appears to be thought necessary, in order to work out their respective roles in the church.

Since what is said of the ordained and of the laity has a clear functional perspective and what is said of religious has a more abstractly spiritual focus, the part of these last in the life and mission of the church tends to remain obscure, as though belonging in neither sanctuary nor market-place they had no clear profile. This affects women religious more than men, who in great part belong to clerical orders and congregations and so have recourse to their priestly ministry when the contours of the religious side of their vocation become blurred.

Despite the apparent conceptual clarity of the distinction between ordained, religious and baptized, hierarchical, vocational and spiritual concepts of order have merged. This provides an inadequate foundation for the church order to guide the future.

Order, Office and the Ordained Ministry

Essential to a discussion of church order is the issue of the ordained ministry, its origins, its forms and its nature. In the aftermath of the Vatican II, the question has taken on new tonality because of ecumenical dialogue and because of the efforts to relate the ordained ministry's participation in Christ's mission to the participation of all the baptized. The treatment is internal to an ecclesiology that is less centralized and more attentive to the reality of local churches, their specific concerns and their specific cultural forms.

The challenge which the 16th-century Reformation put to the Catholic church was that its ministry was unevangelical and that it had betrayed its apostolic origins. The only ministry which the Reformers found in the NT was that of word and sacrament and though most of them admitted to elements of church order therein they found no warrant for the distinction between clergy and laity. The Council of Trent responded by anathematizing those who denied that sacrificing priesthood and hierarchy had their foundations in the will and prescription of Christ himself. The conciliar participants were aware of the obscurity surrounding the exact historical origins of the tripartite ministry of bishop, presbyter and deacon, but did not think that this affected the divine origins of hierarchy and priesthood. In the present period of ecumenical dialogue and convergence, there is greater sensitivity on all sides to the historical and cultural influences found in the development of order and ministry and a much more circumspect approach to NT foundations.

In reading the NT on ministry, it is necessary to distinguish between kinds and prototypes of ministry, the ordering of local churches within themselves and in their relation to other churches, and the rite or service of ordination. Apart from the fact that Jesus Christ in his exercise of exousia and diakonia is the exemplar of all ministry, the most authoritative figure in the NT church is that of the apostle. In itself, the image of the apostle owes more to Paul than to the twelve, but it is used of them in a specific way by Luke to show continuity of the preaching of the gospel with the group of disciples who received their mandate from Jesus himself and witnessed his death and resurrection.

Broadly speaking, to be an apostle meant to be a witness to the resurrection of the Crucified One, to have received a commission from the Risen Christ, to be filled with his Spirit and to proclaim the gospel by word and faithful witness. The root of all ministry throughout the ages is in this apostolic witness and all proclamation of the gospel must be seen to be in continuity with it. The exact historical part which those named as the twelve took in the spread of the gospel and in the foundation of churches is obscure, and the inclusion of others in the original apostolic ministry is all but certain. Nonetheless, the image of the twelve apostles as found in the NT is a constant and important point of reference in all further development of church ministry and church order. Alongside them, the

In the description of NT churches, ministry is aroused and guided by the outflow of the charismatic Spirit. The variety of ministries is almost without number. The one criterion for the discernment of charisms is that they be truly of service to the building up of the body in unity and charity, its praise of the Lord and its proclamation of the good news. It is this very profusion of gifts that makes it difficult to decipher the nature and structure of church order and the locus of authority or leadership. There is certainly no identification between charism, ministry and office, and ministry whether of mutual care, of word or of worship is not confined to church leaders. The concern with order and authoritative leadership, however, is clearly not absent from the NT books, even though it appears in them in varying degrees.

The basic order is that unity in the Spirit and in the one apostolic witness be kept. Life in the church is non-discriminatory and is guided by promptness to serve. This is reflected in the words of Jesus about service recorded in Luke's account of the Last Supper (Lk 22:24-27), in John's account of the washing of the feet and the love commandment (Jn 13:1-20), and in the credal formula of Gal 3:25-29. As for organization, it is now customary to distinguish between the kinds of order found in the Jerusalem church, in the Pauline churches, in the Johannine churches and in the churches mirrored in the Pastoral Letters, though it is hard to be very specific about any of them. The extent of borrowing from the social and cultural milieu to identify fitting organizational structures has to be acknowledged and consequently the diversity of structure and leadership. Thus there arose the house-churches of the Pauline letters, the rule of elders at Jerusalem and the overseer/elders of Antioch and Ephesus.

One of the difficulties in detailing such structures is that the meaning of particular words such as episkopos, presbyteros and diakonos is unclear. It would certainly be erroneous to confuse them with the same titles used in later centuries. Another problem is the relative unconcern with order in some writings. This is particularly true in the Johannine writings, where it is the gift of the Spirit to each and all that animates and congregates the church rather than any authoritative figure. There are however two constants as far as authority is concerned: fidelity to the apostolic word and the power of the Spirit brought to evidence in deeds of service. No authority can be claimed that does not meet these criteria.

It is in the Pastoral Letters that one comes across the concern with the continuity of a later generation with the apostolic, and with it the attempt to determine more uniform structures of transmission of office, as well as the possible beginnings of an ordination rite (1 Tim 4:14; 5:22), though the interpretation of these texts is in question. In similar vein there is the submission of a local church to the greater and more wide-ranging apostolic authority, represented in the figure of Paul introduced into these letters. Whether or not one finds these writings excessively conservative, patriarchal and institution-minded, the issues that emerge are clearly necessary.

While the Catholic and Orthodox churches have always in principle upheld the tripartite ministry of bishop, presbyter and deacon, and while the World Council of Churches in its BEM document appeals for its restoration in Protestant churches, historically it is only with Ignatius of Antioch that one finds clear evidence of churches structured in this way. In particular, it is only in his writings that a strong episcopal figure emerges. This is all the more interesting given the evidence that in his time other churches, such as those of Rome and Alexandria, were probably governed collegially by the presbyterium. However, even while noting the influence of Ignatius, Irenaeus, Cyprian and Hippolytus in presenting the ideal figure of the bishop for subsequent generations, one has to note that elements of collegiate government were kept in the churches which they represent through the body of the presbyterium. One also notes the organic quality of ministry and church life which allowed for the varied services of such persons as deacons, readers, cantors, acolytes, widows and virgins, as well as the continuing presence of charismatics. Whatever the authority of the bishop, his was not a sole and isolated ministry. It was exercised in the heart of the church united at the one eucharistic table and bonded in the Spirit through a variety of gifts and ministries.

As for the authority and leadership that is attributed to the bishop by the above-mentioned writers, it first seems to have emerged as a practical necessity and was then given its theology, in much the way that we now see practice and theory to interact in the development of a tradition. The episcopacy served the self-definition of the church, the setting of its doctrinal and disciplinary boundaries, and became a focal point of the church's apostolic continuity. The arguments often appear to be circulatory but this does not make them invalid, especially since episcopal appointment and leadership is subject to reception and to the bond of communion with other churches. In Ignatius, Cyprian and Hippolytus we find the pressing urgency to have one eucharistic table for the local church, since without this true unity cannot be conceived. Given this urgency, there is the question of admission to the table and of the faith that is professed in its celebration. The argument is circular because the bishop's authority comes from the apostolic tradition and succession, and yet it is he who decides what constitutes it.

There is a check on his authority in that the bishop has to be in one way or another chosen and approved by the people and installed with the participation of neighboring churches and their bishops. Furthermore, in the exercise of his leadership he is bound by the synodal forms of presbyteral participation in the local church and conciliar convocation or exchange in the communion of churches. All of this constitutes a testing of the Spirit, one that is greatly enhanced if the bishop leads an exemplary evangelical and apostolic life. Ignatius and Cyprian were not insensitive to the authority conferred on their ministry by their own martyrdom, and the former positively desired it as though it were truly necessary.

In later times, there is the same concern to find the bishop's ministry confirmed by the witness of an apostolic life. This led to efforts to assure the choice of the right candidate. In the East the ideal bishop was the monk-bishop, as we find in Basil of Caesarea, and in the West a peculiar combination of qualities made Martin of Tours the exemplary type of episcopacy. He was known for his ascetic life, he had founded a monastic community, he took the position under duress and the choice was confirmed by a process of discernment and by the people's acclamation. Martin was moreover an ardent apostle throughout his term of office, travelling far and wide to preach the gospel and to supplant pagan cults with Christian worship.

In effect, this concern with the ideal candidate whose life would confirm his works had much to do with merging the two types of order mentioned above, the ecclesiastical and the vocational. Cyprian and Augustine focussed on the relation of the bishop to Christ, a relationship to be found both in his life and in the power accredited to his ministry. Ambrose in his treatise De Officiis Ministrorum (P.L. 16, 25-194) simply perceived the call to episcopacy as a call to a higher sanctity, one for which a person had to strive on appointment or on receiving the call, whether he had previously attained such holiness or not. An exalted notion of the relationship to Christ, the need to reinforce episcopal authority in leadership and teaching, and the desire to foster candidates trained in the spiritual life had much to do with the clericalization of church order that gained momentum throughout the Middle Ages.

This was not without its ironic consequences, for it meant that bad choices were often upheld, despite the less than exemplary lives of the ordained. In the endeavor to maintain authority and good order even under such circumstances, the holiness of apostolic witness was gradually attached to the office itself rather than to the person ordained to it in the Spirit. The sacralization of sacramental power and of magisterial teaching meant that the action of Christ in the sacraments and the authentication of rule and teaching were guaranteed by the office itself, independently of the life of the minister. What was difficult to maintain was the evidence that even in the case of unworthy ministers, the sacramental power and the apostolic tradition were grounded in the reality of an ecclesial life lived in the power and unity of the Spirit, on local and universal level. The statement that the minister acted as minister of the church (understood as a large institution) or in the faith of the church was something of a safeguard, but it was not enough to prevent an increasingly sacral and authoritarian view of ecclesiastical office that formed an ever-thickening wedge between the ordained and the laity.

One can follow two distinct paths in tracing the ongoing development of the sacrament of order and the ministry of the ordained. One is to have an eve principally on the institutional aspects and so to trace functionally and theologically what became of the offices of bishop, presbyter and deacon. The other is to look for the less easily determined but vastly important cultural configurations given to the ideals and the forms of ministerial and pastoral action.

Institutionally and theologically, the development of the presbyterate/priesthood is the heart of the matter. With the multiplication of communities and places of worship, in trying to keep some form of local (or as we would now say, diocesan) unity, the role of the presbyter was transformed from that of a member of the presbytery to that of pastor of a smaller community in city, town or village. Presbyters were ordained by and remained under the supervision of the bishop, who in turn was increasingly isolated from a pastorate in a eucharistic community. Hence the presbyter became the priest whose principal function was the offering of the eucharistic sacrifice and whose other functions were related to this. Even with this emergence of the presbyter, however, the same order did not prevail in every church. In part this had to do with the difference between a city church and a rural church. In a city church such as Rome or Hippo, bishop and presbyters served the places of worship from one center and lived variant measures of a common life. In rural churches the presbyters resided in the village communities, sometimes augmented in service by the presence of deacons or lesser orders. In this case, the cathedral church was the center of a network of communities and the pastoral visitation of the bishop kept them united and provided with ministers as needed. It is this context that is reflected in the model of bishop provided by Martin of Tours and in the Gallican ordination rites of the Missale Francorum. In either situation, rural or metropolitan, the bishop was surrounded by clerics not always presbyters, who provided a measure of collegiate responsibility in church government, especially in the administration of church property or in the making of appointments to office. This is the origin of what came to be known as the cathedral chapter, vestiges of which are still found in European countries in the persons of diocesan canons and archdeacons.

From quite early on, the good ordering of a church by the bishop could be subverted by the ordination of presbyters to serve the interests and the households of lords and landowners. Some attempt was made to keep that order through which bishops presided over communities of worship through the ordination of chorbishops, who would serve in rural areas. While ordained to the episcopacy, they did not have a full part in the exercise of episcopal collegiality but were deemed lesser in rank to those who enjoyed the rank of bishop without prefix. Their position was too indefinite to last, so that in effect presbyters did take over as local pastors in areas not directly under the care of bishops.

In the 8th century, Agobardus of Lyons fulminated against the ordination of homiunculi who were little better than ignorant vassals to some rude lord (De Privilegio et Jure Sacerdotii XI: P.L., 104, 138-139). This had to do with the establishment of proprietary churches in the Frankish realm. These were churches on the property of large landowners which by and large escaped the jurisdiction of bishops, even the presbyter being usually ordained at the behest of the local lord rather than nominated by the bishop.

The incidence of concubinage and financial corruption among the medieval clergy is but evidence of the difficulty experienced in coordinating structures of ministry with ideals of holiness. It had much to do with the increasing control of churches and nominations to ministry by secular princes and lords. However, whatever the difficulties encountered, the role of presbyter as local pastor and sacramental minister was firmly established through the Middle Ages and remained even after the Gregorian reform.

Since this was indeed the role assumed by presbyters, in scholastic theology the sacrament of orders was defined as the power to consecrate the body and blood of Christ and to offer the sacrifice. The diaconate, to the extent that it still mattered, was but preparatory to this and the episcopacy was more readily defined as a jurisdiction than as a sacrament. This did indeed reflect the life of the church. The people were dependent on the priest for sacraments and for whatever doctrinal instruction he could give. From the days when he was charged with the care of the poor and the administration of church property, as well as with whatever pastoral functions the bishop would commit to him, the deacon lost all practical importance and the conferral of the order became a preparation for priesthood. The bishop looked to the overall unity of the diocese, appointed and ordained priests, performed such liturgies as seemed to fall under this supervisory care such as the consecration of churches, the consecration of virgins and the blessing of knights, and protected the interests of the church against the temporal lords. He also exercised his doctrinal responsibility of keeping the deposit of faith in conjunction with brother bishops, often through attendance at provincial councils.

Thus matters had emerged by the end of the first millennium of the common era and thus they were confirmed, with some reforming zeal, at the Council of Trent. If they were confirmed, it was of course because they had been challenged. The Reformers wanted the ministry of word and sacrament to prevail and they wanted nothing of sacrificing priesthood. They could find no warrant in the NT for a special sacrament of ordination, even though they did want to keep some form of ritual installation in ministry. They did not countenance the hierarchy and distinct offices of bishop and priest as defined in Catholicism but held to the one ministry of word and sacrament, even in those churches where as a matter of order and discipline they kept the office of bishop without special ordination to it.

Beyond the notion of the one NT and divinely instituted ministry, they had differing ideas of the order required by discipline. Though they effaced the radical distinction between clergy and laity they were usually loath to put ministry on too charismatic and egalitarian a basis. Since they saw a strong link between church and state in the service of God's kingdom, whether in dukedom or in city-state as at Geneva and Zurich, they tended to give some authority in the appointment of ministers to temporal officers and to the community to be served. It is of course a caricard to say that they saw the minister as a delegate of the people, for all their emphasis on the common and royal priesthood. For local purposes of order and discipline, Calvin kept what he thought to be the NT church offices of pastor, deacon and elder, alongside the ministry of word and sacrament. The pertinence of these offices has remained a constant, if at times ill-defined, part of the history of churches in the Reformed tradition.

In the current evolution of this threefold ministry, developments are taking place both within the Catholic church and in churches that have membership in the World Council of Churches. The Second Vatican Council gave new if not untroubled attention to the relation between the mission and office of all the baptized and that of the ordained ministry. One of its earliest acts was to define the episcopacy as a sacrament and to describe all ordination as appointment to the threefold office of governing, teaching and worship. It also espoused the restoration of the diaconate as a permanent rather than a transitory office. In its definition of this order it combined mention in a rather unintegrated way of the ministry of word and worship with the ministry of works of charity and administration. It thus rendered dues both to the origins of the diaconate and to the functional service which it could now render as auxiliary to the priesthood, and allowed the married into the ranks of the clergy.

In the meantime, through a succession of dialogues, the Faith and Order document BEM has asked for the recognition of the tripartite ministry as an ancient and respected tradition and as a point around which further communion between churches might be fostered. Of the episkope it says that it "is necessary to express and safeguard the unity of the body" and that it is best kept where the threefold pattern is observed. "The orderly transmission of the ordained ministry" it dubs "a powerful expression of the continuity of the Church throughout history." At the same time, the document is careful to describe ordination as an act of the whole church and to set down the conditions whereby its grounding in the life and unity of the church may best be served.

All churches, including the Catholic, now see that even with the threefold pattern it is impossible to see a uniform order throughout the centuries, just as it is impossible to exact strict uniformity across the globe today. In fact the plea for a common pattern of ministry and order is accompanied by an increasing attention to the cultural diversity of local churches. There is a move away from an ecclesiology that accentuated the universal structure and organization of the one church in many places, to an ecclesiology that gives primacy to the local church and that envisages the universal as the communion of many churches rather than as one monolithic structure and government. What this, along with the multiple exercise of the charisms of the baptized, bodes for church order is as much a matter of future projection as it is one of present realization.

When ministry is seen in the light of culture and history rather than simply as an office and an institution, the differences in pattern are even greater. Configurations of space are keen indicators of the concept and ordering of the church that prevailed in each cultural epoch. Roughly, it is possible to distinguish between periods marked by the house-church, the city-church, the monastery, the order of the High Middle Ages, the Reformation and Counter-Reformation, the siege upon religion of the Enlightenment, and the cultural pluralism of the latter half of the 20th century.

In the centuries before Constantine, the church was in point of fact and not only in theory a eucharistic community; its boundaries were set by this weekly gathering. Its works were centered in it and its ministries defined in service of it. Seen from outside, the house-church was home to a community bonded by its very difference from the rest of society, yet not anxious to have too strong a profile nor wanting to have a heavy impact on public order. Seen from within, what is done to internal space reveals a history internal to the community. It is often remarked that churches of the NT epoch gathered in the homes spacious and charitable enough to accommodate them and that social household-codes influenced institutional development. This had rather ambivalent results. On the one hand, it meant that women could play a larger role in ministry and order than has ever been recognized since then. On the other hand, it meant that the patriarchy of the home influenced the ordering of the church. Simplicity and domesticity in any case marked celebration and relations, despite the threat that social distinctions presented to agapic communion. It is in such a setting that Ignatius of Antioch strove for the one eucharist and for an orthodoxy that kept the community intact, and that he praised the harmony sounded by presbyters and deacons in unison with their bishop. From the little information that comes from architectural diggings, it seems that internal spatial setting gave distinctive place to these ministers and officers within the epoch still marked by the house-church, an epoch that lasted longer in East Syria or Mesopotamia than elsewhere. The raised beam in the middle of the room gave prominence to those who read or taught the word and the addition of an apse to what was otherwise a large room gave an aura of holiness to the eucharistic table and a sacred character to those who ministered at it.

The church of the post-Constantinian era is marked by its basilicas and its courtly ritual, and by its city-wide liturgy. The church was a public institution, a power in society, which by its ritual mapped out the space of the city itself. The stationary liturgies of Rome and Constantinople ordered space and time for the populace. While the influence of church may have been most obvious in these centers, it can be remarked also in places like Milan, Carthage, Antioch and Hippo. Even the rural hamlets fell under the power of the city church, and Leo the Great could not countenance the indignity of having a brother bishop in some of the obscure castelli of the Alban hills (Epist XII, 10: P.L., 54, 654). Such is the setting for the clericalization of ministry and church order already outlined. It suited a public cultural need more than it responded to any intrinsic evangelical necessity, but since then the church has never been totally free of the paradigmatic quality that clerical order assumed in this age of the expansion of Christianity.

Still using space as an indicator, one cannot ignore the period of history during which monasticism made its mark on ministry. It has already been remarked that the desire for a bishop who gave witness as well as teaching led Basil of Caesarea to look for the ideal candidate in the monastic brotherhood and Augustine of Hippo to impose a rule of common life on his clergy. In later centuries the corruption of mores in city and countryside, the poor economy of farming and the lack of Christian education were countered by the growing influence of monasteries, owning large tracts of land and organizing the economic and religious life of the populace around the monastic center. Under such influence, asceticism, contemplation and the ordering of time through the hours and the cycles of public worship, became common Christian ideals. Not only were large numbers of monks ordained to ministry and given pastoral charges, but the monk became the ideal for all priests and the monastic rhythm of prayer and liturgy the ideal for the parish church and the good Christian. Given their power and potential, monasteries did not escape being used by princes for their purposes, nor were they free of Roman influence. In the Carolingian era, it seems some effort was made to plan monastic liturgy and to map monastic churches on the pattern of the Roman stationary liturgy.

The concept of ministry as hierarchy is the culmination of these clerical and monastic configurations of ministry and church order. If it has its spatial metaphor, it is that of the Gothic or Romanesque cathedrals with their steeples and their towers dominating the landscape and stretching heavenward. The concept of hierarchy, brought to fine articulation by the Pseudo-Dionysius, could be used to order both the ideals of the spiritual life and the ministerial functioning of the church as public institution, serving at the same time to forge a conjunction between the two. This was the period during which the church was developing as a spiritual power that had influence over the whole temporal order and as a universal organization with one center rather than as a local community of believers. The concept of hierarchy served to link the different parts of this Catholic church and to promote the image of the priest as public minister of an ecclesiastical institution without confine, acting in the power of Christ its head and founder. It could thus even legitimate acts of worship, especially the offering of the sacrifice of the Mass, that were not linked to any particular community or place.

The development was not without challenge from within. Popular evangelical movements and mendicant friars sought a simpler way of life in imitation of the poverty of Christ and wanted a church free of clerical privilege and control. The evangelical movement had its popular appeal, but it also had its Francis and its Dominic who combined a deep reverence for priesthood with the desire for evangelical simplicity, universal brotherhood and the preaching of the gospel. Innocent III was astute enough to harness this movement to what he saw as the more legitimate and spiritual aims of hierarchy. The unwillingness to be attached to any place and to serve the spread of the gospel wherever needed that he found in Francis and his followers in the long run served to strengthen the papacy and the centralization of the church as one universal organization. Hierarchy and evangelical itineracy combined in fostering a more centralized church and in spreading Roman influence, even in such a matter as the widespread adoption of a form of the Breviarium of the Roman Curia for all clergy. The cathedral reaching out to the skies and the wanderings of the friar who settled in no fixed place are the spatial contours of the hierarchy of ministry. So are the praying of the same office in all parts of the church, the exposition of the Blessed Sacrament for public veneration, the retention of the Roman see even in the exile of Avignon, and the offering of the Mass by a priest in a secluded place for the obtainment of fruits that could redound to the whole church and even burst the boundaries between heaven and earth to the comfort of the departed.

With such a notion, even the saints and the angels could be expected to gather around the worshipping church, whether this was in a secluded chapel or in a fine sanctuary. They could also be expected to compete with each other in giving patronage to their favoured cities and villages. The pope could attempt to have his say in the running of the University of Paris and could collect monies in Germany for the building of a basilica in Rome, just as any friar with a reputation as a confessor could absolve sins in the name of Christ and the church in the royal chapel or in the village church. Though not much might be heard of the word of the gospel, the saints and the sacrament and the power of the priest assured the closeness of God and redemption through Christ's blood.

Calvin's Geneva, with its godly order, its absence of frivolity, its charity among citizens, and its denuded minister, in which pulpit and table alone caught the eye, may well represent the reaction against hierarchy and the evangelical concept of ministry espoused by the Reformation. The Reformers sought a ministry that gave pride of place to God's word, to justification by faith rather than by priestly ministrations, to the royal priesthood of all believers rather than to hierarchy, and to the freedom of the secular from the constraints of the sacred, believing that godly order was better served that way.

The Catholic Reformation countered the Protestant by an intensified centralization. It brought the concept and realities of hierarchy even more to the fore.

While it invented the seminary in the interests of a holier and better educated priesthood, it reinforced the image of a higher calling and increased dependency on the priest's sacramental ministry. It found its instrument in the Jesuits who completed the friars' independence from place with a more formidable centralized organization and who fostered a spirituality that allowed the individual access to divine mysteries in ways quite free of the need for community and community prayer. It was an ideal model for the clergy, applicable in any place or circumstance. The spatial metaphors for such ministry are the Baroque church with its gaudy world of grace, counterblast to Puritan severity, and the lonely hut providing the missionary a place to say Mass in pagan territory.

The cultural images of ministry can be completed by the neo-Gothic church, filled with the sounds of neo-Gregorian chant, or by the parish plant in Europe, the Americas, Asia or Africa alike, with its church, its rectory, its convent, its school and its hospital. Nostalgia for Rome and the need to fortify the faithful against the dominance of the secular combined in developing even further the Catholic Reformation's ideals of order and ministry. This type of ministry served its purpose well enough, for it preserved the heritage of doctrine, kept faith alive and fostered great piety in the ranks of clergy, religious and laity alike. One might see it in God's providence as a cultural necessity in a given era, though it endured beyond its time. It was left to Pope John XXIII and Vatican II to ask whether a more highly educated Christian people, more deliberately conscious of the workings of the Spirit, more open to ecumenical collaboration among all the followers of Christ, and respectful of cultural and religious diversity, might not serve God's reign better than a church entrenched. This of course puts difficult questions to both the institutional and the cultural forms of church order, questions that fortunately Christian churches are beginning to address together rather than in opposition to one another.

An Ecclesiology of Organic Order

To meet 20th-century developments in church life and ministry, an order of organic rather than hierarchical unity is postulated. This has six qualities. First, its foundation is an ecclesiology of communion, focussed on the local church and allowing for a universal ordering which is that of a communion of churches. Second, it is evangelical in the sense that it learns from evangelical movements in the church of past and present times. Third, it is sacramental in the sense that it is unified by its eucharistic gathering and sacramental liturgies and is thereby enlivened in the Spirit by the memory of Christ's Pasch. Fourth, it is diaconal in that it incorporates a variety of charisms and ministries into the life of the local church with whatever ritual recognition is appropriate and non-discriminatory in language and symbol. Fifth, it is non-patriarchal and ready to overcome a long history of gender discrimination. Sixth, in providing the forms of social and institutional order and identity that are needed it allows for synodal types of government in both local and universal church.

Communion. It is said that the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council is an ecclesiology of communion, but this can be ambiguous. On the one hand, such an ecclesiology denotes a shared meaning, value and vision, so that unity in the body prevails over special interests. The theological foundation of this is that all share in the communion of the one Trinity of divine life, as it is communicated through Christ and the Spirit. On the other hand, the diversity in unity, or the communion of the diverse, needs to be equally appreciated. Consequently some theologians are developing a theology of the universal or catholic as the communion of local churches, diverse in their cultural, historical and organizational physiognomies, yet united together in the service of God's reign. This recognition of diversity is important for a church that is as readily African or Asian as it is European or American, and that is open to communion in diversity between historically divided communities.

Evangelical. During Vatican II there was a group of bishops from different countries who used to meet regularly, calling themselves the Church of the Poor. They had a double concern. One was to address the needs of peoples whose lives are impaired by harsh poverty, taking the preaching of the gospel to the poor as the church's major orientation. Second, and in conjunction with this, they wanted a church that in its style of life and in its organization would show greater simplicity and evangelical poverty. It was not the first time in church history that groups asked for church reform in head and members on the basis of this twofold exigency. Though none of the specific recommendations of this episcopal group found their way directly into conciliar documents, their concerns did have an influence. A church ordered by this evangelism would give primacy to the mission to serve God's reign in society and would spell this out in terms of service to the poor and oppressed and a struggle for a just society. Its common life would be marked by simplicity, poverty and non-discrimination. Its service would derive from charism, spiritual authority and competency, and it would make use of the criterion of the discernment of spirits in the ritual and official ordering of its ministries. The paradigm of order would be organic, not hierarchical. Institutional needs are not ignored in this paradigm but ministry is not confined to office-holders. Neither is there an attempt to reduce all ministries to strict categories or to rank charisms.

Sacramental. The realization of this quality starts from praxis. It comes from the pragmatic and symbolic role that ritual plays in a body in ordering relations, in expressing values and corporate identity, in serving the corporate memory, in fixing perceptions of time and space, and in providing a vision of the future. No body of people will exist as such without its focal symbols and its rituals, constantly renewed through the invocation of the corporate memory, relating it to the community's life and practice. The church, people of God, body of Christ, new creation in the Spirit, comes to be and moves towards the future through its sacramental action. It is in the living reality of its communion in Christ and of Christ's oneness with it through the Spirit that it finds sacramental expression. The narratives, prayers, symbols and rituals of sacrament are such that they embrace human existence in its most fundamental needs and desires, in its oneness with all of creation, and in that hope which orients its pathways through history. When in common parlance it is said that the church itself is the primary sacrament of Christ, this does not signify a reality that, already existing, then performs sacramental acts. What is meant is that it exists as a reality in and through a sacramental remembrance and worship that is allied to practice.

A Christian community ought to be unified through its eucharistic gathering and through the ritual celebrations that in a variety of ways relate to this. The eucharist is centered on the common table, in obedience to the gospel command to take, eat and drink the body and blood of Christ and to keep memory of him. At this table there is no discrimination or distinction and the elements of bread and wine blessed in the power of Christ's Spirit relate the participants not only to each other but to creation and to society's ordering of the resources of the earth, whether in justice or in exploitation. Grace is channelled through the human and the earthly and the presence of Christ is his presence through these gifts in the community. The power of that presence is the power of the dangerous memory of his suffering and of the hopeful memory of his Resurrection. The prevailing image of a church's memory reflects its perception of salvation, whether this image be that of sacrifice, covenant, the struggle with unholy powers or the abba experience of the suffering servant. The sacramental practice of a community is discerned not only in its relation to tradition but just as importantly in relation to its ethical practice of justice, charity and service to humanity.

Diaconal. Church order needs to be an order of service. This is a particular aspect of being evangelical. Its model is the washing of the feet of the disciples by Jesus, a testamental memory that ought to be kept alive in the course of the worship of the communion table. The aspect of service being brought to the fore in the grass-roots ordering of ministries in many churches is the relation of the temporal or material to the spiritual, or the unity between life in the body and life in the spirit. The ancient order of deacons serves in some measure as a paradigm for this service. With all due allowance for historical criticism, the fact remains that ecclesial tradition has long taken Acts 6 as the root text for the order of deacons. According to that text, Stephen and his companions were appointed for the service of tables when the poor of the Gentile communities were being neglected. Stephen at least combined the preaching of the gospel and the witness of his death with that service. In the church order of the Apostolic Tradition and the Didascalia, and in other early church documents, it is apparent that the deacon's eucharistic service in taking and presenting the gifts to the bishop is one with the administration of gical ministry and social ministry are perfectly blended. This historical model helps to give orientation to the contemporary efforts to restore the permanent order of deacons to service. It indicates that the attention directed to corporal needs and to the gospel of justice belongs to the very nature of the church as a sacramental communion and that provision for this has to be made in the ordering of ministries. While this is partly realized through the restoration of the permanent diaconate, it postulates a larger inclusion of diverse ministries of service in the ordering of the church.

Non-patriarchal. Another way of saying that church order needs to become non-patriarchal is to say that it has to give evidence of repentance for centuries of sexism and gender discrimination. There is a very obvious difference between the credal formula of Gal 3:24-29 and the place of women in the apostolic and house ministry of NT times on the one hand, and the discriminatory attitudes towards them meshed with the church orderings of later centuries. What the practical consequences of corporate penance would be is not clear but there will be none if there is not penance. Even in defending the tradition of ordaining only men to ecclesial and sacramental leadership in 1977 (Inter Insigniores, A.A.S., 69 [1977] 98-116), the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith dissociated itself from most of the arguments that had been used in the past by such personages as John Chrysostom and Thomas Aquinas, since they supposed a natural superiority of man over woman. The two arguments which remain are the longevity of the practice and the representation of Jesus Christ by the minister, a representation which is said to require that this be a male. Both arguments however need close scrutiny for the possible residue of sexual bias. The NT foundations for the exclusion of

The argument from representation may overlook aspects of the doctrine of the Incarnation and most of all the transforming power of the Resurrection which overcomes in Christ all differences between Jew and Gentile, slave and free, male and female. At any rate, from now on it is necessary that church order take account of the diverse ways in which women minister as much as it takes account of the diverse ways of men. Family ministry is not only the woman's responsibility just as it is not exclusively her duty. The active apostolate of women cannot be provided for purely under canon law and rules for religious congregations, but has to become an integral part of all church law and order.

Aspects of this non-patriarchal turn in ordering ministry and church life occur under the four previous headings. The evangelical community is in its essence non-discriminatory. The ritual of sacrament has to follow rites and language usage that are purged of sexism and hierarchy. The communion of church and churches has to give voice and power to both sexes. The renewed interest in the diaconal may bring us to the perception that in practice this has been kept alive through the centuries by women more than by men and that it is time to give canonical recognition to a historical fact.

Synodal. The word synodal is used to indicate that decision-making in doctrine and practice is a shared responsibility. Synodal structures attempt to give value and orientation to this truth. The old juridical distinctions between the ecclesia discens and the ecclesia docens, the universal and the particular, or the authoritative and the consultative, are inadequate to the present time. The very diversity between local churches requires structures of communion that foster dialogue and shared responsibility so that the central role of the Roman church can assume a new form. In diocese and parish a start has been made with pastoral and parish councils, but their effectiveness is hindered by laws and attitudes that belong in a hierarchial vision of world and church. One danger to be avoided is that the juridical be separated from the sacramental in another form of the medieval distinction between order and jurisdiction. It makes little ecclesial or social sense to provide for the laity's participation in decision-making and ministerial ordering if the ritual of their liturgical participation retains symbols of sacred distinction. Access to the table as a communion table is as vital as a seat on the parish council or an office in the chancery. The symbolic is actually at the core of church law and in forging a common identity and vision bad ritual derogates from the best of laws.

Conclusion

The interpretive quality of this entry is obvious. It is not enough to recount facts, to the extent that these are obtainable. The meaning expressed in church order in its relation to history, place, social order and culture is all important, as is the capacity for taking a critical look at it. Without this, the retrieval of gospel roots and the needs of the present time will not be served. That is why from the complex history of order in the church the move was made in the last section to some prognostication for the future.

COLLEGE CAMPUS, LITURGY ON

Worshipping communities on college or university campuses are different enough from regular parish communities to merit special attention. While the promotion of good liturgy anywhere calls for knowledge, piety and much hard work, campus ministers face some special obstacles that others do not face. At the same time, however, they also enjoy some special advantages. We will look at some of these obstacles and advantages and discuss specific strategies to meet the worship needs of students.

Obstacles

One obstacle is the way young people in general feel toward the church today. Recent studies have shown that while Catholic adolescents in the United States have a keen interest in God, they generally do not find this need met by their local parish. Most teens' experience of Sunday Mass is negative; they do not fully understand it; it is perceived by them to be directed to adults and the action itself is perceived as lacking meaning. Only 44% of Catholic teenagers attend Mass every Sunday and only 24% would go to Mass if their parents did not force them. These attitudes are typical of young adolescents, but they are also shared by students when they first come to college.

Another obstacle campus ministers face is a regular disruption of continuity in the congregation on campus. Relative stability of a liturgical assembly is taken for granted in the average parish. It is a quality that has to be carefully nurtured on campuses. Campus ministers know that for the purpose of building a faith community they have students present for only six months out of the year. No activities designed for student involvement can be held during the weeks preceding semester exams, nor, of course, during vacation times. What usable time remains consists in two discontinuous three-month periods: September through November and February through April. Moreover, every autumn brings a new obstacle to building a faith community: one quarter of the student population has disappeared through graduation and has been replaced by as many newcomers in need of incorporation into the assembly. They need to be invited, lured, seduced into the assembly and socialized at a rapid pace. The departure of the seniors has also meant the loss of the best-trained liturgical ministers and the most experienced student leadership.

Another drawback to effective liturgical life on campus is the fact that in most cases the students will not be present at school to celebrate the great feasts of Easter, Christmas or even Pentecost. They are usually present for the preparatory seasons of Advent and Lent but cannot celebrate the feasts together. This can be very disheartening to members of the assembly, but especially to those students and staff who might be involved in the adult catechumenate or who have worked to enhance the integral celebration of the liturgical seasons.

Commuter campuses present special difficulties in the area of worship. Aside from liturgical services which mark special events such as the beginning or end of term, or celebrations focused on critical world, national or campus issues and events, the worship life of the average commuter student takes place off campus.

This pattern of life makes it very difficult to establish patterns of worship on campus and inhibits the building of one vital part of a faith community: regular Sunday eucharistic assembly.

Ministerial Strategy

To counter these obstacles requires energy, imagination, commitment and good organization. It is a tribute to campus ministers that so many have been very successful in drawing students into the worshipping communities on campus. What helps to bring this about?

First of all, regular invitations to students to participate in programs, a hospitable atmosphere in campus ministry offices and liturgical celebrations, and a community of peers who can set good example by being actively involved in ministry and worship themselves, seem to be essential. Scheduling services at times when the students are available and disposed to worship is also important. The large number of late Sunday evening Masses in college chapels is an unusual but sensitive pastoral practice introduced in response to students' lifestyles.

Liturgists should be mindful of the sensibilities of the academic world and should make use of all the legitimate liturgical options in our rites. Where possible they should implement the R.C.I.A. and encourage the celebration of the liturgy of the hours. There must also be regular invitations to students to exercise liturgical ministries; yearly training programs on introductory and advanced levels must be offered.

Adults affiliated with the school can sometimes help to strengthen the continuity of campus congregations. But it is rare that a sufficient number of college faculty or staff attend liturgies on campus to provide a strong core assembly that remains through the seasons and the years. Most faculty and staff people find the center of gravity of their worship life to be off campus in local parishes. But this sense of continuity. It is that unusual group of people found on many campuses these days which is composed of "refugees" from local parishes who have found a nourishing faith community on campus and have chosen to worship there in season and out of season. These adults are to be cherished by campus ministers because, in addition to continuity, they provide much needed adult role models of religious commitment for students.

Campus ministers sometimes respond to student needs and lifestyle by fostering numerous small group liturgies, even on Sundays. These relatively intimate celebrations can foster excellent participation in the liturgy. They are a wise pastoral practice, but every campus ought also to have a central place of worship of some size where Sunday celebrations of greater beauty and of greater majesty may be held. These larger celebrations provide an experience of the church at prayer impossible to achieve in smaller celebrations. They also help the students feel at home in larger congregations and, indeed, in the larger, worldwide church.

Advantages

Besides the obstacles the college campus situation offers to building effective worshipping communities, it does offer some unique advantages. The first is the relative homogeneity of the assembly. It is far easier to plan liturgies for, and to preach to, a homogeneous group of students than a typical heterogeneous parish community. Students have many things in common: they live in the same buildings, attend the same classes, recreate together, study together, have the same daily order of time and confront many of the same personal problems and challenges. Having common interests and common problems can foster a sense of shared identity, and the liturgical celebration can address that shared life and build upon that shared identity as the community remembers and reflects on

... the glory of God

e f g d d g

A second advantage the college liturgical assembly has is precisely its youthfulness. In this post-Vatican II age of ecclesial and liturgical renewal new ideas and new ways of doing things are inescapably being developed and are breaking through to our assemblies. New ideas are more easily introduced to the young, especially in a campus situation where new thinking and different behavior patterns are traditionally given at least some respectful consideration.

Special Needs of Students

The stage of human development that persons in college traverse frequently demands that they focus an immense amount of energy on themselves. They must often deal with issues of their own inner development, with areas of fear and tension that can cause great difficulty. Young people in this time of life have a great need for personal understanding and personal acceptance by others. One religious aspect of college-age people's intrapersonal orientation is the fact that many students have a keen interest in the way the Spirit may be guiding them in their development. Campus homilies should address such intrapersonal issues regularly.

While college years are a prime time for the development of individual friendships, students also have a strong need to feel they belong to identifiable groups. This is especially true of the early years of college. Liturgical celebrations can provide a supportive faith-filled atmosphere to take account of these interpersonal needs as well as the intrapersonal dimensions of students' lives mentioned above. Celebrations which provide lively, interpersonal time for gathering at the start, as well as significantly long, well-prepared periods of silent prayer during the course of the service are not only appropriate to a student assembly but are simply good liturgy for almost all assemblies.

Not all students come to a liturgical celebration to celebrate their faith. Many come, sometimes encouraged by their friends, to seek meaning for their lives.

The liturgical act itself has strong evangelical force, but the periods of time surrounding the liturgy are also prime opportunities for evangelization. The gathering time before and the fellowship time after liturgy provide opportunities for human interaction on a deeper than ordinary level; they offer an occasion for the gift of God in Christ to be discussed and even lovingly confessed.

Finally, students need to be challenged by the gospel. Typical contemporary American failings such as excessive individualism, materialism and consumerism are in special need of attention. And campus preachers should not forget that idealism still lives in the hearts of the young. They desire to hear, again and again, the confident, hope-filled call of Christ to dedicate themselves to selfless service of the world.

During the 1960s and early 1970s campus ministers who were not quite young themselves frequently found it difficult to minister to the young. Happily that does not seem to be the case today. What is needed in the minister today is a sense of critical loyalty to the church, excitement and passion about the Christian mission, an ecumenical spirit, and a sense of confidence.

COMMUNICATION, RITUAL AS

"Ritual is a symbolic transformation of experience that no other medium can adequately express." So writes the philosopher Suzanne Langer when she reflects upon the meaning-making activity of human beings and on ritual as the language of religion (Langer, 49). Meaning-making is the activity of composing and being composed by the connections among things. To have meaning in one's life is to recognize pattern in the disparate elements of existence, to seek order, significance, and wholeness. Meaning is anchored in trust and is the ground of hope. Without it, human beings cannot survive. In its most comprehensive dimensions, this meaning-making activity is the activity of faith, carried out in a dialectic between fear and trust, hope and hopelessness, power and powerlessness, alienation and belonging. At the level of faith, meaning must embrace both the seen and the unseen, and is, therefore, necessarily composed by means of images or metaphors which become symbols when used as keys to whole patterns of connections. Words are our most efficient symbols, but when we want to communicate "more than words can say," we turn to ritual.

We are personally engaged in this meaning-making, symbolizing, faith activity, yet ultimately we cannot do it alone; it is a profoundly relational activity. And thus it is that a participant in the central ritual of Christian faith—the eucharist—is identified as a "communicant," a participant in a web of communication by which the fabric of human life is composed and re-composed.

To communicate is to make common to many; to share, exchange, convey, impart, confer, converse, transmit, bestow, receive, participate, use, enjoy, to put oneself into familiar relations with, to hold intercourse. To communicate is to confer, transmit, or receive something intangible or abstract such as light, heat, motion, a quality, feeling, spirit—or Spirit. Therefore, religion, which at its best is a distillation of shared, fitting images powerful enough to make meaning of the disparate elements of our experience, necessarily depends upon ritual to grasp, reveal, name, and initiate us—invite us—into the immanent, transcendent truth of the sacred, interdependent reality that we are and that is "more than words can say."

Every culture has a ritual to hold the awkward absence of words upon the occasion of a first meeting—be it the handshake of western Europeans, the bow of the Japanese, or the namaste of India. Likewise, in every culture weddings and funerals are the most complex of ritualized occasions because the social fabric is being so profoundly re-woven. Primary relationships, integral to the patterns of connection among us, are being transformed at depths beyond words. These ritual occasions reverberate throughout the whole of life and are thus ultimately religious. For finally the function of religion is to relate us, to connect us, and thus its hallmark is communion-communication. Religion is the working out of the divine-human relation, the human-human relation, the intra-human relation, the relations of the whole earth community with the angels and archangels, things past, things present, and things to come.

The Oxford dictionary suggests that communication between "vessels, spaces, and rooms" means "to open into each other by a common channel or aperture whereby the whole becomes one space." This is a fitting metaphor for religious ritual by which persons are enabled to share in common, actions, objects, place and time such that the whole is composed into a unity which holds the particularity and integrity of every person, act, object, and moment. This formation of a fitting communion occurs only as there is a recognition of "a common channel or aperture"—Spirit—manifest in the shared creation of a common story and vision

(See, Groome). It might be noted that in much of secular western culture watching the TV evening news has become a pervasive, common ritual. Tele-communication media serve as a common "channel" by which people seek to be connected to, in touch with, a larger whole—presided over by the revered high priests of network news, anchormen who determine the shape of our story and vision.

The creation of a shared story and vision that is to function in an adequate religious sense must be approached not as a performance for a passive audience, but rather with an expectation of motion, an interchange, a flow of giving and receiving, of speaking and being addressed, of offering gesture and observing act, of affecting and being affected. It is only as one's story—including the telling of both deep suffering and greatest joy—shares in and contributes to the community's story and as one's vision threatens, inspires and is informed by the community's vision that religious ritual as communication functions to weave a meaningful whole which can nourish and sustain truthful, ongoing, lived, communal experience. Thus the most powerful ritual, and certainly religious ritual, is necessarily public—belonging to the whole people, shaped by the whole people, and vitalizing/inspiring the whole people.

Further, a faithful communication-communion among "the whole people" must manifest a recognition of the living and the dead, the born and the yet unborn. Ritual as communication makes present the story and vision of the forebears of the community as created by tradition, the present in its unprecedented reality, and the future as best anticipated. Ritual that communicates faithfully is an art which composes the fitting relation between continuity and discontinuity, the familiar and the novel. These dimensions of reality, woven in time through ritual, forge the ever-changing words and acts which symbolize and communicate the "evidence of things unseen" by which faith—meaning-making in the dimensions that are most ultimate and intimate—is composed and recomposed. Thus as Edward Fischer has rightly observed, if ritual is "not allowed to unfold through the easy stages of evolution, it . . . finds itself [inevitably] in the throes of revolution" (Roots of Ritual, 162). For the human heart and the human mind will fiercely seek meaning and demand faith, yet must do so with nothing else but ritual to communicate—create a communion—that is "more than words can say."

COMMUNION SERVICE

The service of Holy Communion is the name given by several Protestant traditions to that order of worship in word and sacrament which in the Eastern Orthodox tradition is called "The Divine Liturgy," and in the Roman Catholic tradition is called "the Mass." Among Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholics, "Communion Service" refers to an order of worship in which holy communion is administered, but the eucharist is not celebrated. It is in this second sense that this article deals with the topic.

The origin of this kind of Communion Service is found in the Liturgy of the Pre-sanctified Gifts, celebrated in the Byzantine tradition, and named after St. Gregory the Great, or St. Gregory the Theologian. This liturgy developed to satisfy the desire for communion on fast days when the eucharist would not be celebrated. There is evidence in the 2nd and 3rd centuries that the faithful could take the consecrated elements to their homes and commune themselves at the end of a period of fasting; or the elements were carried to the absent by the deacons from the Sunday eucharist. During the 4th century, self-communion was discouraged and the practice waned. But some form of administration of communion in the church had to be developed to meet popular need. This was the Liturgy of the Pre-sanctified, in which the consecrated elements from the Sunday eucharist would be distributed.

The Typicon of the Great Church in Constantinople (10th century) gives us a system of the eucharist being celebrated every Saturday and Sunday of the year, every day from Pascha through Pentecost, and on festivals of our Lord and our Lady and on some saints' days. But no eucharist is to be celebrated on the ferial days of Lent, on Monday through Wednesday of Holy Week, or on Wednesdays and Fridays throughout the non-paschal time of the year (the traditional fast days). The Liturgy of the Pre-sanctified could be celebrated on these days. This became the pattern of all the Eastern churches except the Coptic, which joined the Roman practice in allowing the eucharist to be celebrated on fast days.

The present Liturgy of the Pre-sanctified is the office of vespers followed by communion from the reserved sacrament. The gospel reading is included as a reading in vespers, followed by the ecumenic prayer and the dismissal of the catechumens. There is an entrance with the sacrament, although not the usual offertory prayers since these are the consecrated gifts. Byzantine teachers, such as Nicholas Cabasilas, had to instruct the faithful on the difference between the Great Entrance with the gifts at the eucharist (which gifts should not be venerated) and the entrance with the gifts at the Pre-sanctified (which could be venerated). The priest says the usual pre-communion devotional prayers and the people are invited to receive communion: "Come in fear of God with faith and love." After communion there is a thanksgiving, the dismissal, a prayer for the keeping of a holy Lent during that season, and concluding psalmody.

This kind of communion service never became a tradition in the West, except on Good Friday. In the liturgy of Good Friday there is a Mass of the Pre-sanctified in which holy communion is administered after the liturgy of the word and the special devotions for this day comprising the veneration of the Cross. The Pre-sanctified in the Roman rite has the same structure as in the Byzantine tradition from which it was received: entrance with the sacrament, typical communion devotions, reception of communion, post-communion prayer, and dismissal. The Holy Week reforms of 1955 restored the Mass of the Pre-sanctified to the more simple form it had at the time of its introduction in Rome in the 7th century when preparation for communion consisted simply in the recitation of the Our Father by all those present. It should be noted that the older practice was to refrain from holy communion entirely on Good Friday. But the Western Christian piety which dwelt on the passion of Christ made Good Friday a principal communion day in the church year. This was also the case in German Protestantism.

The form of the Liturgy of the Pre-Sanctified influenced the order for the extended distribution of the sacrament to the sick and dying. In the medieval Ordo ad visitandum infirmum three sacraments were linked together: penance (auricular confession), unction (anointing the body), and administration of holy communion. The eucharistic elements were carried from the place of reservation to the house of the sick or dying in a pyx, which was preceded by a bell and lantern. The light brought honor to the sacrament and the bell, first prescribed by the Council of Reading (1279), was to arouse people along the way to reverence.

A revised order for the distribution of holy communion outside Mass after the Council of Trent is found in the Rituale Romanum of 1614. It is extremely terse: Confiteor, said by the server; Misereatur vestri, said by the priest; Ecce Agnus Dei, said by the priest holding up the host, with the response: Domine, non sum dignus...; distribution of communion; antiphon: O sacrum convivium, said by the priest; verse and response; concluding collect.

The reformed rite of Distributing Holy Communion outside Mass after the Vatican II was promulgated in 1973. It is even simpler than the 1614 rite, with the addition of a celebration of the word of God which could include readings from Votive Masses of the Holy Eucharist or the Precious Blood or from the lectionary. The order is: greeting, penitential rite, celebration of the word of God, Our Father, sign of peace, "This is the Lamb of God...", distribution of holy communion, post-communion prayer, and benediction. There is an alternate form of Administration of Communion and Viaticum by an Extraordinary Minister (i.e. a designated lay person). Viaticum includes a profession of baptismal faith and prayer for the sick person after the reading of the word.

There are instances of communion of the sick from the reserved sacrament in some Reformation church orders: the Manual of Olavus Petri in Sweden (1529) and the Mark Brandenburg Church Order (1540). There was a provision for communion from the reserved sacrament in the 1549 Book of Common Prayer, but this was eliminated in the 1552 Prayer Book. Lutherans and Anglicans continued the practice of communing the sick and dying, but the rite took the form of the Communion Service itself, with confession and absolution, collect, reading of the word, consecration, Our Father, ministration, post-communion prayer, and benediction. There was an aversion to reserving the sacrament in the Reformation tradition because of concern for emphasizing the "true use" of the sacrament as a meal to be shared, and not as objects to be venerated in and of themselves. A liturgical characteristic of Reformation Communion Services, both in the assembly and in the house of the sick or dying, is exhortations to repentance and desire for the sacrament of holy communion.

While the 1979 Episcopal Book of Common Prayer and the 1982 Occasion Services of the Lutheran Book of Worship make provision for the Celebration of Holy Communion in Special Circumstances, there is also provision for the Distribution of Communion to those in Special Circumstances, which could make use of designated lay communion ministers. These Episcopal and Lutheran orders are similar in structure to the reformed Roman Catholic rite. They include: greeting; optional confession and greeting of peace (in different locations between the two orders); reading of the word; Our Father; verse (Episcopal: "The gifts of God for the people of God"; Lutheran: "As often as we eat this bread and drink this cup, we proclaim the Lord's death until he comes"); ministration; prayer; blessing or dismissal. These orders of extended distribution of the sacrament have the advantage of keeping the absent united in the sacramental elements with those who gathered in the eucharistic assembly. On the other hand, prolonged exposure only to this kind of Communion Service cuts off the communicant from the liturgical actions of praise and thanksgiving.

COMMUNION UNDER BOTH KINDS

In the Latin rite of the Roman Catholic church, holy communion can be given to the faithful in the form of bread alone or, when permitted, under both kinds, the bread and the wine; in a case of necessity when a person is unable to consume bread, it can be given under the form of wine alone (can. 925).

Communion under both kinds was the normative practice in the Western church for about the first twelve centuries. Communion in the form of wine was given to infants, and in the form of bread to those who could not be present for the eucharistic celebration. Beginning in the 12th century and continuing in the 13th, Western churches gradually abandoned communion in the form of wine for all except the presiding priest. Various factors led to this change. The eucharistic piety of the period centered on the adoration of the host, not on the reception of communion. In an age of intense sacramental realism, the fear of spillage was widespread. Developments in theology also contributed to the demise of the lay chalice, especially the doctrine of concomitance, which holds that the whole Christ is received under either species of bread or wine.

By the 14th century the custom of giving communion sub una (in the form of bread alone) had become universal in the West, and those Christians who returned to the original practice were considered schismatics or heretics. In response to Bohemian utraquists who insisted on the right of the laity to receive the chalice, the Council of Constance in 1415 declared communion sub una to be the law of the church. The Council of Trent in the 16th century attempted to respond to Protestant Reformers who had reintroduced the lay chalice. However it failed to achieve consensus, and referred the issue to the pope. To placate various civil rulers, especially Emperor Ferdinand I, Pope Pius IV in 1564 granted indulgences permitting communion under both kinds in a number of states and dioceses in central Europe. However, all of these indulgences were withdrawn by subsequent popes, and from 1621 until 1965 communion under both kinds was restricted to the presiding priest everywhere in the Latin rite. No such development took place in Eastern Christianity which remained faithful to the practice of the Lord's Supper and the early church.

The restoration of communion under both kinds was an important objective of the 20th century liturgical movement. The issue sparked lively and prolonged debate at Vatican II, resulting in a text of the liturgy constitution conceding communion under both kinds, in the judgment of the bishops, to clerics, religious, and laity in cases to be defined by the Apostolic See (S.C., 55). The 1965 Rite for Distributing Communion Under Both Kinds listed several occasions when it could be given, and these were expanded in subsequent church documents until the list of cases for the universal church was finalized in the 1970 Roman Missal (G.I.R.M., 242).

In 1970 the Apostolic See authorized episcopal conferences and ordinaries to concede the faculty for communion under both kinds in cases not determined by universal law. In that same year the National Conference of Catholic Bishops of the United States approved the practice, in the judgment of the ordinary, at all Masses except on Sundays and holy days of obligation. In 1978 the N.C.C.B. extended the permission to Sundays and holy days, in the judgment of the ordinary who is to determine whether communion can be distributed in an orderly and reverent manner.

Although a complete restoration of communion under both kinds is not yet a reality in the universal church, it is recognized by the Holy See as the ideal practice because of its symbolic value (G.I.R.M. 56h, 240, 241, and 14 of the Introduction). The National Conference of Catholic Bishops of the United States commends the practice more forcefully, saying that it "is to be desired in all celebrations of the Mass" so that "fuller light may fall upon the import of Christ's words at the Last Supper and in the eucharistic prayer, and for the sake of the faithful's greater participation in the mystery" (N.C.C.B., n.19).

COMMUNION, FREQUENCY OF RECEPTION OF

In the early centuries of Christianity the faithful received communion as often as the eucharist was celebrated, and sometimes even more often because of the practice of taking the consecrated elements home. After the 4th century the frequency of receiving holy communion dropped drastically throughout the church, East and West. In the Reformation there was an effort to increase the frequency of reception, sometimes by reducing the frequency of celebration of the eucharist under the rule that there should be no Masses without communicants. In various Protestant traditions different frequencies of celebration became customary. In post-Tridentine Roman Catholicism the people were exhorted to receive the sacrament more frequently, but this reception often occurred after or outside of the Mass. Only in the 20th century, under the impact of the liturgical movement, has there been any real progress toward restoring the ancient practice of receiving communion as a climax of the eucharistic celebration.

In the Ancient and Medieval Church

The earliest eucharistic text and commentary, 1 Corinthians 11, assumes that as often as Christians celebrate the Lord's Supper they will eat and drink from the bread and the cup. The sacrament takes place in the context of a real meal and should not begin until all are present. Nor does it end until "the cup of blessing" is produced after supper and the thanksgiving is said before all drink of it. There is no evidence in the early literature that Christians did not receive communion at every celebration, which usually meant every Lord's Day. Only the catechumens and penitents were excluded from the celebration and reception of holy communion. Justin Martyr testifies to the concern to include even the absent in the communion by dispatching the deacons to them with the consecrated elements after the service (Apology, I, 67). Tertullian (De Oratione, 19) and Cyprian (De Lapsis, 26) testify that during times of fasting or persecution, Christians took the consecrated elements home and communed themselves at the conclusion of their fast or when it was not feasible to gather with the assembly. This practice continued longer in Egypt than elsewhere (Basil, Ep. 93), and hermits and monks in the desert would also take the consecrated elements back to their habitats from the Saturday and Sunday celebrations for self-communion. This practice generally waned during the 4th century as a result of superstitious abuse: e.g., people carrying the consecrated bread with them on journeys to ward off evil. The sacrament had to be consumed before people left the church.

In the West the practice of a daily eucharist also developed during the 4th century. This practice appealed to the spiritually stalwart who could partake of "the daily physic of the body of Christ" (Augustine, Ep. 54:3-4). But many did not commune. This contributed to the development whereby the faithful did not receive communion every time the eucharist was celebrated. From the end of the 4th century the frequency of receiving communion declined rapidly in both the East and the West. John Chrysostom complained that, particularly among the Greeks, there was no one to partake of the sacrament (In Eph. hom., 3, 4). The Synod of Agde in Gaul (506) found it necessary to require communion three times a year as a minimum, at Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost (Mansi, VII, 327). Rome must have been an exception in this development, because the rubrics in Ordo Romanus I as late as the 7th century anticipate a large number of communicants at papal station Masses. There were efforts during the Carolingian reform to restore weekly communion, at least during Lent, but these efforts had no lasting effect. By the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) the faithful had to be admonished to receive communion once a year at Easter. Only the monasteries were exceptions, and even there the lay brothers sometimes received no more than four times a year.

There are several reasons for this development. The heightened awesomeness of the celebration of the eucharist during the 4th and 5th centuries contributed to a sense of unworthiness in the holy presence among ordinary Christians. Perhaps more effective in discouraging the communion of the laity was the practice of abstinence, especially from sexual relations between spouses, before receiving. Since the early Middle Ages, access to the sacrament was also made more restrictive than it had been in the ancient church by the penitential discipline of requiring sacramental confession before reception of communion. The eucharistic movement of the 12th century magnified the cult of the sacrament, but did not encourage more frequent reception of communion. Indeed, the idea of spiritual communion developed whereby desire for the sacrament was deemed a substitute for receiving. Other results of this heightened eucharistic devotion made the sacrament less accessible. Infants who could not swallow the bread were communed in the species of the wine only. But the removal of the cup from lay communicants effectively ended the practice of communing all the baptized at the time of their baptism. Finally, by the end of the Middle Ages the idea emerged that the priest received communion as a representative of the whole community.

The Reformation

One of the most positive contributions of the Reformation was bringing together the celebration and reception of holy communion. All of the Protestant reformers were agreed that there should be no Masses without communicants. Martin Luther especially extolled the benefits of the sacrament and exhorted the faithful to receive communion frequently (see Admonition concerning the Sacrament, 1530). At the same time Philip Melancthon testified that "The sacrament is offered to those who wish for it after they have been examined and absolved" (Apology, XXIV, 1). Catechetical examination of communicants and private confession remained gateways to the altar. As a result, in Lutheranism the whole congregation seldom communed. Luther himself recommended that communicants be grouped together in the chancel so that they could be seen by all (Formula Missae, de communio populi, 1523). The church orders prepared by Johannes Bugenhagen provided that if there were no communicants the Mass would be terminated after the liturgy of the word with the litany and Lord's Prayer. Nevertheless, the historical record reveals that in many Lutheran churches during the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, holy communion was celebrated every Sunday, festival, and day of devotion in the church year. This situation lasted until the time of the Enlightenment when Rationalism discouraged frequent communion.

Ulrich Zwingli's approach in Zurich was different from Luther's. His rationalistic understanding of God left no room for a sacramental union of the believer and Christ. The very lack of the sense of the mystery of the real presence may have contributed to Zwingli's sense of the fellowship aspect of holy communion. It was important that the whole congregation participate in the Lord's Supper, and time was taken to accomplish this. Hence he recommended that holy communion be celebrated four times a year: at Easter, Pentecost, Christmas, and once in the autumn (Action oder Bruch des Nachtmals, 1525). The practice of quarterly communion solidified very quickly in the Reformed tradition. While John Calvin urged weekly communion, he was never able to change the quarterly communion practice in Geneva. John Knox carried this practice from Geneva to Scotland. An exception to this rule was the German Reformed church centered in Strasbourg. Under the leadership of Martin Bucer, Holy Communion was celebrated every Sunday with full congregational participation.

Bucer was a respected consultant in England during the Reformation under Edward VI (1548-53). In an extended critique of the Edwardian Prayer Book known as the Censura, Bucer criticized the lack of emphasis on weekly communion. Indeed, the 1549 Book of Common Prayer retained the medieval requirement of one communion per year, although parishes were urged to celebrate as frequently as there were communicants. Unlike Lutheranism, Morning Prayer (Matins) was used when there was no communion. The great Anglican divines of the 17th century, beginning with Lancelot Andrewes, cultivated a warm sacramental piety. More frequent eucharistic celebration was retarded, however, as a result of the attempt of the Church of England to comprehend the views of the Puritan party. In the Restoration, after the Puritan Commonwealth, there could no longer be any illusion that the Church of England could comprehend all of English Christianity. The Caroline divines made an effort to maintain a daily eucharist with communion in some cathedral and London churches. But this proved the exception rather than the rule. In most parishes holy communion was celebrated only three or four times a year.

Post-Tridentine Catholicism

The Reformation had some positive impact on the Council of Trent. The bishops assembled at Trent showed a clear desire for the people to commune at Mass. In the decree on "The Doctrine of the Sacrifice of the Mass," chap 6 (Sept 17, 1562), they asserted: "This holy synod strongly desires that at each Mass, the faithful who are present should communicate not only spiritually but sacramentally through reception of the eucharist" (D.S., 1747). Most Catholics, however, received communion after Mass or in viaticum. The Rituale Romanum of Pope Paul V (1614) provided for communion outside of Mass, even while continuing to stress that "The communion of the people ought to occur within Mass..." (p. 50). It emphasized the pastor's responsibility to provide regular catechesis about the sacrament and to exhort the faithful to receive often.

More frequent reception of communion was fostered by the devotion to the Sacred Heart in the 17th century. This included reception on the first Friday of the month, with the holy hour of adoration on each Thursday as a "eucharistic reparation." Despite theological reservations about this popular devotion, it became very entrenched in the piety of the people.

American Protestantism

Two frequencies of celebration of holy communion dominated Protestant churches in North America: quarterly among the Presbyterians and monthly among the Congregationalists. Lutherans and Methodists, who might have weekly communion, were hampered in this by the conditions of church life on the frontier and the shortage of ordained ministers.

In New England Congregationalism the Lord's Supper was celebrated once a month. This was sometimes reduced in the winter months, but communion opportunities were then increased the rest of the year. The date of the monthly celebration was staggered in cities like Boston so that it was possible for church members to receive more often than once a month by attending different meeting houses. Some of these congregations dismissed the unregenerate before the celebration; others allowed them to attend in the hope that they would have a regenerative experience. The influence of Presbyterian ministers, especially in the ill-fated Plan of Union in 1801, and the impact of the Second Great Awakening, lessened the importance of holy communion in the Congregationalist churches. The influence of Revivalism on worship heightened the preaching of the word and decreased the emphasis on holy communion throughout the 19th century in most American Protestant churches.

The Methodists had been urged by John Wesley to celebrate holy communion every Lord's Day, but this proved impossible in America because of the shortage of ordained elders to reach backwoods settlements. The love feast was substituted for the Lord's Supper since a deacon could preside at it. Once more ordained ministers were available in the early 19th century, desire for the Lord's Supper had diminished.

Communion was not common in the black Methodist and Baptist Churches because freedom of movement was denied their ministers and they were dependent on white ministers to administer the sacrament. The African Methodist Episcopal church was first organized in 1816, at a time when holy communion was not being emphasized in American Protestant churches.

The one exception to this rule was the Disciples of Christ. The Disciples separated from the Methodists and Presbyterians in the early 19th century over the question of more frequent celebration of holy communion. The Disciples promoted lay presidency at the eucharist as a matter of principle to ensure the celebration of the Lord's Supper every Lord's Day.

The Modern Liturgical Movement

The "return to the sources" which characterizes the early stage of the modern liturgical movement led to the desire in many churches to return to the ancient pattern of celebrating the eucharist every Sunday and festival. In many Episcopal churches in the early 20th century, holy communion was celebrated as the early service on Sundays while Morning Prayer continued to be the principal morning service. Anglo-Catholic parishes were sometimes able to offer daily spoken eucharistic services as well.

In Protestant churches the concern has been to increase the frequency of celebration since there are potential communicants. This has been done by appealing to historical authorities (e.g. Luther, Calvin, Wesley) and by extolling the benefits of the sacrament. Very often the experience of weekly eucharist has been its most compelling advocate.

In the Roman Catholic church the concern has been to increase the number of communicants since the Mass is celebrated often, but also to urge the faithful to receive at Mass rather than apart from Mass. One approach toward more frequent reception has been to relax the requirements for preparation. The eucharistic fast has been relaxed in three stages in the 20th century. In 1953 Pope Pius XII decreed, in Christus Dominus, that ordinary water does not break the eucharistic fast, although the requirement of abstaining from food from the previous midnight remained in effect. Special exemptions were given to the ill, to travelers, and to laborers whose work was fatiguing. In 1957 Pius XII modified the eucharistic fast even further, in Sacram Communionem, by establishing the rule of a 3-hour fast from food and alcoholic beverages before receiving communion. In 1964 Pope Paul VI reduced the period of fasting from food and drink to one hour before receiving communion; and even this minimum can be dispensed with in the case of the ill and infirm. These modifications made it easier for Catholics to commune at whatever Mass they were attending.

Accompanying these changes has been a persistent catechesis that has also been emphasized in non-Roman churches: Sunday as the day of celebration of the resurrection of Christ, the manifold modes of Christ's presence, and the unity of word and sacrament. New worship books have made the holy communion, i.e. the liturgy of the word and eucharistic meal, the chief service for Sundays and festivals. Throughout Western Christianity there is a discernable move to recover the ancient church's pattern of celebrating the Lord's Supper on the Lord's Day among the Lord's people.

The Byzantine Tradition

Frequent communion was dying out in the East already during the 4th century, and it declined precipitously after that. The stress on the holy character of the consecrated elements, first stressed by Cyril of Jerusalem, combined with abstinence from sexual intercourse in marriage before reception and the penitential discipline, all discouraged most communicants. In the East as well as the West, infrequent communion of the laity means that devotion had to be focused elsewhere rather than in the act of communion. The Eastern churches, unlike the Western, experienced no Reformation, and the liturgical movement has yet to make inroads in these churches (although the theology and practice of the Byzantine churches would surely make liturgical renewal easier in the Orthodox churches than in the Western churches with their more individualistic pieties). In a few places there is evidence of renewal and more frequent communion, especially in North America.

CONFESSION OF SINS

"Confession" until recently was the popular name for the sacrament of penance, although it is only one aspect of the entire rite. Confession of sins is an integral part of penance, whether it be generic confession or individual confession. Both emanate from a true knowledge of self before God and from contrition for the sins committed. In generic or general confession one prays and states only that one has sinned using, for example, the Act of Contrition or the Confiteor. Such generic confessions are required before general absolution and are often made by Christians in community worship. Individual confession is a specific statement of one's sins to a confessor in a one-on-one situation.

Canon 988 states: "A member of the Christian faithful is obliged to confess in kind and in number all serious sins committed after baptism and not yet directly remitted through the keys of the Church nor acknowledged in individual confession, of which one is conscious after diligent examination of conscience."

Any sin committed before baptism, for which one is sorry at the time of baptism, is forgiven. It need never be confessed. However, serious sins incurred subsequent to baptism must be confessed to a priest in the sacrament of penance. The type of sin and the number of times one has fallen must be acknowledged in individual confession after a search of conscience. By such a confession, the penitent is opening up to the minister in a unique way; one's heart is laid bare to seek forgiveness of God through the minister of God and the church. Acting in the person of Christ, the minister makes a spiritual judgement and forgives or retains the sin (Rite of Penance, 6b).

Anyone capable of committing a serious sin, and who in fact has done so, is obliged to confess at least once a year. This is an obligation dating to the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 but it is clear that only those who have in fact committed serious sin are so obliged (C.I.C., 989). There is no specified time during the year when this confession of sin must take place.

Persons who have made a general confession of sin either in the celebration of general absolution or because of some extraordinary circumstance, e.g., emergency or lack of privacy, should resolve to confess in due time each of the serious sins which they could not confess (Rite of Penance, 33).

From earliest times the church has included a confession of sin in the celebration of the sacrament of penance. In times of public penance and in the Celtic practice of the sacrament dating to the 6th century, confession was an integral aspect of the rite. The tariff penances were determined by the seriousness of the sin confessed. So today, penance should be related to sin, and this depends upon the confessor's prudent judgment after knowing the sin. The role of judge and the role of healer are the responsibility of the priest who is the mediator of the church in the sacrament. Pope John Paul II states: "The confession of sins cannot be reduced to a mere attempt at psychological self-liberation, even though it corresponds to that legitimate and natural need inherent in the human heart to open oneself to another. It is a liturgical act, solemn in its dramatic nature, yet humble and sober in the grandeur of its meaning. It is the act of the Prodigal Son who returns to his Father and is welcomed by him with the kiss of peace. It is an act of honesty and courage. It is an act of entrusting oneself, beyond sin, to the mercy that forgives" (Post-Synodal Apostolic Exhortation on Reconciliation and Penance, 31).

The church has also held that the sacramental seal is inviolable. Canon 983 states that "it is a crime for a confessor in any way to betray a penitent by word or in any other manner or for any reason." Direct violations of the seal result in the immediate excommunication of the confessor and forgiveness of this penalty is reserved to the Apostolic See (C.I.C., 1388,1).

Penitents are free to confess their sins to any approved confessor of their choice, even one from another rite (C.I.C., 991). This freedom cannot be denied and no one may be coerced in any way. Also confession of sin may be done through an interpreter who is bound by the seal of confession as well.

Anyone conscious of grave sin cannot celebrate Mass or receive communion without prior sacramental confession. However, in circumstances when there is a grave reason to celebrate or receive the eucharist and there is no possibility of confessing, the person should make a perfect act of contrition and include the intention of confessing as soon as possible (C.I.C., 916).

Venial sins are not required to be confessed but it is recommended that they be. Confession of sins is an opportunity within the total rite of penance to dialogue with the confessor about the root causes of sin in one's life. Thus frequent and careful celebrations of the sacrament are a means of perfection. One should seek out a confessor who is holy and insightful and with whom one is comfortable. The opportunity of confessing in a penitential room, face to face with a confessor, can enable candid dialogue. The purpose is to get at the root causes of sin, change one's life and strive to perfect the grace of baptism within each Christian person.

CONFIDENTIALITY

Confidentiality is a restriction on communication, requiring that we not convey to others something that has been revealed to us. Confiders confide (etymology: entrust) in a confidant under assurance that matters will not be shared with others. These matters may include not only problems or sins, but anything that a person wants, would want, or should want to keep private. While everyone must at times keep confidences, professionals acknowledge a special duty to do so in their work.

Persons in ministry should respect the revelations of those who confide in them, particularly during counselling and the rite of reconciliation, but also in everyday contexts where personal problems and ethical or religious issues are often disclosed. There is near universal agreement on the importance of confidentiality. There is, however, some debate over the reasons for it, and considerable uncertainty arises over when and how strictly it should apply.

New Problems and Old Paradoxes

Usually, the extent of confidentiality is only informally established. People gradually learn which matters should be kept confidential and which should not. A large grey area remains in ordinary life. In professional relationships the limits are normally explicit, though with the advent of team ministry, supervision, computerized records, etc., the boundaries of confidentiality are undergoing revision. For example, hospital chaplains have to decide judiciously what to divulge to other members of a health care team. Similarly new questions arise in practices such as lengthy face-to-face celebrations of penance, in-depth sacramental preparations, and group counselling, as well as in the use of verbatims, case studies, and collective problem solving.

Because of finitude and sin, paradoxes abound: free communication depends on first restricting communication. Confidentiality simultaneously liberates and limits the human desire to know and be known. Useful things are learned which cannot be used. Confidentiality encourages appropriate but also inappropriate disclosures. Further, communal life is enhanced by fostering privacy. Penitents are reconciled to the community through a rite that proscribes informing the community. Confidentiality enables some to serve, but keeps others uninformed and therefore unable to help. Confidences unite people in a relationship which then excludes other persons. In brief, limits can free persons, and secrecy promotes openness.

Basis in Tradition

For Christians, confidentiality is not an intrinsic good. We are encouraged to live in the light, and to confess our sins to one another (Eph 5:12-13; Lk 12:2-3; Jas 5:16). Our community forms the body of Christ, and includes mutual sharing (1 Cor 11-12). Concealing matters and lying to the community bring death (Acts 5:1-11). In the eschaton, we shall have perfect knowledge and see face to face (1 Cor 13:12). God wills to reveal as completely as possible God's own self. Thus, it is a Christian ideal to live in an atmosphere of complete openness.

In history, however, God's self-revelation takes place gradually and not equally to all. In imitation of Christ, we properly strive to be unreservedly open to God, but not with all human beings (Mt 10:26-27, 13:10-17). At times we should let others see our good deeds, and at other times we should not let our right hand know what our left hand is doing (Mt 5:14-16, 6:1-6). Thus, theologically speaking, confidentiality functions within the pattern of disclosure and concealment that characterizes all historical life.

Reasons for Confidentiality

Contemporary philosophers, focusing on professional confidentiality, usually ground the practice in autonomy, privacy or human need. They begin with the duty not to disclose, and then inquire about exceptions. A different approach is taken here. Openness is the ideal, but there are at least four basic reasons for restricting communication: reverence for individuals; need for relationships; fulfilling promises; and encouraging persons to seek help. After discussing these, we shall take up confidentiality's limits.

Reverence. We human beings are each mysteries living within God's mystery. Public scrutiny can damage the unique and often delicate ways that God works with us; it can deform the frail identity we are fashioning for ourselves. When reverence for our dignity is lacking, we become for others mere objects, susceptible to unlimited inquiry and discussion. While God's complete knowledge of us fosters our true self, other persons' knowledge of us is not so consistently upbuilding.

According to psychologists, as children we take a major developmental step when we develop secrets, since to have a secret is to have a separate self. The correlative desire to share our self then arises. We usually want those we trust to know us, but we fear that others may use knowledge of us for their purposes, not ours. To act without regard to what others may think or do is hardly a Christian ideal; still, we need safe harbors where the winds of social expectation do not easily throw us off our course. The integrity of our identity depends on acting according to a pattern that makes coherent sense to us. Where we would be deflected by others from realizing that integrity, we properly keep them at a safe distance. Not everyone will treat us with reverence, so we use discretion as to whom we will reveal ourselves, and under what conditions. Under conditions of confidentiality, we retain some control over what we have revealed.

Relationships. Our relationships often fall into typical patterns or roles, e.g., friend or bishop; each pattern has its own implied set of general rules or expect-tations. We may have more than one type of relation with the same person, and thus we may have to be clear about which kinds of disclosures are appropriate to each. Our self is like a series of concentric circles, from an inmost core known only by God to a public self known by any sentient being that cares to notice. Thus our social interactions vary in depth and extension. Without confidentiality, our alliances in this world would tend to be superficial or rife with alienation.

Relationships are created by self-disclosure, and the type of the relation both depends on and determines the quality and depth of what we share. Some conversations are restricted not because the issues are sensitive, but because third parties are "outsiders." For example, a woman personally might want to tell each of her friends that she is pregnant, and she would properly resent it if others usurped her role. Each human relation creates its own shared world. (There is of course considerable overlap in these worlds because everyone has multiple relationships.) Within a shared world, each person corrects misunderstandings and molds meanings. Outsiders cannot know the personal context of any self-revelation nor will they feel bound by the loyalties a revelation creates. God alone is able to share in relationships without being an outsider, because God is not one person among other persons, but rather the personal ground of all relations.

Promises. Confidentiality often rests upon an implicit or explicit promise not to reveal. Through the promise, one alienates some freedom of action: here, to tell what one knows. A promise presupposes and further establishes trust, which is a central virtue, especially for Christians who remember the story of Judas. Trust belongs to a unity of important human values such as intimacy, privacy, security, respect, reliance, and self-discovery. Any breach of confidentiality threatens these. When a professional breaks trust, the whole profession is defamed; if a minister breaks trust, the church is wounded, and the individual's relation to God may be strained.

Assistance. Without confidentiality, those most vulnerable or at risk might not ask for the help they need. Confidentiality makes possible the uninhibited self-examination that is often crucial to growth. The fear of public repercussions, and more fundamentally a prideful self-image, keep people from acknowledging problems even to themselves, and hence from remedying them. We learn by speaking, particularly if the listener and the conditions are right. In contrast, unprotected self-revelation and the vulnerability that ensues could be foolish or even sinful. In this world there is always someone ready to exploit exposed weaknesses. Hence confidential roles, e.g., spouse or priest, are socially established so that we may find reconciliation and healing. As John Calvin noted, confidentiality is necessary, "lest sinners be hindered from coming to repentance, and from making a free confession of their faults."

Dangers of Confidentiality

We have indicated four broad reasons for confidentiality. It is not, however, without significant dangers, and to a few of these we now turn.

Power and Status. A confidential interchange involves power, and power can be abused. A professional wields, even if unintentionally, enormous power to define what is good or bad, orthodox or deviant. Psychological studies show that when persons reveal themselves to someone who is not reciprocally self-revealing, the status of the confidant increases over the one who confides. Ministers should be wary of welcoming confidences as a way to enhance their importance in their own eyes and in the eyes of others. The point is not that ministers must be mutually self-revealing; rather they ought to keep in mind that, for Christians, status and power are for the sake of service, especially to protect or enable the vulnerable. Those who confide, particularly if the matters are sensitive, become vulnerable.

Confidentiality can also be used as a shield to hide problems or to avoid responsibility. Not rarely have bad judgments or decisions of those in authority, whether in the church or out, been protected from scrutiny by a claim of confidentiality. To be sure, public institutions need secrets. But such arrangements notoriously can be used to promote the interests either of those in power or of the institution itself more than the people they serve. We properly ask of public institutions a higher degree of accountability and openness than individuals.

Mutual Responsibilities. Confidentiality includes mutual rights to self-determination, self-possession, and free association. Usually authors focus on the duties of the confidant. The confider also has obligations, even in professional relationships. Each person has a right to enter or end a relation. Within a relation confiders have some duty appropriately to reveal themselves. Not everything should be told to everyone, but some self-revelation is required.

On the other hand, some people over-use confidentiality, e.g., expecting secrecy for matters that should be disclosed, asking for anonymity as a way of avoiding responsibility, or evoking secrecy as a license to pass on matters that should not be disclosed. Confiders should recognize that what they reveal about a third party may alter the relation between the confidant and that third party, without the participation or consent of the third party.

The confidant also deserves some of the protections of confidentiality. In a pastoral setting advice is often relative to the confider, and it ought not be indiscriminately broadcast. Because of the mutuality of the conversation and because of an obligation to foster a practice of confidentiality, confidants ordinarily should not be compelled to discuss conversations even when the confider waives confidentiality.

Mean between Extremes. Excessive confidentiality reflects and reinforces individualism and privatism, thereby devaluing relationships and open communication. Community life is fostered when there is relatively free exchange of information. A weak sense of community results if members are reluctant to pass on anything of what they learn in ordinary conversations. Communal decisions often depend on having adequate input. Strict confidentiality tends to restrict a professional's awareness and concern to individual confiders, thereby ignoring others who might be affected.

On the other hand, communal life is impeded through unwarranted disclosure of confidences. Excessive openness erodes trust and a proper sense of privacy, e.g., today's secret is featured in tomorrow's homily. Totalitarian societies prohibit confidentiality by claiming that everything has significance for society. The church, which needs pluralism and whose structures can be used in totalitarian ways, should champion confidentiality.

Conflicts

Confidentiality is experienced as a duty because it counteracts internal and external pressures to talk about matters which may be interesting, bizarre, or even highly relevant. Apart from the "seal of confession," however, it is only a prima facie duty, i.e., one that can be overridden by other, more compelling duties. There is an inconsistency when a minister offers confidentiality to facilitate full disclosure, and then breaks confidentiality because of what full disclosure reveals. This inconsistency should rarely be embraced, though under the tragic conditions of human finitude, at times it may have to be. Even legitimate exceptions, however, tend to erode the practice of confidentiality. When confidentiality is expected, one should be very wary of breaking that trust.

Prudence. No simple rules, however, can set down in advance what in non-confessional conversations may be revealed. For professionals, a relatively rigid stance is appropriate. For all, discretion plus common sense are needed: some matters are strictly confidential, some may be shared—perhaps in disguised form—with certain others, and some may be freely discussed. The setting alone is not decisive. People reveal very personal matters in the midst of casual conversation. Conversely, in counselling and even in the sacrament of penance, trivial things may be mentioned. Not everything is equally worthy of strict confidentiality. (Still, care must be taken since what is ordinary to one party may be sensitive to another.)

Permission to discuss confidential matters with others should be explicitly sought. Consultation is best pursued with strangers or only after making the case anonymous; and anyone consulted should be bound to confidentiality. In cases where confidential matters become public knowledge, the confidential relation still deserves some protection. This can be accomplished by indicating that what is known has been learned through public sources, not through private discussion.

Seal of Confession. The theory and practice of confidentiality has evolved partly through reflection on the priest-penitent relation. Early forms of the sacrament of penance were public, not really confidential. Over time, a requirement of silence arose; this was expressly formulated by at least the 5th or 6th century, and canonically formalized six centuries later. Penalties included excommunication and perpetual pilgrimage or life-time imprisonment in a monastery.

There is unanimous agreement that the “seal of confession” should not be broken, though the grounds for that position are seldom defended. The ancient maxim that “about confessional matters the priest knows even less than what he knows nothing about” bears repeating. A priest may not directly reveal or even modify his external behavior in accord with what he learns in penance, though he is encouraged to pray for his penitents. What counts as indirect use—and is therefore either less sinful or permissible—varies somewhat throughout the tradition. Only after 1682 were priests forbidden all use of confessional material. As a general rule, anything that might lead to distrust towards either a penitent or the sacrament itself is proscribed.

Legal Protection. In the United States, statutory law in 49 states protects the “seal” as privileged communication, a legal term pertaining to exemption from giving evidence in the judicial system. The protection is not absolute: several states presently require persons to report even suspicions, not to mention confessions, of child abuse. As in the past, priests might have to go to jail to protect the “seal.” Civil law offers less “privilege” to pastoral or psychological counselors. However, the more the ministerial role or activity is officially recognized by the church, the more likely it is protected by the First Amendment. Whatever the law, it would be tragic if, out of worry over legal liabilities, necessary ministries were neglected.

For legal purposes, confidentiality is privileged if it meets four criteria. The confider must believe the communication will not be disclosed; confidentiality must be essential to the purpose of the relation; the harm in disclosing must be greater than the benefits to justice in testifying; and society must foster the confidential relation for the common good. Thus, in ministry, the communication usually must occur in the course of a discipline sanetioned by the church. But case law varies greatly: thus, in some states, a third person's presence, e.g., a spouse, invalidates privilege. Some authors do not advocate malpractice insurance because insurance companies can require disclosure of confidences in a defense against a legal suit.

Exceptions. When strict confidentiality is the rule, two kinds of exceptions are commonly discussed. The first concerns minors or mentally incapacitated persons; the usual norms on making decisions for others, or paternalism, arise here. The second concerns harm either to the confider, e.g., a threat of suicide, or to others. Prospective harms may permit or require disclosure more than past harms, since the evil to be done may still be avoided. Also, the greater the potential harm and the more likely it will occur, the more reason there is to break the confidence. There is a duty to warn and an obligation to prevent some evils. Still, as a general rule, confidentiality should prevail.

When confidences must be revealed, the cooperation of confiders should be sought. Respect for their autonomy diminishes, however, when they are clearly set on a course that is destructive to themselves or others. Similarly, a prior promise of confidentiality is not absolute, since silence may amount to "material cooperation." Nevertheless, regular breaking of confidences should not occur; and, in professional relations, clients should be forewarned that disclosure of certain matters may be ethically and legally required. Whenever possible, role-expectations and social settings should explicitly indicate the extent of confidentiality.

In individual cases, the four grounds for confidentiality should be considered. Will disclosure violate reverence for the confider, especially if vulnerable? Will it weaken or destroy a trust-relationship? Will it break a promise? And will it cause more harm (to the practice of confidentiality, to society, to the confider or confidant, to others) than it prevents? In this historical order, confidentiality is often necessary, even as full self-communication is a Christian goal.

CONFIRMATION

This second sacrament of Christian initiation, employing an anointing with oil and the laying on of hands, complements baptism, even as the two are complemented and completed by the eucharist. The term is proper to Western usage. In the East it is more properly known as chrismation. In addition to the entries on confirmation that follow, see also: Initiation, Christian, Anointing; Anointing, post-baptismal; Holy Spirit, gifts of the; Holy Spirit, baptism in the; Sacraments in the Eastern churches.

CONFIRMATION IN SCRIPTURE

The Council of Trent in its seventh session (1547) declared that the rite of confirmation was "a true and proper sacrament," one of the seven "sacraments of the New Law." This definition was directed against the position of the Reformers which recognized only two "sacraments of the Gospel," baptism and the eucharist, and saw the other rites as historical developments of greater or lesser value. This contrasting evaluation of the rites of the church involved confirmation in the theological polemics which largely characterized theology after Trent. It was common ground among both parties that the gift of the Holy Spirit was an effect of Christian initiation. Following their dogmatic position, Protestant scholars maintained that the NT asserted that this gift was exclusively an effect of baptism. Accordingly, they denied that those texts which seemed to attribute this gift to a post-baptismal rite of imposition of hands did, when rightly interpreted, mean this. Catholic scholarship could afford to be more flexible here, since Catholic sacramental theology had, following an older tradition, come to assert a twofold gift of the Spirit in Christian initiation, one in baptism and a further in confirmation. Catholic scholars could therefore agree that the NT did teach that baptism conferred the Holy Spirit and yet maintain that a further gift was conferred by the post-baptismal or confirmational rite (whether imposition of hands, anointing or a combination of both).

In this century, which has witnessed a more independent and objective approach by biblical scholarship, one might expect that these rather dogmatically determined positions would have been transcended, as has been the case in so many other areas of theology, and that at least a broad consensus concerning the NT's teaching on the gift of the Spirit and Christian initiation would have emerged. Surprisingly, this has not proved to be the case. Instead, a rather bewildering variety of viewpoints has been put forward by the different writers who attempt to discuss this issue. These views might be grouped together, in a rather summary and schematic manner, as follows. (1) The gift of the Spirit is exclusively an effect of baptism. (2) The Spirit, or a further gift thereof, is conferred through the post-baptismal rite of imposition of hands. (It is universally recognized today that NT references to anointing in this context are purely figurative.) (3) In the early church the Spirit was a free gift of God to a baptized person unmediated by any external sign or rite but usually manifesting itself in some charismatic manner which enabled the church to recognize and acknowledge that the Spirit had been given. But many variations, combinations and modifications of these basic positions have also been advocated.

This surprising variety of contradictory viewpoints on a single issue in NT studies today calls for comment. At least as regards basic positions, scholarship does not seem to have advanced far beyond the polemical days of post-Tridentine theology. It is clear that dogmatic, confessional positions are still influential and that the question is too often not approached with that objective detachment which discussion of NT texts requires and which in nearly all other areas is usual today in biblical scholarship. But a blurring of confessional lines is also noticeable. Thus, one finds Protestant and Anglican scholars, not all of whom might be regarded as of a liberal tendency, maintaining the confirmational significance of those passages which refer to a post-baptismal rite. Some Catholic writers, on the other hand, deny that the NT provides any explicit evidence for confirmation.

It has to be admitted, I think, that discussion of this issue by biblical scholarship has not been satisfactory. A feature of this study which may be significant is the fact that there have been very few studies devoted specifically to the question or prepared to discuss it with the thoroughness it requires. Most of this discussion occurs in general commentaries or as a question arising incidentally in a study devoted to another topic and treated in a separate short scholion or appendix. Discussion of the question too often occurs en passant and is too often characterized by sweeping, general statements which a more thorough study would have to modify.

What this situation seems to indicate is the lack of any agreed methodology for serious study of this issue. This seems to be the greatest need at the moment.

The Question of Methodology

An appropriate methodology for study of the topic in hand can only be determined on the basis of answers to the following questions: What precisely is the question at issue? What strata of NT material throw light on this question? How are these strata related to one another?

In general terms the question at issue may be described as the place of the gift of the Spirit of God in the practice of Christian initiation in the early church. But the matter requires closer definition.

The gift and presence of God's Spirit in the church is a prominent assertion and theme of the NT. This gift is presented as a fruit of the redemptive victory of Christ and as a foundational event which brings into existence and thereafter maintains the Christian community or church. It is a community endowment establishing this community with its specific identity. Apart from the original individuals who, precisely as forming the original community, received the Spirit directly (Jn 20, Acts 2), all others receive this gift only by becoming members of this community and thereby sharing in the Spirit with which it has been endowed ab origine. To receive the gift of the Holy Spirit is simply to become a member of this Spirit-filled community. The precise question to be faced is this: how in the actual practice and understanding of the early church was this gift received—as an effect of baptism or of a post-baptismal rite or as somehow a free gift of God later acknowledged by the community?

The NT material bearing on this issue has to be situated within the particular stratum of NT literature to which it belongs. Following this principle one may group the relevant material as follows. (1) The evidence in the Acts of the Apostles on the practice of Christian initiation in the early church. (2) The references in the genuine Pauline letters on baptism and the gift of the Spirit. (3) Material in the synoptic gospels which reflects the early church's practice and understanding of initiation. (Of special significance here is the way in which Jesus' baptism by John is reported.) (4) References to initiation in the other documents of the NT.

The important question which arises concerning these different blocks of material is how to assess their relative value. It can be said immediately that the group which contains the least valuable material is the fourth group. Though these documents do contain significant references to initiation, these are usually too generic in character as regards the precise question under discussion here (but note the reference to the rite of imposition of hands in Heb 6:2), and in any case, since most of these writings come from the later period of the NT canon, they can only be understood in the light of the information provided by the earlier strata. (The much discussed text of Jn 3:5 is a particular case in point.)

As regards the other groups, Acts and the synoptic gospels clearly belong together here. Both reflect, directly or indirectly, the faith and practice of the church over the early decades of its existence. The evidence of the synoptics, however, on our question is very indirect. This material is directly concerned with the life of Jesus and any information provided here on the initiation practice of the early church is by way of implication and inferred interpretation. Acts, on the other hand, is specifically concerned with giving a picture of the life of the church in the early period. Its narrative thus bears directly on the issue under discussion and for this reason is the most hopeful document we possess for information on the early practice of Christian initiation. The more indirect synoptic material will therefore have to be interpreted in the light of the assessment of the material in Acts.

The remaining but crucial question now is the relation between Acts and the Pauline material on this question. There is general agreement today that there is no explicit reference to a post-baptismal rite in Paul. On the contrary, according to many scholars, the Spirit here seems to be associated exclusively with baptism. Since the genuine Pauline letters are the earliest written documents of the NT and since Paul, together with the fourth gospel, presents the most advanced and significant theology of the NT, this silence has led many commentators to the conclusion that no such rite existed in the early church and therefore that the apparent contrary references in Acts have to be explained in some other manner—a question on which there is no consensus. The result is that, on this issue, Paul, as so interpreted, is given a controlling priority over the face-value evidence of Acts.

For many reasons, which cannot be discussed in any detail here, this widely-held conclusion has to be rejected as unsatisfactory.

As long as a very skeptical attitude towards the historical value of the Acts of the Apostles as presenting a picture of the life of the early church prevailed, an attitude initiated by the Tübingen School of the 19th century and culminating perhaps in Haenchen's great commentary (1961), this position could be plausibly argued. This skeptical attitude, however, now no longer prevails. The historical value of Acts for a portrayal of the general life and thought of the early church, if not for specific details, has in more recent times been strongly asserted and vindicated by many scholars. This more recent evaluation effectively removes one of the major bases of the argument for the controlling priority of Paul on this question. Once a respectable historical value is acknowledged for Acts, then the existence of a post-baptismal rite (imposition of hands) for the gift of the Spirit, as described in chaps. 8 and 19, can scarcely be denied. But if one accepts this argument for the existence of this rite, then clearly it was a known and accepted practice to Paul, as in fact Acts 19:1-6 explicitly asserts. The question mark has now to be transferred to the interpretation of the Pauline material.

Apart from the evaluation of the historicity of Acts, the argument for Pauline priority largely reduces itself to an argument from silence, the most difficult of all arguments in historiography. The argument in this instance does not pass the required test. Another and better explanation for this alleged silence can be provided. But further comment on this question will have to be postponed until Paul's understanding of Christian initiation and the gift of the Spirit is discussed. But it can be confidently stated that the main interest of Paul does not lie in giving any description of the initiation practice with which he and the addressees of his letters are familiar, but rather with developing a much deeper understanding of what this now past event means in the present and the future for Christian faith and life. This is essentially and totally a theological enterprise and not an exercise in description of current ritual practice.

What emerges from this brief analysis of the NT material on the gift of the Spirit in Christian initiation may be summarized as follows. For information on the initiation practice of the early church, Acts of the Apostles is the primary and controlling source; for developed theological insight, Paul is the significant writer.

The Initiation Practice of the Early Church

The understanding of the gift of the Spirit in the Acts of the Apostles has its determining source in the event of Pentecost. This event signifies the endowment of the community of Jesus' disciples with the promised eschatological gift of God's Spirit. Together with the resurrection and exaltation of Jesus, this event signifies the effective dawn of the Messianic Age and establishes the community of Jesus' disciples as the Messianic Community, the group which has received and now possesses the promised Messianic blessings. Pentecost is thus the second foundation event which brings the Christian church into existence and gives it its identity. The first and prior of these events is the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ which brings into existence the community of the disciples of Christ. The second is the coming of the Spirit which establishes this already existing community as the Spirit-filled community of the disciples of Christ.

It is important to note that the coming of the Spirit is a community gift and endowment. The question which arises, and which arose immediately, was how others could come to share in the blessings which the community now possesses, including the gift of the Spirit. This is the question of the initiation practice of the early church, the system whereby new converts were admitted to membership in the community. The question arose immediately on Pentecost Sunday, according to Acts chap. 2, in the reaction to Peter's sermon. In reply to his audience's question, "what shall we do?" (2:37), Peter answers; "Repent, and be baptized, everyone of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins; and you shall [N.E.B., more accurately, "will"] receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (2:38). The text goes on to state that on that day three thousand "were added" to the number of the community (2:41).

This passage describes, however summarily, the earliest practice of Christian initiation. A number of points arising from the text deserve notice. The words "were added" show that it is a question of new members joining an already existing group and coming to share in their specific status and privileges. The issue which arises is what process or system of initiation the passage envisages. This process is described very summarily in Acts 2:38. The text mentions explicitly the rite of immersion, baptism, which is directly associated with "the name of Jesus Christ," that is, personal adherence to or discipleship of Christ, and its effect is described as "the forgiveness of sins." There then follows the reference to the gift of the Holy Spirit: "and you shall/ will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit." The double reference to Christ and the Spirit clearly refers to and reproduces the two events which brought the community into existence and have given it its identity. This double reference, the christological and the pneumatological, will continue to characterize mention of Christian initiation not only throughout the NT but throughout Christian history.

The question is how Acts 2:38 envisages the relation between the water rite of baptism and the gift of the Spirit. At first reading three interpretations seem possible: the gift of the Spirit is an effect of baptism itself; the coming of the Spirit is a subsequent event in the life of the baptized person unmediated by any rite; the Spirit is conferred by means of a subsequent rite which the author here feels no obligation to mention explicitly. While most commentators tend to rush to judgment here and assume the first interpretation as correct, with little attempt at critical examination, it needs to be stressed that, taken in itself, the text has to be left open in its meaning and can only be finally exegeted in the light of how Christian initiation is presented throughout the rest of Acts of the Apostles. For it is evident that the author here refers to and presupposes what he regards as the regular practice of Christian initiation in the early church. But it should be noted that the particular Greek grammatical structure here, an imperative followed by a future indicative, already strongly suggests that the first interpretation can scarcely be the correct one.

It is not possible to undertake here any detailed examination of the material throughout Acts referring to Christian initiation. It must suffice to mention summarily some basic factors which enable one to determine the meaning implicit in Acts 2:38 concerning the gift of the Spirit.

A number of studies have made clear that consistently throughout Acts the gift of the Spirit is not presented or envisaged as an effect of baptism. (J.N.G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit, has effectively established this point at least). Commentators have generally paid too little attention to the precise concept of the Holy Spirit which Acts presents. This is the classical biblical and Jewish concept of the prophetic Spirit. But this concept in itself is not intrinsically connected either with ritual washing or forgiveness of sins, the stated effect of baptism in Acts. It would be very extraordinary indeed if such an intrinsic connection now suddenly appeared in early Christianity which, for its own thought and practice, was so heavily indebted to biblical and Jewish concepts.

Further, Acts 2:38 clearly presupposes a particular system of Christian initiation which is here alluded to in a summary manner. When the author later in the work comes to describe more fully the initiation practice he has in mind, and which he clearly regards as regular in the church from the beginning down to his own day and situation (Acts was probably written in the decade A.D. 80-90), we find that this practice consists of baptism and the rite of imposition of hands for the gift of the Spirit (Acts 8:12-17; 19:1-7). Apart from Luke's obvious familiarity with this initiation ritual, it is also clear that whatever sources he was relying on (probably oral, not documentary) confirmed him in his view.

Various other data which can be gleaned from Acts concerning Christian initiation cohere with and strengthen this assessment. Moreover, material from the synoptic gospels now also falls easily into line. This applies in particular to the narrative of Jesus' baptism by John in the Jordan. As described by the synoptics (Mt 3:16-17; Mk 1:9-11; Lk 3:21-22), this event is undoubtedly presented as a paradigmatic model of the initiation of the Christian convert and reflects the church's early initiation practice. It is therefore highly significant that this event also consists of immersion in water followed by the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus. "In those days Jesus came from Nazareth in Galilee and was baptized (i.e., immersed) by John in the Jordan. And when he came up out of the water, immediately he saw the heavens opened and the Spirit descending on him like a dove..." (Mk 1:9-10). Here also the coming of the Spirit is a post-baptismal event. Given the literary form within which Mark is writing, those scholars who would wish to see the gift of the Spirit as an effect intrinsic to the baptismal rite of immersion would logically have to maintain that here the dove alighted on Jesus while he was immersed under the water, a picture the absurdity of which requires no comment. The text of Heb 6:2 adds its further confirming weight to the argument advocated here concerning the practice of initiation in the early church. This text can only be understood as implying a reference to Christian initiation as consisting of two rites, baptism and imposition of hands.

The conclusion to this summary investigation of the NT sources concerning the initiation practice of the early church is that this consisted of two rites, baptism followed by imposition of hands for the gift of the Spirit (or, in later terminology, confirmation). It may seem surprising to us today that formal entry into the Christian community was thought to require two distinct rites. In any normal circumstances one would have thought one was quite sufficient. This however is to impose a very modern, rationalistic approach upon the much more imaginative and symbolic mind of former ages. One has to remember the seed bed from which early Christianity, as regards both thought and practice, derived, namely, late Judaism, with the biblical history which lay behind it and the actual experience of the members of the foundational Christian church.

The original community recognized and identified itself as the community of the New Age, the promised Messianic Community inheriting and possessing the Messianic Blessings. In typical biblical manner, this community and its privileges are presented as coming into existence in accordance with the model or pattern of salvation history, that is, a series of separate events following one another and building on one another until eventually a climax is achieved. The foundational community experienced the culmination of this history in the events of Christ and the Spirit, the two climactic events which have brought the community into existence and gave it its identity as the Spirit-filled community of the disciples of Jesus. In opening itself to new converts, the community reproduces and expresses in effective symbol or sacrament the salvation history it has experienced. Hence the double reference in its initiation ritual, the christological and pneumatological, expressed by means of the two distinct rites.

This initiation ritual, however, based as it is on the model of salvation history and the actual experience of the original community, poses a challenge to the Christian mind to discern the unity which lies behind its discrete references. This challenge, which is an invitation to a strictly theological enterprise, was soon recognized and addressed. Herein lies the significance of Paul on the gift of the Holy Spirit and Christian initiation.

Deepening Insight: Paul

The Holy Spirit is a prominent theme in the thought and writings of Paul. The Spirit is an endowment of and a vital presence in the Christian community and its members. It is clear that the gift of the Spirit is an effect of the past, once-for-all event of Christian initiation. But it represents an abiding presence and Paul's main interest lies not in the particular moment of the past, or any description thereof, but rather in illuminating the significance of this presence now for the life of the church and the Christian. This is the reason why he shows little or no interest in any factual description of the actual event of initiation and why so little information can be gleaned from his scattered references concerning it. He is not what we today would call liturgically minded. His interest lies elsewhere, in developing a deeper understanding of what Christian faith and life mean. This is a theological enterprise in the proper sense, an effort of faith seeking understanding. It is an effort which searches earnestly for the unity underlying the discrete references of Christian faith and practice and in pursuing its tasks often finds itself embarrassed by these references and the salvation history model which has determined them.

Paul's silence concerning a post-baptismal rite is largely explained by this context. For it has to be assumed that he was familiar with what we have seen was the regular practice of the early church. His references re-echo much of the same general understanding of initiation found in the early church as presented by Acts. The characteristic double reference, the christological and pneumatological, occur again and again in the Pauline texts. But Paul's effort to develop a deeper understanding of the mystery of Christian initiation leads him to develop new emphases and to bring the separate references together into a deeper unity. This is his significance and his achievement and it is in this enterprise that the key to his thought and texts lies. His references are concerned with illuminating the existing, regular practice of the church and they thus constitute, in the fine words of Schnackenburg, "a marriage of the existing rite with the weighty thought of his theology" (Baptism in the Thought of St. Paul, p. 30).

Central to this bold effort of Paul is the new concept of the Spirit of God which he introduces and which is to have such a profound influence in Christian theology. The understanding of the Spirit in early Christianity was the Spirit of Prophecy who inspired forceful preaching of the gospel and accompanied that preaching with confirming signs. But Paul now retrieves the other biblical concept of the Spirit, the life-giving Spirit (prominent in the prophets, see esp. Ezek, chaps. 36, 37). This provides him with one of the foundation ideas he is seeking to develop, a more unified understanding of Christian faith. It enables him to connect together the separate references and bring them into an harmonious unity. In particular, he is now able to unite the christological and pneumatological references of initiation. To be united to Christ means also to share in the Spirit of Christ, the Spirit of God; to receive the Holy Spirit implies union with Christ. This explains why the typical Pauline expressions, to be "in Christ," "in the Spirit," in their deepest significance shade into one another and become almost synonymous.

This achievement of theological insight now enables Paul to see the power of the Spirit at work also in the process of baptism itself, both in the genesis of faith and conversion preceding the sacrament, and in the union with Christ therein accomplished (see de la Potterie "L'Onction du Chrétien par la foi"). He is thus able to present Christian initiation as the unity which it is and this is the main thrust and direction of his thought. But this does not at all mean that on his own initiative he would have interfered with the established and inherited practice of Christian initiation and bent it at his will to his way of thinking. Nothing in his writings suggest he was that kind of radical innovator. Nor did he need to be. His theological enterprise simply transcended the salvation history model he was commenting on. Consciously or unconsciously, this was his purpose and his achievement.

But it is worth noting that in his most extensive and significant reference to baptism, Romans 6, 3-11, Paul makes no mention whatever of the Holy Spirit. This latter theme, so prominent in his thought, is not introduced here until chap. 8. It is very difficult to see how, if in the initiation practice of the church, the gift of the Spirit was seen as an effect of baptism, he could have avoided some reference to the Spirit in this passage. No doubt the structure of Romans is important here. Nevertheless, if there is an argument from silence in the Pauline writings on this issue, it surely lies here.

Conclusion

The remaining documents of the NT throw little further light on our question. But something of the influence of Paul is discernible in the close linking in some texts of the work of Spirit with baptism (e.g., Jn 3:5; Tit 3:5). Though such references are often interpreted as implying that the Spirit is given in baptism, this judgment is overhasty (see de la Potterie "Naître de l'eau et naître de l'Esprit—le texte baptismal de Jean 3,5"). We meet here again the Pauline understanding of the Holy Spirit and the Spirit's role in the whole process of initiation. No more than in Paul himself, therefore, this close association of the christological and pneumatological references does not imply any denial of the existence of a special post-baptismal rite of the Spirit.

Viewing the evidence of the NT as a whole, therefore, one finds that Christian initiation in the early church consisted of two rites, baptism followed by imposition of hands for the gift of the Spirit. This complex ritual was derived from and determined by the perspective of biblical salvation history and the personal experience of the original disciples. Paul, introducing a new and more profound understanding of the Spirit, was able to envisage and indicate the unity which underlay this complex ritual with its discrete references. We meet here for the first time the tension between these two approaches to understanding Christian faith and practice, the theological and the salvation history approach. Both methods will continue in the church, the salvation history model more congenial to catechetical and homiletic commentary, the theological to the effort to achieve a more unified understanding. But both approaches are necessary. Neither can be reduced to the other. When one approach tends to over-dominate, false questions arise and inevitably receive false solutions. Much of the later oft-referred-to "confusion" concerning the sacrament of confirmation has its source here. The legitimacy and necessity of both approaches have to be recognized and a balanced tension maintained. This is the way towards progress and understanding in this important area of Christian faith and practice. It is also the way which offers the best hope for ecumenical discussion. This is perhaps the most important and valuable lesson which the NT teaches us today concerning the gift of the Holy Spirit in Christian initiation.

CONFIRMATION, HISTORY OF

Most people would probably assume that the history of the sacrament of confirmation is a simple, straightforward story. It is, on the contrary, one of the most difficult and complex questions in the history of the church. There are many reasons for this. The rite varied in its practice from place to place and period to period. In many cases, documentary evidence concerning it is either entirely lacking, tantalizingly insufficient or the meaning of extant evidence is disputed. However, despite these problems the body of evidence which does exist enables the general history of the practice and understanding of the sacrament to be reconstructed. The story, however, can only be presented here in brief outline.

Any account of the history of confirmation must pay attention to the different significant periods in the practice of the sacrament and the distinct development of the rite in the East and the West. Bearing this in mind, this presentation will proceed as follows: 1) the history of the rite of confirmation; 2) the history of the theology of the sacrament; 3) the history of the age for confirmation.

History of the Rite

Subsequent to the NT period, one may discern in broad outline three main periods in the history of the rite of confirmation: (a) the early centuries (2nd to 4th centuries); (b) the early medieval period (5th to 11th centuries); (c) the central medieval period to modern times and recent developments. Discussion here will follow this order. It will be presupposed that the rite of confirmation, i.e., post-baptismal imposition of hands for the gift of the Holy Spirit, was a regular practice of the apostolic church in the NT period.

(a) The Early Centuries. The 3rd and 4th centuries represent the classic period in the ancient church of the catechumenate which culminated in the solemn initiation ceremony of the Easter vigil. This practice was obviously the flowering of a system already developing in the 2nd century. Unfortunately, however, this period is really one of silence concerning the sacrament of confirmation. The most significant reference to Christian initiation occurs in Justin Martyr (d.c. 165), Apologia 1, 65, but even this is too summary and inexplicit to be really useful. Though some scholars have maintained that this silence is significant, showing that confirmation was not a regular practice in the church at this time, this argument cannot be sustained. The Christian writings of the period are not of such a character that one would expect to find in them a description of the rites of Christian initiation. Their silence on this issue is therefore rather to be expected. But from early in the 3rd century this veil of silence is lifted, at least as regards the Western church. Both Tertullian from N. Africa and Hippolytus of Rome in his Apostolic Tradition (c. 215) give us a good description of how Christian initiation was performed in the West at the time. The initiation rites described by both writers reveal the same basic structure: baptism; post-baptismal anointing; prayer and imposition of hand for the gift of the Spirit, i.e., confirmation. The Roman rite, however, shows one variation which will be significant for the future. The anointing of the forehead, which would have been part of the post-baptismal anointing in Tertullian, is here reserved to the bishop and performed by him after the general imposition of hand. As so performed it represents here the individual application of the general prayer and imposition of hand for the gift of the Spirit. In other words, the individual application was now performed not by simply touching the head but by anointing the forehead. This is the origin of the rite of chrismation which today constitutes the essential rite of confirmation.

It is worth noting that the basic shape of the initiation rite as evidenced for Carthage and Rome at this period displays the same structure as that described in Acts, chaps. 8 and 19, though the baptismal anointing is a post NT development. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the evidence attests a strong continuity in the church's initiation practice from the NT period into the 3rd century, at least as regards the West.

Over the next two centuries, that is, to the beginning of the 5th century and the time of St. Augustine, Rome and the western provinces continued this initiation practice. Evidence for this period varies from place to place, more plentiful for Rome, Italy and N. Africa, scanty for Spain and Gaul. But the general pattern remains the same. The Roman rite of final chrismation, however, was not adopted in the provinces which continued to follow their own obviously more primitive practice. It is clear that no great doctrinal significance was attached to the peculiar Roman rite, which very probably had a purely practical origin.

The question of confirmation in the East over this period presents a different story. Documentation here is not as plentiful or as straightforward as in the West. The question presents many difficulties and the whole area requires much further patient study. The earliest document throwing any definite light on initiation practice in the East is the Syriac document, Didascalia Apostolorum (c. 235). The ritual which this document briefly describes contains no post-baptismal rite; baptism is here followed immediately by participation in the eucharist. Later documents show that this practice was widespread in the East. Most of the evidence points to the region of the Syriac-speaking church. But the discovery in the 1950s of the lost baptismal instructions of St. John Chrysostom, delivered when he was the catechist in the great city of Antioch (c. 388-89), describe the same ritual as standard in this great center of Eastern Greek-speaking Christianity. It is therefore clear that in the 3rd and 4th centuries over large parts at least of the Eastern church no special confirmation rite existed in Christian initiation.

How to assess this evidence and this situation is a difficult task. Too many aspects remain obscure and sufficient clear evidence to resolve all the issues involved simply is not available. All efforts at a total explanation have, for the moment at least, to remain tentative and speculative. But there is also evidence that this practice was not universal in the East and that it does not represent an inherited primitive tradition. There are indications that a change may have occurred at some early stage in the Eastern practice, at least in some areas, which involved the suppression of the distinct post-baptismal rite of the Spirit and the incorporation of the special pneumatological reference of Christian initiation either with the significance of the baptismal rite itself or, though less likely, the rite of pre-baptismal anointing. Such a development might have had its origin in the church's conflict with Gnostic sects, such as the Valentinians, and a consequent desire to radically distinguish its initiation practice from theirs. Involved here would have been a different understanding of the Spirit of God and the relation between the Spirit and the church. Involved also would have been a different and more Semitic concept of time, especially as relating to sacraments, from that which prevailed in Greco-Roman culture generally. But all efforts at historical reconstruction as of now must remain speculative.

What is certain is that from about the middle of the 4th century onwards a post-baptismal anointing appears in the Eastern initiation rite and gradually spreads. The earliest evidence comes from the mystagogical catecheses of St. Cyril of Jerusalem (bp c. 349-86) where this anointing is expressly presented as signifying reception of the Holy Spirit. This rite gradually became regular practice in the initiation ceremony of the Eastern or Byzantine church and remains so today. In sharp contrast, however, to the different development already under way in the Latin West, the Eastern church allowed priests to administer this confirmation rite [a chrismation] immediately after baptism, though always with chrism blessed by the bishop. The formula which accompanied the anointing was and is: "The seal of the gift of the Spirit." Eventually most of the other Eastern churches adopted this practice of the Byzantine church. This Eastern rite of confirmation (chrismation) has since remained unchanged and is still the regular practice today.

(b) Early Medieval Period. Just when the Eastern rite was becoming regular practice, a very different development was under way in the West. Here, from around the beginning of the 5th century, the conferring of confirmation gradually became separated from that of baptism and its attendant ceremonies. In its origins this development was purely practical and in no way involved any doctrinal or theological position. The situation which determined this development was the significant increase in the Christian population over the 4th century following the Peace of Constantine (313) and the consequent spread of organized Christian communities in the smaller towns and even into the countryside. In these circumstances it proved simply impossible to maintain the traditional practice of the one annual ceremony of initiation in the episcopal church at the Easter vigil presided over by the bishop who would himself have administered the confirmation rites. Instead, priests were now permitted to administer baptism and its ancillary rites in the outlying churches and later those baptized were expected to receive confirmation from the bishop either in the episcopal church or when the bishop was visiting the churches of his jurisdiction.

Two observations must be made concerning this development. First, in origin it was an attempt to maintain the unity of Christian initiation, and the role of the bishop in it is a very new situation which had caught the church somewhat by surprise. But, second, the development soon proved a rather theoretical solution. It did not work. In the context of the very disturbed situation throughout the Western empire from the 5th century on, the possibility of people from outlying districts visiting the episcopal church to receive confirmation or receiving a visit from their bishop in their own locale for that purpose proved very problematic. Though it was the intention of the church, declared again and again, that those requiring confirmation should receive it as soon as possible after baptism, the interval between baptism and the problematic confirmation varied immensely, with the tendency over the years for the time gap to increase. Meanwhile, however, it should be noted that Rome itself maintained the traditional unified ceremony of Christian initiation.

In many parts of the West from the 6th to the 8th century, especially in Gaul, the extant evidence suggests that episcopal confirmation disappeared altogether, the pneumatological reference of initiation, instead, being associated with the post-baptismal anointing performed by the priest at baptism. This practice, understandable in the circumstances, appears too similar to the Greek practice to be mere coincidence. The influence of Greek Christianity in many parts of the West at this period is well documented. But whatever may have been the practice in these areas at this period, the situation changed when Charlemagne came to power. Liturgical reform was a significant part of Charlemagne's program and he had a powerful ally here in the guiding hand of Alcuin. The reform consisted in restoring Roman practice in ritual matters. This led to the introduction of the Roman episcopal rite of confirmation throughout the West. The sacrament, however, was again administered in separation from baptism, and the old story of the lengthening interval began all over again.

(c) Central Medieval Period to Modern Times. From the 13th century onwards very little change occurs in the rite of confirmation. The traditional Roman rite prevails universally. Some minor regulations concerning details issue from Rome but nothing of any significance. The most discussed question concerns the essential rite of the sacrament: is it the general imposition of hand or the chrismation? It was the canonists especially who were forced to address this question. Basically, the question is a false one, introducing an "either/or" into something which really is a "both/and." But it had a practical application which concerned a candidate who, arriving late for the ceremony, missed the opening prayer and imposition but was able to proceed and receive the frontal chrismation. Official Roman observations on this question stated that the essential rite consisted of an imposition of hand by way of anointing. Though historically correct, this reply was in the circumstances something of a Delphic oracle untouched. General episcopal practice, when a particular case arose, tended to repeat the whole ceremony privately sub conditione.

The Second Vatican Council, in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, called for a revision of the church's sacramental rites. This task was taken in hand over the years after the council and revised rites for all the sacraments were eventually issued. The rite for confirmation appeared in 1971. The rite, however, contained little new. It was basically the historical Roman rite of confirmation again. The most significant change was in the formula accompanying the chrismation. This was changed from its unexpressive medieval form to: "Be sealed with the Gift of the Holy Spirit." This closely approached the corresponding formula in the Greek Orthodox church. The major innovations affecting the sacrament occurred not in the rite itself but rather in the accompanying directions of the Apostolic Constitution and the Introduction (Praenotanda). The following are the most important.

These documents declared that the essential rite of confirmation now is the chrismation. The initiation rite of imposition of hand, according to the Introduction (no. 9), "does not belong to the essence of the sacramental rite," though it hastens to add that it "contributes to the integral perfection of that rite and to a clearer understanding of the sacraments." This declaration settles, for the moment at least, the practical problem referred to earlier. But it achieves this only by interfering with the integrity of the historical Roman rite. This rite, as even a casual reading reveals, is one whole, a unity. It consists of a prayer for the gift of the (sevenfold) Spirit pronounced during the gesture of the bishop's upheld hands (imposition) over the general body of candidates followed by an individual application of this prayer and gesture which at Rome, at least from the time of Hippolytus, was performed by way of the frontal chrismation (Acts 8:14-17). By opting for the chrismation as the essential rite over against the opening prayer and gesture, the unity and integrity of the historical rite is interfered with. Some day, perhaps, it may be restored.

Another innovation concerns the age for confirmation, a topic which will be discussed later. The occasions on which priests are permitted to administer the sacrament are extended. But the most significant and influential development regarding confirmation in the new rites was the issuing of the R.C.I.A.. This document reintroduced the unified ceremony of Christian initiation, baptism, confirmation and eucharist, for adult converts and children of catechetical age. It thus restored to the church the concept and experience of the unity of baptism and confirmation as sacraments of initiation bringing about full membership in the church and leading to full participation in the eucharist where that membership is expressed and celebrated.

Theology of Confirmation

Theological understanding of the sacrament of confirmation over the centuries has been much influenced by the history and vicissitudes of the practice of the rite. Theological reflection on a sacrament usually reflects the form of its celebration at the particular time and place. This means that theological understanding of confirmation tends to follow and be determined by the complex history of the rite. The sacramental status of the rite, when and wherever it existed, was never in question. When the term sacrament began to be reserved for the seven special rites of the church (Peter Lombard, 12th century), confirmation was always one of the number, always named in second place after baptism. Eventually, the Council of Trent canonized this status by formal definition (1547).

In the early centuries the most significant theological comment on confirmation occurs in the catechetical and mystagogical instructions on Christian initiation. These instructions envisage the solemn unified rite of initiation at the Easter vigil. Here the significance of the rite is simply the pneumatological reference of Christian initiation, the gift of the Spirit of God. What this gift means is presented and illustrated biblically, especially from the gospel and NT story: the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at the Jordan; the power of the Spirit in the ministry of Jesus and his promise of the Spirit to his followers; the fulfilment of this promise at Pentecost and the work of the Spirit in the early church. This is the perspective of biblical salvation history. The presentation is very Lucan, relying heavily for its references on the 3rd gospel and Acts. Given this background, the concept of the Spirit here is very much that of the prophetic Spirit.

Later, as theological thought came to associate the work of the Spirit also with baptism (e.g., the blessing of the baptismal water) and as the two sacraments came to be separated in practice, a theory developed of two gifts of the Spirit in Christian initiation, one in baptism and a further in confirmation. St. Augustine, who was the first to express this view, had a particular influence here on later Latin theology. The notion of the two gifts provided the medieval commentators with a convenient theological framework for relating the Holy Spirit to both baptism and confirmation. But as confirmation was now separated from baptism by an interval of some years, it lost much of its initiation character and the particular gift of the Spirit which it confers was associated rather with a later state of life, especially as a strengthening (robur) for public profession of the faith.

Today, theological understanding of confirmation seeks to restore it again as an initiation sacrament intimately related to baptism. The R.C.I.A. has had a particular influence here. It also sees the "two gifts" framework as rather too convenient. The NT does not speak of two gifts of the Spirit but of one, however many aspects it may recognize in that one gift. Further, the NT emphasizes that the recipient of the Spirit is primarily and essentially the church itself. New converts receive the Spirit not as isolated individuals but by becoming members of the Spirit-filled community which the church is. It is clear that the theme of the Spirit in the church is a basic key to a true and developed theology of confirmation. But the emergence of such a theology must probably await the retrieval of an effective and vital pneumatology, which for so long has been conspicuous by its absence in Latin theology.

The Age for Confirmation

The Introduction to the new rite of 1971 (no. 11) reaffirmed the canonical position, as stated in the 1917 C.I.C., 788, that in the Latin church (Greek Uniate churches follow Greek practice) children are confirmed "about the seventh year." But it went on to state that "for pastoral reasons, episcopal conferences may choose an age which seems more appropriate, so that the sacrament is given at a more mature age after appropriate formation."

The revised C.I.C. (1983) summarizing this recent position, states it as follows: "The sacrament of Confirmation is to be conferred on the faithful at about the age of discretion unless the conference of bishops determines another age..." (891). In allowing this elasticity in the age for reception of confirmation, in the context of infant baptism, the document was but canonizing a practice which, though strictly uncanonical, had become general in the Western church in more recent times, where children were usually confirmed around the age of 12, some years after their first communion. Since then many countries and places have availed themselves of this permission and have postponed confirmation still further, into early and mid-teenage years. Many have remained undisturbed by this issue and have continued in the practice of confirming around twelve. Some have begun experimenting with a system of combining confirmation with first communion at the age of seven. Here once again then, confirmation has led to variety in practice. But the emergence of this issue has ensured that the question of the appropriate age for confirmation, in the context of infant baptism, is today a much discussed question. The issue does not concern unbaptized adults or children of catechetical age who, if seeking Christian initiation, are to be initiated according to the R.C.I.A..

The history of confirmation throws little light on this question concerning age. In the early centuries, when the unified rite of initiation prevailed, the question simply did not arise. Infants, children of all ages and adults were equally proper subjects for full Christian initiation. But even then exceptional circumstances could arise. A catechumen who fell seriously ill and was considered to be in danger of death (a frequent enough occurrence, one must presume, in ancient times), would have been baptized by a presbyter on his/her sick bed (hence the term "clinical" baptism), but later, if they recovered, they were expected to "complete" their baptism, i.e., to receive the other sacraments of initiation, confirmation and the eucharist, from the bishop. The later separation of baptism and confirmation in the Western church was, in many ways, but an extension of this practice to a new situation.

As confirmation came to be separated from baptism by a lengthening interval of years, the age of the sacrament was accordingly postponed. At first, this was a purely factual situation, with the church insisting officially and theoretically that confirmation be received as soon after baptism as possible. But, at least from the beginning of the 13th century on, a virtue was made of this fact by the introduction of the notion of "age of discretion" for confirmation and first communion. Though variously interpreted over the centuries, the age of twelve years was common in practice. The mind of the church had always been that confirmation should precede first communion. But here again practice varied greatly until the classic sequence was officially made normative by the Catechism of Trent (1566). From the middle of the 18th century, however, a practice developed and gradually spread in France whereby confirmation was postponed until after first communion. In the latter part of the 19th century this practice began to infiltrate other countries also. Then in 1910 St. Pius X decreed that children should receive first communion at the age of seven years, a practice which quickly became universal. The declaration, however, made no reference to confirmation, and the age for this sacrament remained unaltered at around twelve. So came about the sequence: baptism (infancy); first communion (c. 7 years); confirmation (c. 12 years). Meanwhile, paradoxically, this practice was strictly uncanonical, as the 1917 C.I.C. (788) made plain, a position reinforced later by a number of Roman replies. The practice, however, had by now become entrenched in most parts of the Latin church and could appeal to some form of contrary custom. The wider option allowed by the new rite has now reopened this whole question. In doing so it has led to its own variety in practice and to animated discussion.

The facts of history provide little assistance for deciding the question of the appropriate age for confirmation today. Practically every option can claim some support, at least, from the complex history of the sacrament. A decision on this question depends on many factors. The concrete, actual situation and local cultural conditions have to be given due weight. It may well be that different solutions may be advisable in different areas. But this question also remains fundamentally a theological question. It must basically be decided in the light of the meaning of confirmation as a sacrament of Christian initiation intimately linked to baptism. Whatever age is advocated for the reception of the sacrament in whatever particular situation or circumstances, the decision will always have to justify itself before this criterion.

CONFIRMATION, MINISTERS OF

According to the 1971 Rite of Confirmation (R.C.), it is the responsibility of the people of God to prepare the baptized for confirmation, and the pastor's obligation "to see that all the baptized come to the fullness of Christian initiation and are carefully prepared for confirmation" (R.C. 3). R.C. further delineates the roles and duties of those charged to prepare and support candidates for the sacrament, recognizes the different pastoral and catechetical needs of adults and children, and designates ministers for administering the sacrament in various pastoral situations. Laudably, R.C. and subsequent legislation extend the scope of ministerial roles beyond defensive Tridentine declarations on the ordinary minister of the sacrament. Similar to ongoing debates about the age of confirmands, suitable preparation, the proper sequence of confirmation and first communion, etc., discussions on the nature and duties of the expanded roles, including the proper minister of confirmation, reflect various perspectives on the ecclesial and pastoral dimensions of sacramental initiation.

As one of the "highest responsibilities of the people of God," it is incumbent upon the local church to welcome and encourage those seeking membership. The Spirit which moves individuals toward the sacraments, incorporating them into Christ and forming them into Christ's people, does not operate apart from the community. The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.) has demonstrated vividly that the heart of religious formation is the liturgy, from which the church's mission and ministries find their source and move into the larger arena of ecclesial life. While every believer may not undertake a specific catechetical or ministerial role, the worshipping assembly witnesses, prays and pledges support to candidates for initiation. In the actual celebration, members of the local church join parents, sponsors, friends and relatives, to share their common faith and elation (General Introduction to Christian Initiation, 7).

When preparing children and adolescents, parents exercise a pivotal role, for their influence and example precede any program. Parents minister to their children by their own growth in faith, participation in the Sunday eucharist, and supporting the catechetical efforts of the local parish. During the celebration of confirmation, parents may present their children to the presiding minister. More and more catechetical programs require parent participation (National Catechetical Directory, 119); professionals avoid pedantic approaches and attitudes. While parents can benefit from instruction on the sacraments, those responsible for catechesis solicit and include parents' hopes and concerns into the process of religious formation. Parents appreciate opportunities to learn from their peers how to share their faith with children. With the passing of many devotions, religious leaders can aid parents with finding ways to pray and observe the liturgical year within the home. The recently released Catholic Household Blessings and Prayers from the United States Catholic Conference equips families with a rich resource for mutual discovery.

Each candidate should have a sponsor who encourages the confirmand to witness the Christian life and fulfill one's Christian duties. A qualified sponsor is a confirmed Catholic, a worthy role model, neither under canonical penalty nor parent of the confirmand, and if possible, is the candidate's godparent (canons 874, 892, 893). R.C. acknowledges that the sponsor's role is conditioned by the age and situation of the confirmand. Parents have the most influence over small children, whereas adult candidates may require assistance from beyond the immediate family. Likewise, local customs and family traditions shape how the sponsor fulfills the role. In either case, the sponsor's role requires a commitment to the confirmed beyond an honorific or ceremonial function.

The catechist helps a person's faith to become "living, conscious, and active, through the light of instruction" (Christus Dominus, 14), a task greater than imparting information. Catechists assist in efforts to foster community spirit, and promote active, genuine participation in the worship of the church where the faithful are formed by and for prayer, and learn the creeds (General Catechetical Directory, 25). In cooperation with other ministers the catechists, themselves imbued with the word, assist candidates in the ongoing appropriation and conformation to that word.

The parish clergy exercise a unique role through their liturgical ministry, providing support and direction as required for the catechetical program, and through their participation in the discernment of each candidate's readiness for the sacraments. In consultation with catechists, sponsors, and parents, the pastor establishes parochial guidelines in accordance with church law and diocesan policy. Ultimately, the pastor determines which individuals are admitted to the sacraments, and which are delayed for want of adequate preparation or desire. Whenever possible, the clergy provide encouragement and pastoral care for the discouraged and hesitant (R.C.I.A. 13).

R.C. and the Code of Canon Law (C.I.C.) of 1983, in accord with their predecessors and pastoral practice in the western church, state that a bishop is the ordinary minister of confirmation (canon 882) "so there will be a clearer reference to the first pouring forth of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost" (R.C., 7). As the "chief stewards of the mysteries of God," bishops are responsible for the entire liturgical life of the churches committed to them (Christus Dominus, 15). It is most appropriate, therefore, that bishops preside at confirmation.

In large dioceses where the ordinary cannot preside at every celebration, he may designate fellow bishops, usually auxiliaries, to confirm (canon 884), a practice criticized for creating a "confirmation engine" out of auxiliary bishops whose primary task is substituting for the chief shepherd of the diocese. Parishioners tend to identify their pastor with the local bishop. The link between the parish and the ordinary becomes more opaque when administered by a bishop from outside the diocese. Others maintain that while the ordinary is the preferred minister, any bishop can adequately represent the episcopal office. Some have suggested that more dioceses be created, freeing the ordinary to preside, or that faculties be extended more liberally to presbyters, citing the example of the Eastern churches where the bishop is present vicariously through the blessed chrism. The law allows presbyteral confirmations, with restrictions extenuated by circumstance.

Pastors or any priest, of course, can confirm those in danger of death (canon 883,3°), and the law automatically gives faculties to presbyters in particular situations. Generally, the manner and sequence in which the church incorporates candidates prior to confirmation, i.e., infant baptism or adult initiation, determine the minister of the sacrament. When children are baptized as infants and brought through a conventional catechetical course, with reception of first communion preceding confirmation by several years, the bishop presides at confirmation. He may associate priests with himself to administer the sacrament for serious reason, e.g., large number of candidates, and priests should have a visible ecclesial connection, such as vicars, pastors, or priests involved in the catechetical preparation of the candidates (R.C., 8). While canon 884 allows the bishop to give the faculty to specified presbyters, frequency and scope of permission vary from place to place. In some frontier dioceses, the parochial pastor regularly confirms by local policy. Likewise, the faculty is extended within some dioceses and parishes where confirmation is not delayed beyond the age of discretion and immediately precedes first communion.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, which also applies to children of catechetical age and persons seeking membership from other ecclesial communities, preserves initiatory sequence and integrity. Ideally, the bishop would preside at the Easter vigil, baptize confirm, and welcome initiates to the eucharist. R.C.I.A. recognizes that on the vigil, episcopal presidency is limited to the cathedral, and thereby extends to presbyters the faculties to confirm in the following circumstances:

- (1) When a priest baptizes an adult or child of catechetical age, he confirms the same unless serious reasons require postponement (R.C.I.A., 14, 24).
- (2) Priests confirm when receiving a member of another Christian church (R.C.I.A., 481), except in the case of Orthodox Christians entering the Catholic church, when the rite of reception is discretionary and a simple profession of faith can suffice (R.C.I.A., 474, Orientalium Ecclesiarum, 25).
- (3) An adult, baptized as an infant in the Catholic church and having received no further catechetical instruction or sacramental participation, completes initiation into the church through the R.C.I.A., and is confirmed by the presiding priest, preferably at the Easter vigil (R.C.I.A., 409).
- (4) When a baptized, though not confirmed Catholic, has formally abandoned the Catholic church by joining another ecclesial community, that person is regarded as a baptized non-Catholic, and returns to the Catholic church through the Rite of Reception of Baptized Christians into full communion with the Catholic church. Hence, the priest who receives can confirm.

Pastors may request the faculty to confirm baptized adults who have been catechized and admitted to the eucharist at an earlier time. The law leaves this to the discretion of the ordinary (can. 884). Many parishes prefer to confirm these adults with candidates from the R.C.I.A. at the Easter vigil, rather than placing them in line with children and adolescents when the bishop makes the rounds. In some dioceses, the faculty is freely given, while others are quite restrictive.

The laws stipulating who confirms, with their interpretations and exceptions, are akin to discussions on the substance and functions of the other ministries associated with initiation. At the heart of each canon is an ecclesiology. Recognition and sanction of expanded ministries do not in themselves define the nature of the church. Rather, ministries evolve out of the church's apostolic mission. Questions about who does what, and how ministry is enacted, become more lucid as the church heeds the dominical mandate. In so doing, the church discloses its very nature and its head.

CONFIRMATION, PREPARATION FOR

Prior to and following the promulgation of the reformed Rite of Confirmation (R.C.) in 1971, religious educators, clergy, and theologians have struggled with the theology of the sacrament and means of effective catechesis. The apostolic constitution, Divinae Consortium Naturae, presupposes that confirmation, even when conferred apart from baptism, follows the ancient initiatory sequence and precedes the reception of first communion. R.C. provides, for pastoral reasons, an option to confirm at a time later than the age of discretion to impart "appropriate formation at a more mature age." While not linking delay to maturity, canon 891 permits episcopal conferences to determine the age of confirmation for those baptized as infants, and authorizes confirmation at any age for those in danger of death. To date, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops has not stipulated an age, allowing local ordinaries to do so in their dioceses. In addition, many religious educators have urged that confirmation be delayed until the high school years. Consequently, the vast majority of candidates for the sacrament are adolescents who were baptized as infants and received first communion in early childhood.

One pastoral-catechetical rationale for delaying confirmation maintains that youth, not small children, are capable of making a more informed, mature, and personal commitment to Christ and the church. Preparation programs may incorporate a service requirement to witness to one's faith, and candidates' progress may be marked by liturgical celebrations with roots in other rites, e.g., a declaration of candidacy similar to students preparing for holy orders, an election ceremony modeled on the milestone for catechumens in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.). Those charged with preparation perceive their roles as facilitators and companions; the environment for catechesis frequently includes dialogue within small groups of candidates. The sacramental theology behind delay stresses the anthropological nature of sacraments and their identity with rites of passage, as well as the candidate's personal expression of faith.

Another approach accentuates the teaching of doctrine; the longer the period between reception of first communion and confirmation, the greater the opportunity for intensive, if not remedial education. The pedagogy is more magisterial, the setting a classroom. Various parties who argue for delay differ on the content and delivery of catechesis, but all perceive adolescence as a critical time for religious formation.

Delay, however, generates a dilemma for the theology of confirmation celebrated years after first communion, and the appropriate catechesis for youth who typically question authority and pedagogical structures. Confirmation often is depicted as a rite a passage, a maturity sacrament, the "completion" of initiation; each explanation lacks compelling justification in tradition, and inadvertently suggests that infant baptism is deficient, and/or confirmation is somehow more significant than eucharist. Rather than ritualizing entrance into Christian corporate life, the sacrament becomes a recognition or reward for individual achievement. Likewise, while confirmation may be delayed to prolong programs of religious education, postponement does not effectively retain the majority in active church membership for the duration of their youth.

The same pastoral concern which spurs the delay of confirmation has motivated others to reinstate confirmation prior to first communion. A handful of dioceses and parishes in the United States and abroad have established guidelines for catechetical programs preparing any baptized Catholic of the age of discretion, and with appropriate formation, for confirmation prior to first communion. Typically, the candidates range from seven to nine years old. In most instances, the bishop or his designate confirms the candidates within the context of the Mass. Following the seal of confirmation, the confirmati are admitted to the eucharist. Like the sequence in the R.C.I.A., subsequent formation concentrates on the effects of sacramental initiation and responsibilities of full stature within the church, i.e., it is mystagogical, an extended period of post-initiation catechesis through childhood, adolescence and beyond, to further embrace the mystery into which one has been incorporated. Proponents of this order cite the experience of the R.C.I.A., in which all three sacraments are conferred in the traditional order of baptism, confirmation, eucharist, and the initiatory process which identifies these sacraments with entrance into ecclesial life, not completion of a curriculum.

Bestowing confirmation before first communion relieves some of the theological and catechetical difficulties resulting from delay. When confirmation is restored as the link between font and table, pastors, parents, and religious educators need not manufacture theologies apart from confirmation's liturgical and ecclesial significance. What baptism begins and eucharist sustains is bridged by a sealing of sacred chrism in the assembly. Rather than being associated with rewards for personal achievement or graduation exercises from religious education, confirmation's ecclesial dimension comes to fore, i.e., disclosing a gift of God for the edification of the church. In addition, confirmation is freed from a nexus with rites of passage found in some civil and religious ceremonies, and the frequent commercialism accompanying the same.

Proponents of this sequence relinquish a degree of control over the religious education process. After initiation, students are not compelled to attend classes by want of a sacrament. When confirmation is no longer the culmination of religious education, parents, pastors, and catechists must formulate new strategies in their pastoral and catechetical response to the needs of youth. Preliminary evidence indicates that attrition is minimal-to-nil in American parishes which have adopted the confirmation-prior-to-first communion progression. Success is attributed to involving parents throughout the process and redirecting energies toward comprehensive youth ministry, additional opportunities for spiritual and doctrinal formation, and liturgical celebrations marking rites of passage, such as baccalaureate Masses, and spiritual growth or awakening, e.g., solemn communions, penance services, induction into liturgical and social ministries. In short, successful formation employs many of the worthy components found in some confirmation programs for adolescents, minus associations which, it is argued, confound the significance of the sacrament.

Catechesis for Confirmation

Whenever candidates are prepared for confirmation, the catechesis includes common ingredients, adapted for the age and abilities of the candidates. The guidelines for the Archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis provide an exemplary model for catechetical content.

These elements constitute a worship-based catechesis and extend to the theology and responsibilities which follow entrance into the church. In accord with the vinculum of lex orandi, lex credendi, doctrine and discipline arise out of participation in worship, the cycle of the liturgical year, devotions, and personal prayer. Preparation for first communion, or the study of baptism and other sacraments, would include a similar list, teaching from those elements proper to the specific sacrament. While this schema does not simulate some of the more conventional content of catechetical curricula, each element can introduce the church's systematic reflection and doctrine. Ritual and lectionary become the primary texts for catechesis. Also, young people who do not frequent the liturgy develop an interest in and see the relationship between catechesis and worship.

Like the catechumenate, the method of catechesis begins with study of the lections proclaimed in the Sunday assembly. Whether child or adult, the candidate can deliberate on one's personal experience, and begin to objectify and verbalize that experience in encounter with the divine presence disclosed through word, sacrament, and assembly. Clearly this method requires directed discussion in a setting which promotes sharing one's experience without fear of judgment.

In articulating the faith tradition, the catechist invites the candidates to weigh that tradition with their own history, encourages them to appropriate for themselves the vision and faith of the church, and assists them in finding ways to express and act upon their faith. Service projects can be the vehicle for witness, and become an integral component of formation prior to any preparation dedicated to confirmation.

Catechesis which begins with the rite of confirmation and all its elements can bypass some of the adiaphora which sap energies and obscure the meaning of the sacrament, e.g., wearing stoles and taking a new name. Confirmation is not ordination, and one's baptismal name has sufficient dignity to last a lifetime.

The state of flux regarding the age and order of sacraments, and appropriate formation, reflects various theologies of the sacrament and how these theologies address the pastoral and catechetical responsibilities of the church for its children and adolescents. Whether our understanding of confirmation will converge remains unknown. If the R.C.I.A. becomes, as mandated, the normative means of adult initiation, its sequence and methods of catechesis will impact the praxis of confirmation for those baptized prior to the age of discretion.

CONFIRMATION, THEOLOGY OF

It has been said, and quite correctly, that confirmation is a rite in search of a theology. It might be more correctly stated that there are several forms of confirmation, each in search of a theology (Quinn, p. 325).

1. The first is the post-baptismal conclusion to baptism, historically associated with the bishop, especially in Roman practice, and leading to eucharistic fellowship. If not originally, then by the late 4th or early 5th century in the West the episcopal rite was associated with a specific giving of the Holy Spirit by the bishop through handlaying and/or chrismation. In the contemporary R.C.I.A. the former exclusively episcopal conclusion to baptism is called confirmation and consists of a twofold action, the imposition of hands with prayer for the Holy Spirit and a consignation with chrism on the forehead with a formula indicating reception of that Spirit and identified in the Apostolic Constitution of Paul VI as being a "laying on of hand" (O.C., Apost. Const.).

2. A later rite, rooted in (a) the 5th century Gallican practice of having the bishop ratify baptisms over which he had not presided and in the (b) peculiar Roman practice of adding an episcopal chrismation to the prayer with handlaying. The separation of the episcopal rite from the baptismal rites created the need to explain and to justify "confirmation." The theology of this rite, which became the medieval sacrament of confirmation, reached its fullest development in the Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas. This same theology, with a more emphatic focus on the Holy Spirit's role, is that of the contemporary rite of confirmation (O.C., Apost. Const.).

3. The 16th century Reformers, in repudiating the medieval sacrament of confirmation, created their own version, a rite which concluded catechism study with the personal affirmation of the baptismal covenant and admitted the candidate to eucharistic fellowship. Today the Reformation rite has been transformed by American Lutherans and Episcopalians into a series of affirmation rites, one of which is still called confirmation, which allow candidates to affirm their faith at different points in their post-baptismal journey.

In the following pages the sources of confirmation theology will be presented and the received theology examined. Since scholastic theologians would use such sources uncritically and out of context it should be noted that we are not intending to present a development of the theology of confirmation as if it were entirely consistent with and completely applicable to contemporary praxis.

The Post-baptismal Conclusion to Baptism

Scripture. The NT is a witness to the importance of baptismal initiation but demonstrates neither a clear nor a consistent picture of the rite or rites which make it up. Instead, the scriptures focus on faith and baptism as the means whereby we share in the salvation won for us by Jesus Christ (Mk 16:15-16; cf. Mt 28:19). The baptism of Jesus in the Jordan seems to provide the paradigm for Christian baptism. Since the special features of that baptism, the overshadowing of Jesus and the voice of God testifying to his divine Sonship, along with the descent of the Spirit in the form of a dove, appear to be separate from the Johannine baptism itself (Mk 1:9-11; cf. Mt 3:13-17, Lk 3:21-22, Jn 1:29-34), some find here the origin of a twofold baptismal pattern. They find corroboration in the Acts of the Apostles where there is evidence of a separation between water baptism and the giving of the (ecstatic) Spirit, generally through a post-baptismal, apostolic laying on of hands. In fact, Acts 8:14-17, in which the apostles Peter and John complete the baptism of the Samaritans, who were earlier converted and baptized by Philip with the granting of the Spirit through an imposition of hands, will early on be used as a proof text, identifying the post-baptismal episcopal action with that of the apostles in Acts. If these scriptural citations do testify to a complex baptismal ritual in the synoptics and Acts, the same cannot be said for Paul or John where all is complete in the baptism itself. Such differences have been explained in terms of a difference in the theologies of the Spirit in the NT, that of Luke being a more primitive view of the Holy Spirit as an external, prophetic force, not connected in any way to baptism with its forgiveness of sins, and those of Paul and John being more advanced views of the Spirit as personal and as the very agent of baptism as well as, especially in John, a permanent possession of the baptized. Contrary to Acts, for example, one is born of water and Spirit in John 3:5 (Marsh, pp. 43-101).

The Acts of the Apostles, according to scholars such as Marsh, foreshadows the complex Western baptismal rites of the late 2nd century, witnessed to by Tertullian and the Apostolic Tradition. The model for these later rites is the twofold baptismal pattern discovered in Acts. This pattern is rooted in the Lucan belief that baptism in water is for the forgiveness of sins, while the post-baptismal handlaying signifies the bestowal of that prophetic Spirit which returns to Israel first in Jesus' baptism in the Jordan, where the overshadowing is called an anointing (Lk 4:18; Acts 10:38), comes to the church, the new Israel, at Pentecost (Acts 2:1-4), and is given to each individual Christian in baptism (Acts 2:17, 38). Although at a later period the more profound Pauline and Johannine theology of the Holy Spirit would govern Christian teaching, the pattern for baptism would already have been set in place.

It may be questioned, however, whether the evangelists' recording of Jesus' baptism in the Jordan testifies so much to a twofold ritual action as it does to the need to make clear the difference between John's baptism and Christian baptism, the latter being related to the Holy Spirit. Thus, there would be a distancing from the actual baptism of John to indicate that his followers of Christ would receive a baptism of divine adoption, accomplished through the work of the Holy Spirit. Furthermore, in Acts one can certainly question whether the need to promote the apostles' authority in matters baptismal is testimony to a common ritual practice in Luke's church. Nevertheless, Acts 8 did become a "proof text" for the medieval sacrament of confirmation.

Other NT passages concerning anointing and sealing will also be applied to confirmation (e.g., 2 Cor 1:21; Eph 1:13). What is overlooked is that these passages refer more directly to baptism itself as the seal of the Spirit and to the work of the Holy Spirit in baptism itself as an anointing. Actual post-baptismal anointing will become a ritual reality in the second century, but in its first appearance the anointing will be messianic in character, both in East and West (Winkler, pp. 24-25; Kavanagh, p. 41).

The Early Church: Tertullian and Apostolic Tradition. Tertullian (c. 160-c. 225) dedicated an entire treatise to baptismal initiation (De Baptismo). He was the first to speak of a post-baptismal anointing, founded on Aaron's anointing by Moses and a symbol of Christ's messianic anointing by God (De Bap. 7). Thus, the first evidence of anointing is that which testifies to the neophytes' participation in Christ's royal priesthood and which is clearly connected with the baptism itself. As noted above this anointing is found in both East and West though not necessarily always at the same place in the baptismal ritual.

Tertullian also witnesses to a handlaying which, with its blessing, is a prayer for the Spirit. The author relates this handlaying to the overshadowing of Christ at the Jordan as well as to the blessing Jacob gave to his grandsons, Ephraim and Manasseh (De Bap. 8). Elsewhere, Tertullian describes the handlaying as an illumination of the soul by the Holy Spirit ("The flesh is overshadowed by the imposition of hand so that the soul might be illuminated by the Spirit" (De carnis res. 8). It should also be noted that this North African writer is a clear witness to the fact that eucharist concludes baptismal initiation.

Some have assumed that Tertullian's description of post-baptismal handlaying is equivalent to the post-baptismal episcopal rites found in Apostolic Tradition 21. In this document, however, there is an important addition: a second post-baptismal anointing following the episcopal handlaying prayer. Why such an addition? It would seem to arise from the fact that baptism with its messianic anointing was performed by presbyters and deacons out of view of the assembly since the candidates for baptism were naked; the bishop remained with the assembly. The bishop completed the baptisms by adding to the presbyteral anointing of the body an anointing of the head, at the time he received the newly baptized with handlaying and prayer. This double anointing, found here for the first time, will become a standard part of baptismal praxis in the Roman church, and each of the anointings will acquire a different meaning. In other words, two independent rites of anointing or consecration will evolve from this more primitive 3rd century rite, the first a presbyteral anointing related to the water bath, the second an episcopal anointing related to the imposition of hand with prayer. The second anointing will affect Western, non-Roman baptismal practice beginning in the 5th century (C. of Orange, 8 Nov. 441, c. 2); at least by the 9th century the Roman pattern will become the ordinary baptismal pattern in much of western Europe.

Apostolic Tradition 21 provides the prayer to be used with the bishop's handlaying. Is this particular rite the same as that in Tertullian, which has an explicitly pneumatic character? Does this baptism along with handlaying and its prayer correspond to the twofold ritual supposedly encountered in Acts? This is clearly the opinion of one author who finds in Tertullian and Apost. Trad. 21 the connecting link between the Spirit rite in Acts and future confirmation (Marsh, pp. 124-127). Others insist that to come to such a conclusion is to read too much into the sparse evidence at hand. Furthermore, from the point of view of ritual structure, one author believes that the episcopal rites of Apos. Trad. 21 are nothing more than a particularly solemn form of liturgical dismissal rites, in which the worshippers come under the bishop's hand for a blessing dismissing them from the service. As the conclusion to baptism the dismissal is more complicated, since it combines both the bishop's anointing, a ratification of the baptisms done at his behest by deacons and presbyters, with a conclusion to the entire initiation process which in effect is a dismissal of the newly baptized to their first eucharistic assembly (Kavanagh, pp. 41-52).

Corroborating evidence that the episcopal rites are simply a primitive missa might possibly be found in the prayer accompanying the handlaying. The Verona Latin text of this prayer reads: "Lord God you have made them worthy to receive remission of sins through the laver of regeneration of the Holy Spirit; send upon them your grace, that they may serve you according to your will, for to you is glory, etc." Writers have assumed that the scribe dropped a line from this prayer. Basing themselves on the later versions of the prayer they have added an explicit invocation begging God to send the Holy Spirit upon the baptized (e.g., the editor of the "reconstituted" text of Apostolic Tradition, Bernard Botte). But is this the case? Is not the prayer perfectly intelligible in itself and entirely consistent with the episcopal rite if the latter is a dismissal rite rather than a new element in baptismal initiation? Thus, while the ritual genesis of what would become confirmation is found in Apost. Trad. 21, with its prayer and handlaying and unique second post-baptismal anointing, the interpretation of those episcopal actions continues to be in contention.

Innocent I, the Holy Spirit, and the Episcopal Post-baptismal Rite. However Apostolic Tradition's episcopal rites are currently interpreted, there seems to be no doubt that the ritual pattern found there evolved into the more complex rites of the later Roman sacramentaries. Even before this a letter of Innocent I to Decentius of Gubbio (416) already witnesses to the double post-baptismal anointing of Apost. Trad. becoming two entirely independent ritual actions and to the post-baptismal episcopal action receiving a clearly pneumatic interpretation. Moreover, the actions of the bishops are identified with the apostolic handlaying in Acts 8. From now on, according to Innocent, the presbyteral, messianic anointing is only to be given on the crown of the head while the episcopal anointing is to be given on the forehead (Ep. ad Decentium, P.L., 20:554B). In either case the oil to be used is perfumed oil, chrism, which becomes an important liturgical symbol of the Holy Spirit in the late 4th century.

Question has been raised to which rite Innocent specifically refers as giving the Holy Spirit, handlaying or episcopal consignation with chrism. Some prefer the latter and so translate phrases of Innocent's letter as follows: "The right of bishops alone to seal and to deliver the Paraclete . . . and even then they (presbyters) are not to sign the brow with that oil, for this is reserved to bishops alone when they deliver the Paraclete" (Whitaker, pp. 229-230). Or is the pneumatic rite that of handlaying, which would better correspond to the association of the bishops' actions with those of the apostles in Acts 8? In this case the same phrases have been translated as follows: "This pontifical rank belongs to bishops only, so that, when they seal or when they give (ut vel consignent, vel tradant) the Paraclete Spirit . . . and even then they are not to sign the forehead with that same oil, for this is reserved to bishops alone, at the time (solis debetur episcopis, cum tradunt) that they deliver the Paraclete Spirit" Lier, . . . 40-41).

Even if this latter interpretation is correct, there is no doubt that the episcopal consignation is closely bound up with handlaying because of the peculiar character of the Roman rite, that is, the double post-baptismal chrismation. The reservation of the signing of the forehead to the bishop gave sacramental force to chrismation because it was associated with episcopal handlaying. Future theology would focus on anointing and, in fact, Roman liturgical books, such as the Gelasian Sacramentary, would designate the entire episcopal rite of handlaying with prayer and anointing with chrism as a rite of consignation, Ad consignandum (Reg. 316, no. 450).

The need to give a pneumatic focus to some element in the baptismal complex, both East and West, could be because of the 4th and 5th century battles over the divinity of the Holy Spirit. In the East in particular the chrism was identified with the Holy Spirit (Ligier, pp. 157-161) and the messianic anointing rite received a strong pneumatic emphasis. In the West it may well have been that a rite associated with the bishop—and his handlaying—received the same emphasis. Also, it is clear from Innocent's letter that he is establishing a particular episcopal practice, one not to be shared with presbyters; he may well be upholding the rights of bishops with regard to the post-baptismal rites by giving them a close connection to the apostles' handlaying in Acts 8 (Kavanagh, pp. 61-64). One could ask, however, whether such an identification with the apostles' handlaying might not argue more for Innocent's thinking of episcopal handlaying as delivering the Spirit rather than simply the episcopal anointing.

Oddly enough, in the later Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries, as well as in all Roman Pontificals down to the period of Vatican II, it is only the prayer accompanying the handlaying which gives expression to the pneumatic character of the rite described by Innocent I; the now thoroughly pneumatized prayer includes both the Johannine language of rebirth (Jn 3:5) and the Johannine title of Paraclete, as well as the Isaian sevenfold gifts of the Holy Spirit (Reg. 316, par. 451). By contrast the chrismation formula in the West never specified the role of the Holy Spirit. It is only in the epiclesis prayer during handlaying that we have a clear idea of the pneumatic character of the rite. The episcopal consignation in the Gelasian Sacramentary is chistic, that in later sacramentaries and pontificals is trinitarian. Perhaps it is only because of the classic prayer for the sevenfold Spirit that one can determine what individual chrismation is about. Both handlaying with its prayer for the sevenfold, prophetic Spirit, and the signing of the forehead with chrism, should have been necessary for a theology of "confirmation." Instead, later theologians tended to focus only on the anointing.

Confirmation

The First Appearance of "Confirmation" in Southeast Gaul. Confirmation as a word for the post-baptismal episcopal intervention comes from the region of southeast Gaul, not Rome. At first it does not have the particular theological connotation of "strengthening," as it later will. Rather, its immediate reference is to a bishop's personal involvement in a baptism over which he has not presided. In other words, the baptism preceded his "confirming" the neophytes by a longer or shorter period and was done by others. This use of the term confirmation is first encountered in the mid-fifth century (Council of Riez, 18 November 439, canon 3, confirmare neophytos; Council of Orange, 8 November 441, canon 2, in confirmatione).

The non-availability of bishops to those desiring baptism was a problem, especially in the rural areas of southeast Gaul where there was an increase of Christians in the 5th century. Later, the same non-availability seems to have spread to the cities. "Confirmation" does not at first so much refer to a specific rite as to the personal involvement of the bishop himself with those being "confirmed." It might be said then that the genesis of the later sacrament of confirmation is found in the separation of the bishop from the baptisms over which he would normally exercise oversight. He, in effect, approves the baptisms celebrated by those other than himself. Whether this also meant that several of the post-baptismal rites which he was normally associated with in Rome, such as imposition of hand and prayer, would have been dropped from baptism, or were even originally part of Gallican baptism, is controverted. Some claim that the rites the bishop performed "in confirmatione" had not been part of ordinary baptismal practice in Gaul, since they are not found in any of the later Gallican sacramentaries (Winkler, 12-13, Kavanagh, 66). Others feel that Gaul had rites similar to those found in Tertullian in North Africa, where there was a post-baptismal handlaying and prayer for the Holy Spirit.

With the separation of the bishop from baptism and the subsequent insistence that those not baptized by their bishop needed to come to him to have themselves "confirmed," there was the need to explain why such an action was necessary. Clear indication of this is found in a homily of a bishop from the same region, Faustus of Riez, who, between about 450 and 470, preached on a Pentecost Sunday in answer to the peoples' question: "After the mystery of baptism what good can the ministry of the one confirming do me?" (Homilia de Pentecosten). Faustus' efforts to convince his people to come to the bishop to have their baptisms completed or "confirmed" would not be particularly important except for the fact that portions of his sermon became the sources for the medieval theology of the sacrament of confirmation, being passed on by way of the Ps. Isidorean Decretals and later canonical collections as the words of two popes, Urban and Melchiades. As the statements of important Roman figures rather than those of the minor, and semi-Pelagian, bishop of Riez, the sermon of Faustus acquired a theological and doctrinal import which, in reality, it never had. To Faustus we owe that medieval theology of the sacrament of confirmation which centers on the concept of the strengthening of the baptized. Faustus preached that confirmation was necessary for those who survived infancy and, consequently, had to live in a world filled with trouble and strife. Confirmation equipped them with arms for battle. The Holy Spirit given in confirmation protected those regenerated in Christ by providing them with a growth in grace (augmentum ad gratiam). Parenthetically, we might note that, even with the connection of the Spirit to the action of confirming by the bishop, Faustus speaks of a twofold descent of that Spirit, one at baptism, in the blessing of the water, and the other with the bishop's handlaying and prayer for the sevenfold Spirit. Even before Faustus, of course, in the writing of Tertullian, we find this same need to try to make explicit the time(s) when the Spirit descends upon the water or the candidate (De bap. 6-8).

By confirmation, then, the baptized are strengthened and "confirmed for battle." Faustus gave a twist to the meaning of confirmation which determined the future direction of confirmation theology: confirmation equals strengthening (robur). The rite which accomplished this strengthening was the imposition of hand with prayer for the Spirit; there is no mention of a second anointing, although it would seem that the Roman practice was known, and disapproved of, in this region (cf. C. of Orange, c. 2). Thus, the medieval theology of confirmation was influenced by, and dependent upon, the efforts of a bishop to encourage his people to be confirmed; such an explanation was necessitated by reason of the separation, for whatever reason, of the bishop from baptismal initiation. Also, the giving of the Holy Spirit was clearly identified with the action of the bishop, even as it was in the letter of Innocent I. In Faustus' sermon, of course, the Holy Spirit is given for a specific purpose, i.e., for strength and fortitude to live in an unfriendly world.

Later Gallican contributions to the future theology of the medieval sacrament of confirmation appear in the writings of Alcuin (Letter to Oduin, Ep. 134, [A.D. 798]) and Rabanus Maurus (De Clericorum Institutione 30, [ca. A.D. 819]). Alcuin bases part of his description on the Roman author John the Deacon's "Letter to Senarius" (6th C.). But part of his description reports Gallican practice. For example, baptism is concluded by "confirmation with bread and cup." Only at a later date is there the imposition of the bishop's hand through which the baptized receive the "Spirit of sevenfold grace in order to be strengthened by the Holy Spirit to preach to others." It might be noted that with the military conquests and the baptismal policy of Charlemagne the late 8th century was faced, for a brief moment, with a new phenomenon—a number of adult baptisms.

Rabanus Maurus quotes directly from Alcuin and adds something new, an explanation of what might be a recent addition to the bishop's rite, a second post-baptismal anointing, modelled on Roman practice. Could it be the Roman episcopal practice is just entering into Gallican initiation rites? The pattern would already have been known in that region because of the Roman books which had earlier been imported into France and copied, such as the Gelasian Sacramentary. At any rate, basing himself on Augustine (Sermon 265.7) Rabanus claims that there are two gifts of the Holy Spirit represented by the two anointings, one a resurrection gift, the other a Pentecost gift. The second anointing on the forehead, performed by the bishop as Innocent I had insisted several centuries before, is related to the imposition of the bishop's hand by an explanation which clearly is in accord with Alcuin's concept of the meaning of handlaying: "By grace thus comforted the[anointed] bear themselves intrepidly and audaciously before the rulers of this world and preach the name of Christ with free voice." It should be noted that neither Alcuin nor Rabanus speak of the post-baptismal episcopal actions as confirmation. But it would not take a genius to connect the idea of strengthening to preach with the Faustian notion of strengthening for life's battles.

The only use of the word confirmation in authentic Roman documents is the "confirmation" of the bread with the cup of consecrated wine (e.g., cf. Ordo Romanus I). When used of the postbaptismal episcopal practice in supposedly Roman texts, it is a good guess that this might be due to the re-editing of the documents outside of the city of Rome. For example, in Ordo Romanus XI the word confirmation appears twice with regard to the final rites of baptism, once for the bishop's prayer for the Holy Spirit and once as a warning that such rites are necessary to "confirm" baptism with the name of Christianity (O.R. XI, 96-104).

Scholastic Theology and the Sacrament of Confirmation. By the end of the first millennium the episcopal conclusion to baptism was so elaborated in liturgical books such as the mid-tenth century Romano-Germanic Pontifical that it seemed quite independent of baptism. This independence was further enhanced by the addition of a prayer identifying the activity of the bishops with the apostles in Acts 8 (R.G.P., 99:388).

Along with this greater independence

there were, as we have seen, witnesses to confirmation's meaning sufficient enough to provide the bricks and mortar for the medieval and scholastic theology of the sacrament of confirmation. Such witnesses found their way into the mainstream of medieval European theology through inclusion in a number of canonical collections. Thus, parts of Faustus' sermon were provided with the names of two popes, Urban and Melchiades. Alcuin's explanation of the bishop's action, filtered through Rabanus and with his additional comments about the second post-baptismal anointing, became part of the common heritage of Western theology, and testified to a connection between confirmation and preaching as well as to a double bestowal of the Spirit, one paschal and one pentecostal. Demands for fasting and penance before confirmation as well as warnings against its reiteration were also included in the canonical collections. One canon, attributed to Ps. Melchiades, though from the hand of an author other than Faustus, claimed the superiority of imposition of hand to baptism because of the individual granting it, i.e., the bishop.

With independent rite and authoritative witnesses, medieval theologians were able to declare confirmation one of the seven sacraments. What these scholastics experienced was an episcopal action, performed but once, sufficiently distinct from baptism, and interpreted as a giving of the Holy Spirit for strengthening, especially for strengthening to preach. The rite had its own name, confirmation, found both in the statements of pseudonymous popes (= Faustus) as well as in Gallicanized Roman liturgical texts.

Despite some attention to handlaying and prayer, the most important element in the sacrament was clearly consignation with chrism, with its quite unremarkable and certainly non-pneumatic formula of administration. This rite formed the sacramentum tantum. One reason the ancient prayer for the sevenfold Spirit had such little impact on the medievals may well have been because of the growing concentration on strengthening as fortitude rather than as gift of the Spirit. An important witness to this change in direction is William of Auvergne (1180-1249), who claimed that the Holy Spirit was not given in confirmation, since it had already been given in baptism. The prayer was simply for the praise and glory of the Holy Spirit. Confirmation, both in form and name, implied the gift or virtue of fortitude, a strengthening against the irascible appetites for the purpose of fearlessly professing Christ's name (Tractate on the Sacraments). Thus, the determined grace effect (the res or reality signified), distinct from baptism and earlier identified with the reception of the fullness of the Holy Spirit, was based on the key concept of Faustus, that confirmation is a strengthening, a robur. As this idea dominated theological thought, the bestowal of the Spirit receded into the background and a growth model of sacramental grace claimed attention, baptism being related to first birth and the grace of regeneration, confirmation to growth and an increase of grace. It should also be added that since grace was so christologically conceived the role of the Holy Spirit would also tend to be diminished.

Like baptism, confirmation was not repeated. Consequently, it was thought to have its own character (res et sacramentum). There was disagreement, however, over how it differed from that of baptism. Concerning the institution of the sacrament there were a number of opinions: confirmation was either directly instituted by Christ, or by the apostles (Acts 8), or, later, by the church at the Council of Meaux (9th century)! One problem with institution was the emphasis in the scriptures on the handlaying of the apostles and the emphasis in medieval theology on chrismation. The need to harmonize these two different practices (assuming, of course, that the sacrament of confirmation is in any authentic sense related to apostles' actions) continues until this day (cf. the Apost. Const. in the O.C.).

Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274) provided the definitive medieval theology of the sacrament of confirmation, especially in his last work, the Summa Theologiae (3.72). The concepts of spiritual strength and maturity dominate his thinking: as baptism relates to birth, confirmation pertains to growth, and eucharist to spiritual nourishment. Thus, the Faustian concept of confirmation as strengthening is fundamental to Thomas' ideas about sacraments and spiritual growth (S.Th.3.72.1c). Such comparisons between the physical and spiritual realms are, of course, analogical. In other words, spiritual maturity is somewhat like physical maturity. As Thomas notes, if they were the same then children and women would not need the sacrament since in real life they do not need to be strengthened for combat (S.Th.8)!

Christ instituted the sacrament (S.Th. 72.1.ad 1), although, since the Spirit could not be granted until after Jesus' resurrection and ascension, he did so by way of promising the Spirit rather than clearly manifesting it (Jn 7:39; 16:7). Ignoring handlaying with its prayer, Thomas focused on chrism as the matter of the sacrament, using Ps. Dionysius (72.2 & 3) as his authority. Chrism, always consecrated by the bishop, symbolized the fullness of the Holy Spirit, a strengthening necessary for (spiritual) maturity. Oil signified the grace of the Spirit and the perfume the good odor of Christ diffused to others.

The form of the sacrament was that which was in existence in his day: "I sign you with the sign of the cross and confirm you with the chrism of salvation in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit" (72.4). As with other scholastics, in this non-pneumatic formula Thomas discerned the cause of the sacrament (the Trinity), the spiritual effect (strength = "confirm"), and the sign which was given to the spiritual soldier of Christ (cross). Form and matter, the actual signing of the forehead with chrism using the prescribed words, made up the sacrament of confirmation (IV Sent. 4.7.1.2.3 ad 2).

Confirmation conferred a character separate from that of baptism. For Thomas character was a deputation, a certain spiritual power ordered to sacred actions, that is, a consecration for worship. Whereas the character of baptism was related to personal salvation, that of confirmation pertained to the spiritual battle against enemies of the faith. While baptism gave one the power to confess Christ by receiving the other sacraments, confirmation provided a quasi ex officio power to profess one's faith in words. Here we see a combination of Faustus and Alcuin/Rabanus. The idea of a kind of ex officio deputation to confess Christ would lead, in the 20th century, to such aberrant interpretations of confirmation as a sacrament of catholic action or as a sacrament for the ordination of the laity.

The specific grace of confirmation was an increase of grace for strength (an augmentum gratiae rather than, as Faustus phrased it, an augmentum ad gratiam). Since this strengthening perfected baptism by making each of the baptized into a temple of the Holy Spirit, it was only fitting that the bishop alone be the minister of confirmation (3.11).

In sum, it can be said that Thomas' writing on confirmation is filled with images of growth and strengthening and public confession of the faith. The Angelic Doctor is radically indebted to a writer we now know as a minor 5th century, semi-Pelagian bishop, Faustus of Riez, as well as to a few other churchmen, such as Alcuin/Rabanus. With the emphasis on an increase of grace for growth, of strengthening for battle, and of audaciously preaching the faith, the Holy Spirit's role, though not absent in Thomas, is considerably downplayed. And except for the fact that the traditional order of the sacraments of initiation is maintained—baptism, confirmation, eucharist—confirmation plays no real role in what we today speak of as Christian initiation.

Despite the internal consistency of Thomas' arguments, since the very foundations of this theology are so problematic, the theology itself has been called into question as not being rooted in reality. There is no doubt, however, that this theology corresponded well with the way the rite was being developed and practiced. The emphasis on strengthening is particularly evident in the rite organized by Thomas' contemporary, William Durand, bishop of Mende (1285-1295). It is in this bishop's pontifical that we find the first evidence of the slap on the face (the alapa) which reminded candidates of their need to be soldiers of Christ and which remained standard in the rite until its contemporary revision. It will be remembered that it was this bishop's pontifical which became the ancestor of the Roman Pontifical.

From the time of Thomas until Vatican II little changed in the received theology of confirmation. The Council of Florence resurrected Thomas' De articulis fidei et sacramenti ecclesiae as the basis for the Western church's view of the sacraments in the Decree for the Armenians (22 November 1439), only softening Thomas' strictures against presbyteral confirmation, since it was assumed that the Eastern messianic sealing corresponded to the Western sacrament of confirmation. Confirmation was defined as one of the seven sacraments by the Council of Trent. Ritually the only change, outside of the stabilization of the rite by the Roman later Roman Pontificals calling for a handlaying during the chrismation of the forehead (Austin, 22-23). Modern theology simply reiterated the teaching of Aquinas and defended the Catholic notion of confirmation's sacramentality against the Reformers' denial.

Confirmation as Conclusion to Catechetical Study: Reformation Confirmation

Sixteenth century reformers generally repudiated all sacraments, save baptism and eucharist, although other rituals were kept as ordinances, such as marriage and ordination. In particular, they firmly rejected the Catholic sacrament of confirmation, since all was complete in baptism. Instead they developed rites suited to the completion of catechetical study which, at the same time, admitted the candidates to the eucharistic table. These rites were also called confirmation and were even related to the apostles' activities in Acts. The difference between such rites and the Catholic sacrament was that, in the case of the former, nothing new, i.e., "sacramental," happened to the candidate. Instead, by such rites candidates ratified the baptismal vows made for them by their godparents. In the Reformation period then the third type of confirmation appears, created both out of reaction to Roman Catholics and from a need to provide a fitting conclusion to the post-baptismal study of those baptized as infants. Ironically, in contrast to the Catholic sacrament of confirmation, the Reformation catechetical rites were much more susceptible to the medieval theology of strengthening and soldiering and preaching the faith fearlessly than was a rite which originated as the episcopal conclusion to baptism.

Contemporary Practice and Theology

The three different systems of confirmation which we have described are part of contemporary praxis, even though somewhat changed. The first has been restored as the conclusion to baptism in the new R.C.I.A. rites (1972), or where the candidates have already been baptized, the conclusion to their formation process. The second, the medieval sacrament of confirmation, is the basis for the new Order of Confirmation (1971) and is generally intended for those baptized in infancy. Finally, Reformation confirmation has been transformed into a series of contemporary American Episcopal and Lutheran affirmation rites which can be celebrated in the presence of the community at significant moments in life. Along with the repeatable rites, however, the two church bodies insisted that one of them remain a "non-repeatable" confirmation, and that it function as did the original Reformation confirmation, that is, as a conclusion to initial formation. Given this restriction it is still true to say that the Reformation rite has finally been understood in a non-polemical fashion. It is not analogous to Catholic confirmation in that it does not complete or conclude baptism. We might also note that both churches have relocated in their baptismal rites (optional) anointing and handlaying rites, adding to baptism those elements which were first reported centuries ago by Tertullian and which are found once more, mutatis mutandis, in Catholic adult baptism.

Three such distinct ritual systems call for different theological interpretations. Despite the fact that Roman Catholic confirmation, even when it is part of baptismal initiation, is still interpreted in the same way as a confirmation long separated from baptism and, most likely, eucharist, this is poor mystagogic theology; in fact it is simply poor theology. As part of baptism, confirmation functions as the pneumatic conclusion to washing in water and entrance into the priestly body of Jesus Christ. It is the transition rite to the celebration of the actual confirmation of baptism, the eucharist. Special focus on the Holy Spirit at this point does not derogate from the role of the Spirit in the whole of Christian initiation, especially since the prayer for the prophetic Spirit makes memorial of what has just occurred in baptism itself through "water and the Holy Spirit" (R.C.I.A., 228).

Separate confirmation, which since the early part of this century ordinarily occurs after eucharistic fellowship has been inaugurated, no longer concludes baptism and admits to eucharist. True, the separate rite calls for a renewal of baptismal vows and reminds assembly and candidates that the context for confirmation's celebration is the eucharist. But quite clearly it is impossible to "make believe" that what has happened has not happened. Furthermore, unlike that post-baptismal rite concluding baptism and making explicit baptism's pneumatic character and leading to the eucharist, the celebration of the enspirited community, separate confirmation tends to impress the candidates with a realization that they are receiving the Holy Spirit for the first time. This perception is heightened by the prepared homily given in the revised rite: "You have already been baptized and now you will receive the power of the Spirit . . . So now, before you receive the Spirit, I ask you . . ." and by the addition to the credal questions of a special question on the Holy Spirit: "Do you believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord, the giver of life, who came upon the apostles at Pentecost and today is given you sacramentally in confirmation?" (O.C., 22-23). Even though we explain that this is not a first pouring forth of the Spirit upon the candidates, and even though it is insisted that this rite is part of Christian initiation and completes baptism, such assurances ring hollow. History, in this case the homily of Faustus, tells a different tale: separation occurred at the time of Faustus' homily. In the mid-5th century a rite not part of baptism called for a theological explanation which provided a justification for the separate rite and at the same time supported its necessity and desirability in the lives of the baptized.

Although the Apostolic Constitution of Paul VI and the Pastoral Introduction to the 1971 Order of Confirmation insist on the proper order of the sacraments, at whatever age conferred, the need to provide a separate confirmation with a more pneumatic theology leads the author of the Apostolic Constitution to graft the scholastic and especially Thomistic theology of confirmation as strengthening onto a renewed appreciation for the role of the Holy Spirit. It also leads him to emphasize the ancient pneumatic prayer for the Holy Spirit by the restoration of a general handlaying to it, and to associate the gesture of consignation with chrism with a formula drawn from the Byzantine post-baptismal sealing rite—"Be sealed with the Gift of the Holy Spirit" (O.C., 9).

The new charismation formula is somewhat ambiguous. First of all, as part of the messianic sealing rite in Byzantine baptismal practice, it is related, not to the Western confirmation anointing, but to the traditional post-baptismal presbyteral, messianic anointing. Unlike the West, where this anointing has remained more messianic than pneumatic, the Byzantine anointing rite became predominantly pneumatic. Secondly, the original Greek formula lacks a verb, since it is simply a repetition of a phrase from a prayer immediately preceding the sealing. The Eastern formula, along with the chrismation, would seem, then, to apply to each individual what has been prayed for all more generally (Ligier, 202-206). Finally, Byzantine practice never separates sealing from baptism itself and is thus much more closely related to the post-baptismal messianic anointing as found in the Order of Baptism for Infants than it is to the Western sacrament of confirmation.

Questions can be raised, then, whether the Eastern churches have confirmation

(Quinn, 325-326). Despite the constant emphasis in the Apostolic Constitution on chrismation as the essential ritual gesture of confirmation and on its being equivalent to apostolic and later handlaying, as well as to Eastern sealing, one remains somewhat unconvinced (Apost. Const.). This leaves the theologian with the classic prayer for the Holy Spirit, with its restored handlaying, as a way of contextualizing and "explaining" the chrismation. The prayer invokes God, through whom the baptized have been regenerated by water and Spirit, to send that same Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, with the gifts of Isaiah 61:2, upon those about to be chrismated. Such a prayer asks, and here is where some of the thoughts of an Alcuin/Rabanus could be a propos, that the candidates live out their baptisms in ways pleasing to God and in service of humanity. This sentiment correlates with the description of confirmation found in such documents as the Constitution on the Church (L.G., 10) and the Decree on Priests (P.O., 2), as well as to the General Introduction to Christian Initiation. It would seem that this would make for a better source of "confirmation" theology than the sermon of a 5th-century semi-pelagian bishop. Moreover, any theology of spiritual strengthening and Christian maturity pertains more to the catechumenate and to baptism than to confirmation.

It would also seem best to focus on confirmation as the pneumatic conclusion to baptism, a modest rite which is part of the great sacrament of baptism and which leads to the climactic sacrament of the eucharist. Such a rite focuses attention on one aspect of the Spirit's operation within us and within the church, impelling us to live out in this world the gift we have received in baptism. In other words we are not to bury our talents but to use them, lest we lose them. Baptized into Christ through the action of the Spirit, and made his priestly people, we are gifted with the Spirit of Christ to preach to others what we have received and to be ever proud of our being born again in Christ Jesus. All of this is sealed in eucharistic fellowship.

In the separate rite of confirmation, especially when eucharist has preceded it, it is much more difficult to develop this same modest theology. The rite takes on a life of its own, as we have already seen. It tends to be identified with that third form of confirmation, repeatable affirmation, especially in terms of the renewal of baptismal vows. Although theologians can abstract from such ritual infelicities, preachers cannot. And so a mystagogic theology of confirmation, in the case of the separated rite, calls for great sensitivity, to avoid giving the impression that the Spirit is now being conferred for the first time, or that this is the way Catholics ratify their baptismal vows, or that this is the sacrament of adolescent strengthening or of Catholic action or of the "ordination of the laity!" None of these pious explanations parading as theology has advanced our knowledge or practice of confirmation or been, for that matter, a healthy development.

Confirmation is the pneumatic conclusion to baptism; it precedes the eucharist. Its core rite consists of hand-laying with prayer for God to send the (prophetic) Spirit upon the one whose sins have been forgiven and who has entered into new life in Christ and in his church through water and Spirit, along with the individual application of the benefits of this prayer to each candidate through a signing with perfumed oil on the forehead using the words "N., be sealed with the Gift of the Holy Spirit." As part of Christian initiation confirmation allows us to contemplate the role of the Spirit in our lives. As separated from Christian initiation, confirmation has been prey to those explanations which seemed useful or necessary at the time but which ultimately did no service to the sacrament. It began with Faustus and it is not yet over.

CONSCIENCE, PRIORITY OF HUMAN

The courageous witness of martyrs who remain faithful to their religious convictions even in the face of death, the insistence in moral theology on one's duty to follow a well-formed conscience even if erroneous, and Cardinal Newman's famous toast to "conscience first," all highlight the Roman Catholic esteem for the priority that must be given to one's personal conscience.

Priority of conscience becomes controversial, and even threatened, when a religious culture or community is dominated by concerns about order, conformity, and adherence to established standards. It is directly challenged whenever those in authority insist that specific moral principles are "absolute," "unchangeable," and the unquestionable manifestations of God's will.

"Priority" refers to the rightful decision to act which one is obliged to make in favor of one's own judgment and personal evaluation of a particular situation or conflict. Since such a decision may be perceived by many, perhaps initially including the subject as well, to be in direct violation of a known and widely recognized ethical directive, it may be widely judged to be immoral. Questions of suspicion will abound. Has the subject here succumbed to sheer, if unrecognized, subjectivism? Will the subject henceforth find it necessary to formulate self-serving rationalizations in order to legitimate this apparently arbitrary and anti-authoritarian decision?

Yet the opposite may be true as well. Might not this same human subject, in this apparently unpopular and unconventional choice, be exhibiting conscientious discernment and brave, mature action? Could this subject be embodying the most careful and responsible procedures which actualize one's God-given human intelligence?

Many today are given to justifying their most controversial and personally difficult decisions allegedly on the basis of such subjectively faithful determinations, for example, in aborting an apparently defective foetus, or in assisting a long-suffering and alert, elderly parent to commit suicide. Are these correct decisions or not? Decisions of conscience are seldom unambiguous.

The issues to be weighed in decisions of conscience are three: first, one's personal level of moral maturity (does one regularly act in conformity with the "crowd", or more consistently in favor of received norms and vision, or is one becoming appreciative as well of one's own tested insights, standards and perspectives?); second, one's prevailing ethical stance (is one a relativist, even a blatant pragmatist or opportunist, or does one espouse some objective standards and some sense of ethical obligation and accountability?); and third, one's habitual, learned procedure for practical decision-making (does one act impulsively, intuitively, directly out of respectful adherence to authoritative directives, or only after attentive, intelligent inquiry and critical reflection regarding the situation, its context, the known directives, and one's own assessment of the converging values, all the while maintaining consistency with one's overall, established sense of personal purpose?).

The manner and degree to which one's religious, and specifically Roman Catholic, sense of value and meaning has been subjectively appropriated is of paramount importance. The church directs the formation of conscience in at least three areas.

First, in fostering the subject's personal maturation, the church explicitly promotes legitimate, relative independence of the individual Christian. "Children and young people . . . should be trained to acquire gradually a more perfect sense of responsibility in the proper development of their own lives. . . ." (G.E., 1).

Secondly, in assisting the subject to assume a specific moral stance the church champions moral principles and virtuous dispositions. It also calls for ongoing personal conversion and an overall commitment to God, the Transcendent Truth and Good, who has revealed God's abiding presence in and saving purpose for human history. "Children and young people have the right to be stimulated to make sound moral judgments based on a well-formed conscience and to put them into practice with a sense of personal commitment, and to know and love God more perfectly" (G.E., 1). And in Gaudium et spes: "One must aim at encouraging the human spirit to develop its faculties of wonder, of understanding, of contemplation, of forming personal judgments and cultivating a religious, moral and social sense" (G.S., 59).

Thirdly, to provide continuous guidance within the decision-making process the church presents specific directives of the magisterium, the proclamation and interpretation of the gospel, the witness of the Catholic tradition and examples in the lives of the saints. Moreover, by its counsel and sustenance, the local church community promotes both the process of discerning and realizing one's own calling, and of conducting regular self-criticism of the individual, and indeed the church itself in the face of the gospel. The latter is to be accomplished in particular through the examination of conscience in the various rites of reconciliation.

It is essential to take seriously and investigate the apparent controversy between the priority of conscience and conformity to objective moral standards, i.e., between subjectivity (which some regard as subjectivism) and objectivity. One may be assisted here by reflecting on the differing accents in the understanding of conscience as found in some pre- and post-Vatican II official statements and in the writings of prominent theologians.

Perspectives of Modern and Post-Modern Philosophies

A brief tour into the shifting field of philosophy seems appropriate as a preliminary step, since cultural attitudes of a given period and locale are so strongly influenced, whether consciously or not, by the prevailing philosophical system or worldview.

Fascination with the human subject and the human power of reasoning which the Enlightenment espoused (along with the endorsement of the empirical method) was accompanied by a suspicion, if not outright rejection, of both tradition and constituted human authority, the long-standing definers of the true and the good.

The human subject engaging in self-realization and self-transcendence became the central feature of an optimistic approach of 20th century personalism. Meanwhile personal experience and human freedom, and the search for their meaning, were emphasized by the existentialists, who had little positive regard for "objectivity" from any other source.

The stage was set for the exaltation of the autonomous human subject, and the championing of unfettered human freedom and self-determination. Eventually this led to the emergence, particularly in the United States, of an extreme form of individualism, which has been called "ontological individualism," i.e., "a belief that the individual has a primary reality, whereas society is a second-order, derived or artificial construct..." (Habits of the Heart, Robert Bellah et.al. Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1985, p.334).

Only with the appearance of what Gregory Baum calls "the second phase of enlightenment" (Doherty, p. 82) did a critical and necessarily self-critical movement begin in earnest. Recognizing the ambiguity of consciousness and the historical and cultural conditioning of human reason, proponents of this phase sought to identify critical principles and to examine truth claims, both to society and its structures, human consciousness and its potential for transformation.

In the midst of these cultural, philosophical developments, the church, for the most part, retained a posture of resistance. It remained relatively unchanged in its teaching about human conscience and personal accountability to God and God's revelation, and to the legitimate authority of the church, about human sinfulness, intellectual pride and moral weakness, about the necessity of self-accusation and the grace of reconciliation. These traditional teachings were defended with but limited success, especially among the influential, liberal, intellectual elite. Only gradually, and not without considerable controversy, still unresolved, did the insights of modern psychology, cognitive theory, and sociology become incorporated into theological studies of conscience and authority.

Conscience Redefined

At the Second Vatican Council, the explanation of conscience included two passages of special importance. The first emphasizes the distinctive, personal experience of God's will: "Conscience is a person's most secret core and sanctuary, in which one is alone with God, whose voice resonates in one's depths" (G.S., 16). Rather than designating primarily a rational procedure whereby one conforms one's behavior to carefully articulated religious and natural laws, stress is given to the human person, the human subject, in some perhaps pre-rational consciousness of God's loving presence and purpose. God is understood to be the interior foundation of one's own inherent yearning for the true and the good. That personal orientation, one may conclude, is not to be rejected out of hand, even were it to differ with a particular official position on occasion, but would require careful discernment. Some appreciation of the priority of conscience is intimated here. The second instruction of the council states: "Through fidelity to conscience Christians are joined with other persons in the search for truth and for the truthful solution to so many moral problems which arise both in the lives of individuals and in social relationships" (G.S., 16). While the context here emphasizes explicitly the divine law, as inwardly experienced, and objective norms of morality, the text nonetheless recognizes the necessity of some process of consultation and co-operation in the search for appropriate resolutions to the complex and ambiguous situations of our day. In other words, traditionally accepted answers may not always fit contemporary questions and may require some respectful but critical re-examination of earlier precedents as well as of the present situation.

Moreover, persons who have participated in such a process of scrutiny may, on occasion, arrive at conclusions which either oppose or anticipate official moral teaching in a given area. Their position is understood as dissent, a term never officially invoked in the conciliar documents, but one which became commonplace with the responses to the 1968 papal encyclical Humanae Vitae. It should be noted here that after further reflection on this difficult topic, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, in its 1968 pastoral Human Life in Our Day, specified three conditions for dissent to be legitimate: (1) the reasons must be serious and well-founded; (2) the manner of the dissent must not question or impugn the teaching authority of the church; and (3) the dissent must not be such as to give scandal (USCC ed., p. 19). The conciliar statement three years earlier does not rule out the possibility that one might reach a dissenting conclusion through such a critical and self-critical inquiry. Hence, again, in the conciliar statement and in the 1968 pastoral some appreciation of the priority of conscience is intimated.

Differences Among Contemporary Scholars

The post-conciliar period has been laced with frequent controversy and followed up by definitive disciplinary procedures against individual theologians. The central issue, in bold strokes, continues to be one's ethical stance: does one advocate full adherence to the official moral teaching of the church, or the following of one's well-formed conscience, in matters which are not formally defined? Significantly divergent theological positions have been formulated.

Representative of a more conservative posture is Germain Grisez. In his recent foundational work he defines conscience as: "one's last and best judgment concerning what one should choose. Genuine judgments of conscience are derived from sound moral principles. One's knowledge of these principles and of their application develops. This development is the formation of conscience. It is based on natural law and assisted by the teaching of the Church" (Grisez, p. vi). Grisez, while critical of the classical natural law tradition, nonetheless focuses heavily upon principles and their application in what resembles a deductive process, bolstered by official church teaching. There is little here to award legitimacy to any subjective determination that deviates from the received principles and teaching. And there is little which acknowledges the possibility of an interior orientation and original responsiveness of the human subject to value.

In a considerably different vein, Walter Conn comments on and advances the approach which Bernard Lonergan has articulated. Conn explains conscience from a developmental perspective as "the radical drive for self-transcendence realized in creative understanding, critical judging, responsible deciding and generous loving" (Conn, p. 1). Here we find far more attention given to the interiority of the human subject as dynamic, with distinctive and cumulative levels of consciousness. This subject arrives at responsible decisions not simply by applying received norms to particular cases. Instead, the journey to decide and love is appropriately preceded first by careful attention to all the relevant data available both to the senses and to one's consciousness. There follows the effort to pursue intelligent inquiry and critical reflection regarding this data. A reasoned investigation is next to be conducted of whatever controverted truth claims, whether of the received traditional norms and values, or of the understanding and interpretation peculiar to one's own group or oneself. Further, one must engage in continual criticism of one's own moral stance and adhere consistently to that stance. The attitude toward authority, the constant heeding of the word of God, and a respectful but critical attitude toward authoritative statements all must be a part of this more subject-oriented approach. Here the challenge is not exclusively to apply moral principles to individual situations and problems. Particularly in conflict situations, it is to attend to all the morally relevant data, and creatively to interpret the norms and identify the values which they espouse within a given situation. After responsible deliberation regarding various options, one may decide to act. In this approach, the priority of a responsibly resolved conscience is explicitly espoused.

CONTRITION

Contrition is "heartfelt sorrow and aversion for the sin committed along with the intention of sinning of more" (Denz-Schon, 1676). This definition of contrition formulated at the Council of Trent is repeated in the Rite of Penance (6a) and is seen as the most important act of the penitent.

Historically, contrition has been seen to be of two kinds: perfect, sorrow for sins committed based on the love of God; and imperfect or attrition, sorrow for sins committed based on a lesser reason, for example, fear of punishment. Before and after the Council of Trent theologians debated the sufficiency of imperfect contrition for the effective reception of the sacrament of penance to forgive serious sins. The Rite of Penance approaches metanoia (change of heart) from a scriptural point of view rather than a scholastic viewpoint, thus sidestepping the long debate. "We can only approach the Kingdom of Christ by metanoia. This is a profound change of the whole person by which one begins to consider, judge, and arrange one's life according to the holiness and love of God, made manifest in his Son in the last days and given to us in abundance (Paul VI's Apostolic Constitution, "Paenitemini," Feb. 17, 1966: A.A.S. 58 [1966] 179).

Conversion of the sinner affects the person from within. It is the turning away from evil and turning to choose the right—it is the personally decisive moment of metanoia, remorse, contrition. "It is distinctive of contrition to add pure and more valid motives to the conscious regret of personal failure. These are the motives of seeing sin as an offense against God and as a sundering of ecclesial communion . . . (Pope Paul VI's address on new rite of penance Apr. 3, 1974) (Notitiae 10 (1974) 225-227).

It is by restoring the word of God to the sacramental celebration of penance that the church hopes to facilitate conversion and contrition. It is the word of the scripture proclaimed in individual and communal celebrations that motivates contrition. Both the homily and the examination of conscience awaken true contrition for sin.

Prayers of contrition or prayers of general confession are formulas for stating metanoia, conversion and contrition. No longer are these prayers statements of both attrition and contrition but rather bold statements of love of God based on the scriptures.

CONVERSION FROM SIN

The opening words of Jesus' public ministry, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent (metanoiete), and believe. . . ." (Mk 1:15), constitute an urgent and dramatic call to radical conversion. Catholic tradition has long explained that this central theme of Jesus' teaching incorporates both a positive aspect (conversio ad Deum, or conversion to God, and hence to a life of loving service in and for the reign of God which Jesus inaugurated and embodied) and a negative aspect (aversio a peccatis, or renunciation of sin and the reign of sin in all its dimensions, in association with the victory of the Risen Lord).

Contemporary biblical scholars recognized the prominence, power and comprehensiveness of this biblical theme, conversion (metanoia). Their insights contribute substantively to the shifting of the principal focus of moral theology. This has come to be the historical human person, a living, dynamic subject called to transform/change/convert both self and world.

It is worth noting that this refocusing process in moral theology, emphasizing the human subject engaged in a graced transition from sinfulness and toward God, began in the 1950s on the European continent. It gained broad endorsement during the era of the Second Vatican Council, and is now arriving at some consolidation in theological literature.

This article will offer a brief consideration of the conciliar teaching, one example of post-conciliar papal teaching, and one recent theoretical reflection. This last, the work of Walter Conn, carried on in dialogue with developmental psychologists such as Erik Erikson and

Lawrence Kohlberg, may provide a broader framework for understanding and expanding the official teaching regarding this provocative theme: "conversion", in its negative aspect, "from sin".

The Second Vatican Council

A number of the documents of the Second Vatican Council address the theme "conversion from sin" either explicitly or by implication. The following brief summary of this composite teaching may clarify its principal features. It was explained, first, as a central focus of the mission of the church: "the Church announces the good tidings of salvation to those who do not believe, so that all . . . may know the one true God and Jesus Christ whom he has sent and may be converted from their ways, doing penance" (S.C., 9). Secondly, as a persistent confrontation with all evil: "Let them (the laity) . . . express (their hope) . . . in continual conversion and in wrestling against the world rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual forces of iniquity' (Eph 6:12)" (L.G., 35). Thirdly, as initiated by God's invitation, and as entailing a radical and comprehensive interior transformation of the sinner: "This conversion (of those who turn to God through preaching and the power of the Spirit) is, indeed, only initial; sufficient however to make (them) realize that (they) have been snatched from sin This transition, which involves a progressive change of outlook and morals, should be manifested in its social implications and effected gradually. . . ." (A.G.D., 13). Fourth, as ecclesial, both in the effects of the perpetration of evil, and as the sacramental and communal context for the Christian disciple to engage in the process of conversion: "Those who approach the sacrament of Penance . . . are reconciled with the Church, which they have wounded by their sins and which by charity, by example and by prayer labors for their conversion" (L.G., 11). Fifth, as incorporating a specifically social dimensions, viz., a renunciation of the world's injustice and animosity: (To correct the imbalances in today's world) "much reform in economic and social life is required along with a change of mentality and of attitude by all" (G.S., 63); and, "But it (humankind) will not succeed in accomplishing the task awaiting it, that is, the establishment of a truly human world for all men over the entire earth, unless everyone devotes himself to the cause of true peace with renewed vigor" (G. S., 77).

In a precise manner, the Council examined, described and explained "sin" (from which all are called to conversion): "Man (sic), enticed by the evil one, abused his freedom at the very start of history. He lifted himself up against God, and sought to attain his goal apart from him They served the creature rather than the creator Often refusing to acknowledge God as his source, man has also upset the relationship which should link him to his last end; and at the same time he has broken the right order that should reign within himself as well as between himself and other men and all creatures" (G.S., 13). Here both the idolatrous and alienating features of human sin are identified, including the vertical and horizontal, personal, social and historical dimensions of its willful devastation, dimensions which are further developed in 25 and 37.

The full text of 13 offers both a biblical and an experientially convalidated presentation of this mysterious, culpable participation in evil. Sin is depicted as a negative dynamic operating within human life which continually places in jeopardy the dignity and calling of every human person. Yet mention is made here as well of God's liberating intervention: God "inwardly renews the sinner", casting off the sinner's slavery to sin. A developed presentation of the process of conversion, however, is not provided.

Recent Papal Teaching

Pope John Paul II's 1984 Apostolic Exhortation, Reconciliation and Penance, is a response of the pope and the Synod of 1983 to the wounds, tensions, conflicts and divisions which these bishops identify in the present world. The approach embodies traditional perspectives especially social responsibility, in continuity with the conciliar teaching. The church's central mission is described here as the task of reconciling people, i.e., "changing an historical condition of hatred and violence into a civilization of love," and of being the sacrament of reconciliation in the world (4; also cf. 11).

The notion of conversion from sin is prominent throughout the discussion, and particularly in close association with the dominant themes of the document. For John Paul II, conversion from sin seems to be employed at times as synonymous with penance and reconciliation, and at other times, as the general category which subsumes both.

Penance, according to the papal teaching, is "a conversion that passes from the heart to deeds, and then to the Christian's whole life" (4). Here the pope emphasizes the depth of the personal transformation: "one's whole existence . . . becomes penitential," espousing in one's concrete daily life an asceticism which entails losing one's own life for Christ, putting off the old person, overcoming what is of the flesh, rising from the things of here below. John Paul insists that participation in the church's traditional penitential discipline "cannot be abandoned without grave harm" for the individual and the church (26).

The extent of the effects of this conversion are likewise featured in his treatment of penance. The pope speaks of changing one's life, striving for what is better in one's deeds, and acts of penance in one's concrete daily effort. This comprehensive change is to accord with one's

John Paul also relates conversion to reconciliation, a term which indicates the comprehensive goal of this conversion of heart. Reconciliation is explained as the overcoming of a radical break or alienation in fundamental relationships, i.e., with God, oneself, and others, including especially one's family, church, professional and social environment (13), and the whole of creation (9). In fact, the pope explains sin, or the kingdom of sin, primarily in terms of these central realities of alienation. The essential first step in returning to God is "to acknowledge one's sin," so that one can detach oneself "consciously and with determination from the sin into which one has fallen" (13).

A key concern here for both pope and synod is what they identify as the contemporary loss of a proper sense of sin. The pope attributes this principally to a grave spiritual crisis today brought on largely by a pervasive secularism and psychologism, and fortified by ethical relativism or by a shallow legalism. A proper and ever more highly acute sense of sin must be achieved. This is integral to the process of authentic conversion which is aided by the pastoral ministry of sound catechetics, respect for the magisterium, and participation in the sacrament of penance and reconciliation (18, 23).

When he speaks of sin, the pope insists that, in the proper sense, it is always a personal act, the product of a person's freedom. Its first and most important consequence is in the individual sinner, in that person's spirit, whose will is weakened and whose intellect is clouded (16). Individual sin negatively affects others, the church and the human community as well. It consists of either the direct attack on one's neighbor, that person's dignity, rights and freedom, or by extension, the violation of the common good. An individual can act unjustly against a community. Furthermore, an entire community can perpetrate an injustice against an individual, or against

In such instances, every individual member of the sinning community bears some responsibility for participating in this "communion of sin." What today many may call "social sin" or "sinful situations" are "the result of the accumulation and concentration of many personal sins" (16). The pope further specifies this type of sinfulness in a passage he later inserted in his encyclical On Social Concern: "It is the case of the very personal sins of those who cause or support evil or who exploit it; of those who are in a position to avoid, eliminate or at least limit certain social evils but who fail to do so out of laziness, fear of the conspiracy of silence, through secret complicity or indifference; of those who take refuge in the supposed impossibility of changing the world, and of those who sidestep the effort and sacrifice required, producing specious reasons of a higher order. The real responsibility, then, lies with individuals" (16).

Even if structural and institutional aspects of sinful situations are changed, such change will be incomplete, or even counterproductive "if the people directly or indirectly responsible for that situation are not converted" (16). Thus does the pope identify specific requirements for conversion, viz., the renunciation of carefully honed habits of clever, subtle rationalization and self-serving complicity in the evildoing of others.

The radical evil of freely rejecting God, God's law, and the covenant of love which God offers is paralleled with "turning in on oneself, or to some created and finite reality" (17). This insidious process of aversion from God and conversion to creatures (as ultimate goods) is precisely what is to be reversed in authentic conversion from sin.

The pope contrasts the "mystery of sin" with the great "mystery of God's infinite loving kindness towards us," i.e., the mystery of the incarnation and redemption: "(This mystery) is capable of penetrating to the hidden roots of our iniquity, in order to evoke in the soul a movement of conversion, in order to redeem it and set it on the course towards reconciliation" (20).

Here again, the effective divine initiative, the radicalness of the evil to be overcome, and the ongoing, deeply interior process of overcoming one's alienation are identified as central to conversion from sin. Once more John Paul insists that conversion is not a lofty abstraction but "a concrete Christian value to be achieved in our lives" (22).

A Contemporary Reflection

Walter Conn espouses Bernard Lonergan's understanding of specific conversions as central to the human subject's process of achieving authentic, self-transcending subjectivity. In the case of moral conversion, one shifts to a radically new horizon, i.e., "from a radically egocentric orientation in which the criterion for decision is self-interested satisfaction to a social orientation in which the criterion for decision is value (in various conventionally defined forms)" (Conn, p. 28).

The human subject who has reached "the existential moment," has come to understand that one truly creates oneself "in every deed, decision and discovery" of one's life, for good or ill (p. 114). In other words, one gains a deeper grasp not just of the sins one has committed, but of the sinfulness in which one participates, and the sinner one is: "moral conversion provides a programmatic base for the conscious, deliberate development of sustained moral self-transcendence" (p. 113).

To explain more precisely how one can sustain this "new personal agenda," Conn advances Lonergan's thinking on affective conversion. He describes this associated notion as "a wholesome, self-transcending commitment to love another person or persons" (pp. 149-150). For any conversion from sin to be truly effective, then, it must be linked with a personal commitment to good. Moreover, it must seek to uncover and reject any personal symbol-system which conceals or condones an emotional attachment to sin.

Conn suggests a further refinement of this conversion from sin, the "critical" moral conversion, in which "one can critically recognize and accept the responsibility of discovering and establishing one's own values (in dialogue with one's community)" (p. 116). Conventional norms and values, whether cultural, ecclesial or civil, may incorporate some unjust or misleading aspects, promoting to that extent evil rather than good. The critically morally converted will move to renounce any individual or social judgments and actions which accord with these evil aspects. Hence, the morally converted subject, by consistent, courageous judgments and decisions marked by realism and objectivity, establishes a post-conventional morality grounded in "self-chosen universal ethical principles of justice" and love (p. 127).

The following conclusions are drawn in light of Conn's reflections. The person who has engaged in a critical moral conversion has come to face squarely one's own evil, one's biases, one's own "demon." This person, in community, is endeavoring to unmask and eradicate as well the deeper strongholds of sin and evil, in their subtler incorporations in (uncritically) accepted wisdom and commonsense. Such a one is struggling to be converted from sin of every sort: from pre-personal dispositions, personal sinfulness in act, habit and way of life, in one's presuppositions and symbol system, from social and structural sin, in fact, from all that the mysterious reign of sin encompasses.

CONVERSION TO FAITH

Recent years have seen an increasing number of thorough studies of Christian conversion considered from the perspective of moral theology, philosophy, developmental psychology, and scriptural interpretation. Since such studies are readily available (see bibliography), this article will focus instead on conversion to Christian faith from an ecclesial and sacramental perspective, i.e., the experience of converts coming to faith ritually enacted in the church community. A community's understanding of its identity and what must happen in order for a non-member to come to share that identity are ritually enacted in its initiatory rites. This article will thus reflect on the understanding of conversion to faith which emerges from the rite through which those who were not Christian believers become Catholic Christians, the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972).

The faith to which the R.C.I.A. is intended to enable adults to convert is a life lived as part of a Spirit-filled community celebrating the memorial of Christ's death and resurrection in the eucharist. This faith thus goes beyond doctrinal assent to include real transformation of mind, emotional life and behavior, and arises in response to grace. In the R.C.I.A., the process of conversion to a faith which is mature enough for membership in the church is seen as having four dimensions: doctrinal formation, learning to live the life of Christian faith among those who are already living it, participation in public worship, and learning to share in the church's apostolic mission (75).

First, conversion to faith in the gospel of Jesus Christ requires knowledge of what that gospel is. The knowledge needed for conversion includes not only intellectual acquaintance with Christian revelation, which even a non-believer may have, but a growing awareness that this revelation is true and an appreciation of what its truth means for oneself and all humanity, i.e., "a profound sense of the mystery of salvation in which they (the converts) desire to participate" (75, 1).

Second, since conversion to faith is conversion to a graced life of living in common in the community of faith, it grows and deepens by practicing the Christian faith under the guidance of those who are already living it. Above all, even as "conversion in the NT requires the acknowledgment that Jesus is the obedient and chosen Messiah of God, and that acknowledgment in turn requires a life of obedience" (Gaventa, p. 150), the community of the faithful helps those converting to learn "to obey the Holy Spirit more generously" (4), "to follow supernatural inspiration in their deeds" (75, 2). The R.C.I.A. specifies various aspects of this obedience of faith in which converts grow as their faith matures.

Those coming to faith are helped by the community to learn how to pray (75, 2), so that they can come to know Christ as Savior (153), as Resurrection and Life (174), and have the personal, living faith and mature desire for a new covenant with Christ necessary for baptism (211).

Further, in order to live the life of faith, converts must undergo a transformation of their perception and patterns of thinking. They must learn to see by God's light, to make the mind of Christ their own (52). This involves counting all as loss compared to knowing Christ (94), and thus being freed from false values that blind them (168). They must allow their desires to change, that they may seek after what is holy and just, prefer the folly of the cross to the wisdom of the world, and long for baptism in water and the Spirit that will bring them eternal life (167, 153). They must learn to trust the truth and wisdom of Christ so that they can know freedom of mind and heart and be able to follow Christ (52, 153, 167); they must allow the Spirit to free them from fear and give them confidence, to fill them with a sure hope set on Christ, as well as with faith and charity (167, 174, 161, 175). The converts must develop genuine self-knowledge, a sense of sin and horror of it, and true repentance (152, 153, 174, 142).

Finally, the converts learn in the community how to practice the gospel in their personal and social life (11). They learn to pattern their lives on the teaching of the gospel, so that love of God and neighbor is their central motivation, that in all their actions they seek to follow the example of Christ (52). They renounce error, reject everything in their lives displeasing to Christ and learn to keep the commandments (211, 153, 57, 97); they learn how to listen to God's will for them with receptive minds and generously undertake whatever he asks, and to practice self-denial (97, 65, 118, 90). From the community the converts learn to "practice love of neighbor, even at the cost of self-renunciation" (75), to have hearts more responsive to the needs of others, to grow in freedom from selfishness, putting others first (65, 113, 134). Thus they learn to be true worshippers of God, constantly thinking of the One who called them to salvation and responding to his love (153, 154, 174, 161, 182).

In this gradual transformation of behavior which demonstrates that a candidate is indeed converting to faith, the R.C.I.A. emphasizes both the role of the Holy Spirit and the role of the community of faith. It is the Spirit who enables people to believe and be converted to the Lord and commit their lives to him (36), who teaches them who God is and how to please him, and gives them power to overcome weakness (153). Yet the Spirit works through the church community, who are responsible for the converts' formation in faith and who decide when that faith is mature enough that they are ready to be baptized (122); one of the criteria of election for baptism is that converts have "shared the company of their Christian brothers and sisters and joined with them in prayer" (131). When the converts are baptized they are understood to "embrace the faith that through divine help the church has handed down and (be) baptized in that faith" (211).

Third, the heart of the church community's enabling the candidates' conversion to faith is the worshipping assembly. Conversion to Christianity involves learning to experience reality as the Christian community does; converts learn to share the community's experience by learning the language through which they perceive, and the Christian community's language is the language of scripture and ritual symbol. Further, the R.C.I.A. is clear that the liturgical rites mediate the grace which enables conversion: "by means of the sacred rites celebrated at successive times they are led into the life of faith, worship and charity belonging to the people of God" (76). It is at the beginning of the first rite of the catechumenate that the converts ask the church community for the faith that will give them eternal life; the community then signs the candidates' senses petitioning God to change the way they (the candidates) perceive the world and act in it (56). The celebrations of the word and prayers of exorcism and blessing assist in the nurturing and growth of the catechumens' faith and conversion to God and purify and strengthen them (35, 75). The power of the word proclaimed in the worshipping assembly renews the catechumens (66), and enables them to know God and love their neighbor (52); the celebrations of the word implant in their hearts the "morality characteristic of the NT, the forgiveness of injuries and insults, a sense of sin and repentance, the duties Christians must carry out in the world," as well as provide instruction and experience in the different ways of prayer, explain the liturgy, and prepare "them gradually to enter the worship assembly of the entire community" (82). In the minor exorcisms, which "draw the attention of the catechumens to the real nature of the Christian life, the struggle between flesh and spirit" (90), the worshipping assembly petitions God to remove specific sins from the converts' lives, such as love of money and lawless passions, and quarreling (94).

After the converts are accepted as candidates for baptism, the community's assistance in helping their faith to mature through liturgical rites intensifies. The liturgies of the three scrutinies, intended to reveal whatever is weak or sinful in the elect, inspire a deeper desire for redemption, and manifest and strengthen what is good; the elect are expected to progress in their awareness of sin and desire for salvation from the first to the final scrutiny (141, 143). Because the scrutinies deliver the elect from the power and effects of sin and the influence of Satan, protect them from temptation and give them new strength, filling their spirit with Christ the Redeemer, these rites "should complete the conversion of the elect and deepen their resolve to hold fast to Christ and carry out their decision to love God above all" (141, 144, 143). The presentations of the Creed and Lord's Prayer are intended to refine and deepen the faith of the elect (147); the rite at which the creed is presented is preferably to be celebrated at a eucharist of the faithful and makes it clear that it is through the worshipping community that the elect receive the faith they are learning to profess (157, 160). The importance of the liturgical dimension of enabling converts to grow into the faith of the community is seen in the influence it has on the doctrinal dimension; doctrinal catechesis is to be "accommodated to the liturgical year, and solidly supported by celebrations of the word" (75, 1). The liturgy of the church is a privileged locus for the word of the Spirit in bringing about conversion to faith; its rich language of biblical narrative and imagery and ritual symbols expresses and mediates the coming to know God in faith which is ultimately beyond words.

The fourth dimension which the R.C.I.A. describes as part of the process of conversion to faith is the converts' coming to share in the church community's apostolic mission (75, 4). As converts bear witness to the faith they are beginning to have both through evangelization and through works of mercy, they become more aware of how God has acted in their lives already, and of their responsibility to grow in living by and sharing the faith of the community.

The R.C.I.A. sees these four dimensions of conversion to faith as taking place simultaneously over time in the church community, within a structure which enables this conversion to grow and mature. In order to be accepted as catechumens (those whom the community is instructing in living the life of faith), converts must have a beginning of faith and conversion and "the intention to change their lives and enter into a relationship with God in Christ" in the church (42). Converts remain catechumens until the church community judges their conversion and faith to be strong; this may take several years. Such a lengthy process makes it clear to the candidates that conversion to faith is a lifelong process; when they have sufficiently progressed in learning about how to convert that they will be able to sustain a life of ongoing conversion, they are ready to be accepted as members in the Christian community which seeks to live that life. The community decides they are capable of membership (and thus accepts them for paschal baptism) on the basis of how they have progressed in the four dimensions of conversion: whether they have reached a conversion in mind and action seen in the example of their lives, and have sufficient knowledge of Christian teaching "as well as a spirit of faith and charity" (120, 112). After the rite of election those chosen for baptism enter into a final period (normally during Lent) which is intensely centered on conversion, seeking "an intimate knowledge of Christ and his church" (142) through purification of mind and heart by searching of conscience and doing penance, and a deeper awareness of Christ as Savior (35, 139).

When converts are baptized they are expected to have a personal faith which they will keep a "living faith" (211). The process of converting to this faith, surrendering to the gift of an obedient relationship to God in Christ lived as part of the Spirit-filled community, involves transformation of mind, emotional life, and action; this transformation takes place by grace in the community of faith and is mediated in a special way by participation in the community's acts of worship.

COVENANT

Definition and Linguistic Usage

The OT Hebrew term traditionally translated "covenant" (b'rit) describes a contract of treaty between individuals (1 Sam 18:3), between heads of state (1 Kgs 5: 12), between God and a favored human being (Abraham in Gen 15:18; 17; David in 1 Sam 7), and between God and Israel (Exod 19-24). The term can also suggest obligation and the imposition of a sovereign will, as shown by such phrases as "to command the covenant" (Ps 111:9; cf. Judg 2:20) and by association with the terms law and commandment (Deut 4:13; 33:9; Isa 24:5; Pss 50:16; 103:18). The wide range of the Hebrew term has tempted interpreters unduly to narrow b'rît toward either mutuality or imposition of divine will. The OT, however, is generally unconcerned about apportioning precisely divine and human agency and holds both tendencies together. The old English legal term "covenant," defined as a mutual agreement between two or more persons to do or refrain from doing certain acts, has translated the OT term since at least the 14th century; it emphasizes mutuality and freedom. The Greek translators of the 3rd and 2nd century B.C. did not catch the range of b'rît and emphasized divine initiative at the expense of mutuality. They avoided the ordinary Greek legal term for covenant (synthēkē) in favor of the hellenistic word for last will and testament (diathēkē). The NT simply took over the Septuagint interpretation of diathēkē (33 instances: 9 in Paul; 17 in Hebrews; 4 in Synoptics; 2 in Acts; 1 in Revelations; 7 of these are OT citations.)

Covenant in the OT

Covenant was part of the legal world of the ancient Near East, which has been well described as "a society of gentlemen." Virtually all important agreements were sworn in oaths calling the gods to witness the swearing. A typical covenantal formula would be: "May the gods do such and such to me if I do not do to you as I have sworn today in their presence!" In an honor-shame society one must be as good as one's word. Covenants were ordinarily oral; only those affecting many people or future generations were written.

There are two major covenant types in the OT: the conditional covenant between Yahweh and Israel mediated by Moses at Mount Sinai, and the "unconditional" (or promissory) covenant between Yahweh and Abraham or David. The Sinai covenant is chiefly described in Exodus 19-24 (now incorporated into the "Sinai pericope" of Exod 19:1-Num 10:11). The accompanying narrative is the best commentary. The Lord frees the Hebrews from serving Pharaoh in Egypt and leads them to serve him in Canaan (Exodus 1-15). On the journey they encounter the Lord at Sinai and, after freely assenting to be his people (Exodus 19), accept the "ten words" (Exodus 20) and the additional legislation of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. The covenant is ratified by the blood of an animal sprinkled on an altar representing God and on the people (Exodus 24).

An extra-biblical parallel to the Sinai covenant is, by scholarly consensus since the 1960s, suzerainty treaties like those the Hittite Old Kingdom (1450-1200 B.C.) made with its vassal states. The suzerainty or vassal treaty genre is attested from this mid-second to the late first millennium. The following outline is typical.

Titulary.

History of the relationship between the two kings, usually in precise detail, and in personal terms.

Statement of the relationship.

Stipulations.

List of divine witnesses.

Curses and blessings.

It has been recently suggested that the treaty genre influenced not the Sinai covenant described in Exodus but the book of Deuteronomy. Exodus describes a true covenant of course but not one modeled on a suzerainty treaty. Only Deuteronomy reflects self-consciously about covenant and follows the exact outline of the treaty genre: historical prologue with exhortation in chaps. 5-11; stipulations in 12:1-26:15; invocation and oath in 26:16-19; blessings and curses in chap. 28. The model for Deuteronomy would then have been the treaty genre as used by the Neo-Assyrian Empire (935-612 B.C.) to rule its western vassals. Israel would have adopted the genre to express its relationship to its suzerain.

The second major OT covenant type is Yahweh's unconditional covenant with Abraham (reaffirmed to the other patriarchs) and with David. Genesis 15 and 17 explicitly call God's promise of land and progeny to Abraham a covenant. Circumcision is the sign of the covenant; the "obligation" is to worship the God of the Father under his various titles. Emphasis is on God who promises.

The Bible itself underlines the connection between the Abrahamic and Davidic covenants (Gen 14:17-24; Gen 22:2 and 1 Chron 3:1). The unconditional covenant with David is most clearly set forth in 2 Sam 7 (and Psalm 89): "I will be his father and he shall be my son. When he commits iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men . . . but I will not take my steadfast love from him. . . ." The Royal Psalms develop that promise (Pss 2, 18, 20, 21, 45, 72, 101, 110, 132, and 144). M. Weinfeld has suggested that this type of covenant is modeled on the covenant of grant attested in the Hittite and Syro-Palestinian areas; the god grants to the king or servant land and progeny for their loyal service.

Covenant is so central in OT thought that the future can be imagined as a new covenant (Jer 31:31-35). Unlike the Mosaic covenant, which the people broke, "I will put my law within them, and I will write it upon their hearts. I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

New Testament

The NT accepts Septuagint usage: covenant means testament, dispensation. For Paul, covenant is a code for the entire old era and is the antithesis to the new age of Christ. 2 Cor 3:6 contrasts the old written and death-dealing covenant with the new covenant, which is of the Spirit and life-giving, a reference to Jer 31:31-34. Gal 4:21-31 is the strongest Pauline contrast between the two covenants: Hagar, a slave woman bearing children according to the flesh for slavery, and Sarah, a free woman bearing children according to the spirit for freedom. Hebrews contains the same contrast between old and new covenant but adds its heaven-earth typology and connects covenant to sacrificial worship.

The most important synoptic passage is Mk 14:24 (also, Mt 26:28; Lk 22:20): "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many." Lk 22:20 reflects the tradition found also in 1 Cor 11:25: "this cup which is poured out for you is the new covenant in my blood." Luke's reinterpreted Passover meal with its soteriological and "sacrificial" overtones (cf. v. 19c) alludes to the new covenant of Jer 31:31-35 and to Exod 24:3-8, where the Sinai covenant was ratified by the sprinkling of an animal's blood. Jesus' own body replaces the Passover lamb.

Covenant in the NT is a more restricted term than in the OT and has also been caught up in Pauline polemics. The relational aspect of the OT covenant is conveyed in the NT by other terms, e.g., church, faith, and discipleship.

CREATION THEOLOGY AND WORSHIP

The ecological crisis has heightened interest in the relation of worship to the natural world. Apart from some of the Psalms, the created order has not been a conscious and consistent point of reference in worship and liturgical practice. Worship has concentrated on the divine-human relation and the salvation of humanity. The natural world, by contrast, has not been an issue. But now the world of nature, the matrix within which human life is set, can no longer be taken for granted, and the salvation of this world has suddenly become a priority. Therefore it is not surprising that worship, which celebrates life, should reach out consciously to incorporate the natural order.

What are the underlying reasons for this neglect of creation in the past? (1) It may be traceable to the fact that the Judaism from whence Christianity sprang was in fierce competition with middle-eastern fertility cults that viewed the forces of nature as gods and "worshipped and served the creature rather than the Creator." In their idolatry "they exchanged the truth about God for a lie" (Rom 1:25). An emphasis upon nature in worship may for this reason seem problematic. (2) Gnostic influences on Christianity led to an interpretation of the world as "fallen" and a source of temptation because of its materiality. It was thus to be avoided as contradictory to the "spiritual," which is the real object of God's concern and saving activity. (3) Enlightenment rationalism and scientific empiricism have sought to do away with all superstition and mystery by turning the world into an object, the truth of which is known only by reductionistic methods. This has led to the assertion that the natural world occupies a quite different dimension of reality than religion, and religious attitudes toward it are at best anthropomorphic and poetic, and at worst superstitious.

There are resources in the tradition, however, which encourage more positive approaches. (1) The Psalmist, who has provided Christians much of their hymnic material for worship, sees the natural world as displaying the glory and providential care of the Creator. Without deifying the world, Jewish piety viewed it as expressing God's faithfulness and blessing. The "land" was always an essential part of Israel's relationship to Yahweh. And Judaism never felt called upon to interpret the Fall as turning the material world into a curse. (2) In the Eastern church Fathers an important theme was salvation as a cosmic process restoring both humanity and nature to their original purposes in the intention of the Creator by way of recapitulation in Christ and theosis in humanity. (3) In the Western church there have also been those whom Matthew Fox terms "creation mystics"—Hildegard of Bingen, Mechtild of Magdeburg, Meister Eckhart, Julian of Norwich, and even Thomas Aquinas. None surpasses St. Francis of Assisi, whose "Canticle of Brother Sun" celebrates the interrelatedness of humanity and nature and unites all creatures in the praise

The forms and emphases of worship respond to the felt needs of every age. Therefore we can anticipate that cosmic themes will come into their own more and more as the consciousness increases that the rescue of the natural world is intimately tied to our own salvation. The world may be viewed as the original sacramental gift through which God gives Godself to humankind. Because of our forfeiture of our responsibility as the image of God to care for the earth, what was a blessing is fast become a curse, a threat to our lives and those of future generations. Christ, in his mission of redemption, identifies with this world gone awry and its inhabitants. In eucharistic worship he invites us to participate in himself, in his body and his kingdom of justice and peace, enabling us to see the world once again as the Creator's sacramental blessing and to transform our praxis in accordance with that fact. Thus the salvation in Christ celebrated in worship includes the restoration of the cosmos as integral to salvation, and ends the bifurcation of the material and the spiritual that has had such deleterious effects in the West.

Sources for this reinterpretation of the relation of worship to the world are emerging from several places, as the following examples indicate: (1) Process theology, with its origins in a Whiteheadian metaphysic, has a keen interest in the relation of the physical world to God. The panentheism favored by process theologians is distinguished from pantheism in that the world is not itself divine but is in God and God is at work in and through it. Thus God transcends the world, yet interpenetrates every part of its interrelatedness and its process of becoming. (2) Jürgen Moltmann employs trinitarian doctrine to overcome the dichotomy between God and the world often found in Protestant thought. Divine love creates the world as covenant partner and the object of love, granting the world independent existence while maintaining a continuing participation and stake in it through the Spirit, and leading the world, when it becomes estranged, toward a new future through the Son, the Messiah of the age to come. Thus, according to Moltmann, the world cannot be viewed without being aware of the Shekinah, the aura of God's love, care and glory, which surrounds and indwells it. (3) Pierre Teilhard de Chardin pioneered the reunion of cosmology and theology which had been severed from each other by the scientific positivism of the last century and theology's response to this positivism by limiting itself to the personal, interpersonal and subjective. Giving the evolutionary process a Christian interpretation, Teilhard posited a spiritual power working within the evolutionary process, radial energy, which is powered by the attraction of the goal, the omega point of the reunification of all things in God. The principle at the heart of Christianity, the incarnation, requires that this telos cannot be realized apart from the participation of the whole material world. The eucharistic transformation celebrated on the church's altars is the paradigm of cosmic transformation. "Step by step it irresistibly invades the universe" in the one great Mass and Communion by which both humanity and the cosmos are changed (The Divine Milieu, 123-26). (4) Matthew Fox has popularized "creation spirituality," attacking the preoccupation of traditional Western Christianity with the individual self and its sin, and the separation of soul from body. Drawing upon scripture, upon those Christian mystics who have incorporated the world into their vision of the redemptive processes of God, and upon his own visions of the plight of the planet and the necessity for new spiritual paradigms, Fox seeks to re-form worship as a paean of praise to the Creator and to inspire a new praxis that will defend and restore Mother Earth. "What ritual essentially does is to awaken the human to his or her cosmic identity" (The Coming of the Cosmic Christ, 214). (5) Although Vatican II predated the more intense awareness of the ecological crisis, the call for justice which it issued implies justice for the earth as well. The Council decried economic systems whose only object is exploitation and "prodigious material growth" (P.C., 18ff), and sought obedience to the vision of "a new earth in which righteousness dwells" (L.G., 39). These themes were taken up by the Medellín Conference of Latin American bishops, which condemned the "internal colonialism" and "external neocolonialism" which exploit both the impoverished masses and the natural resources of third-world nations. Recognizing the legitimacy of these demands for justice, John Paul II has called for "solidarity" with exploited peoples and has pointed to the "evangelical duty" of the church "to take her stand beside the poor" (Sollicitudo Rei Socialis, 39f). Such concerns are readily transferable to solidarity with God's creation and the church's need to take her stand in behalf of the endangered planet. Genuine participation in worship contributes to the formation of Christians in this spirituality.

CREATIVITY, LITURGICAL

Liturgical creativity is the process by which succeeding generations make traditions of Christian worship their own, through exercise of the gifts of the Spirit in the church. Creativity in worship means calling forth the gifts of leaders and all participants. Among these gifts are the ability to write and speak prayers which express the faith and praise of the community; the ability to use space, the visual arts, and movement for fitting praise of God; and musical gifts. Liturgical creativity is not the same as liturgical innovation—for the goal is not to entertain through the novel, but to call forth authentic contemporary praise of God, whether in local, denominational, or ecumenical settings. Learning what is done in other worshipping communities can feed liturgical creativity, but creativity is not imitation, since it depends on the specific gifts and abilities in each worshipping community.

The process of evoking creative gifts for worship is not uniform, since it involves the working of the Spirit. However, some strategies can assist the process. First, leaders of denominations and congregations must find ways to honor and nurture gifts which can contribute to worship. Second, the work of planning and leading worship must be surrounded by prayer. Third, liturgical creativity requires a commitment of time as worship leaders and committees seek ways to speak to and from the heights and depths of Christian experience rather than seizing upon the first suggestion or resource that comes their way.

A particular challenge which calls on the creativity of planners and leaders of worship is to work with past traditions so that they continue to be intelligible and consistent with a community's theological understandings. For example, the early church drew on Jewish worship traditions while expressing distinctive Christian insights; thus the passover seder became the paschal liturgy. Sometimes the transition is linguistic, for example the movement from Latin to the vernacular or from King James to contemporary English. Sometimes the transition is theological, for example the revision of baptismal rites in the last three decades in accordance with a renewed theology of baptism and Christian mission. At times, transitions involve a radical change, when church leaders seek to bring out basic meanings and actions in rites which have lost their focus over time. In all cases, liturgical creativity calls for awareness of the piety and sensitivities of worshipping communities. It is important to understand what worship traditions mean to a community before revising or eliminating them.

In recent years, the Roman lectionary and other lectionaries based upon it have become a major source of liturgical creativity, as many Christian churches seek to give scripture a more central place in their worship. Hymns, anthems, and prayers composed in response to lectionary texts can enrich and unify Christian worship.

CREED, PRAYING THE

A creed is a concise, accepted, and approved statement of the central beliefs held by an individual or community, the classical instances in the Christian tradition being the Apostles' Creed and the Ecumenical Creed of Nicea-Constantinople. The Athanasian Creed, which found a minor place in the liturgy of the hours, is of a very different sort.

The Christian creed is at once a doxology that acclaims the glory of God, and a confession of praise and thanksgiving for what God has done in Christ Jesus. Through its public recitation in the eucharistic liturgy and its use in the rites of baptism, the creed expresses identity with the Christian community and a willingness to live a way of life motivated by the Lordship of Jesus Christ and the power of the Spirit. The repetition of the creed week by week in the Sunday eucharist narrates the saving events that are the basis of Christian faith: God's activity in creation, redemption in Jesus Christ, and presence in and through the Spirit who enlivens, enlightens, guides and heals the human and Christian communities.

The term "creed" derives from the Latin credo which means to put one's heart into something or to give oneself to someone or something. It thus implies commitment.

The Christian creeds have their origins in the baptismal ritual, though there are affirmations of a quasi-credal nature in some of the early NT writings. To assure the integrity of their faith, candidates for baptism were asked to affirm a short formula of Christian belief. These "interrogatory" creeds of the 2nd and 3rd centuries differed from place to place but were consistent in their trinitarian structure. In answer to three questions pertaining to belief in the Father, Son, and Spirit, the candidate would respond: "I believe" (credo).

The move from interrogatory to "declaratory" creeds was a consequence of the church's catechetical ministry. Declaratory creeds began to appear in the 3rd century as part of the catechetical instruction to baptism. These first-person affirmations were not simply assertions of belief in the triune God. This trinitarian belief is affirmed by making the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit the basic structure of the creed. By the 4th century, baptismal confessions of faith had become strikingly similar, and were nearly uniformly tripartite in structure, following Matthew 28:19.

Using baptismal creeds as a rule of faith and standard of orthodoxy spread rapidly during the 4th century with the Council of Nicea (325) and, especially, the Council of Constantinople (381). What has come to be popularly called the Nicene Creed is not that of the Council of Nicea, but the creed approved by the Council of Constantinople of 381. In the Middle Ages, the filioque (statement that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son) was added to it in the West.

The creed is recited publicly during the eucharist on Sundays and great feasts. Its recitation in the eucharistic liturgy is an act of praise and testimony, by which Christians confess before God and one another what God has done and is doing in and through Jesus Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit. The present practice of standing and reciting the creed of Nicea-Constantinople after the gospel and homily has its roots in local custom in Antioch in the 5th century, gradually spreading through East and West.

The recitation of the creed after the proclamation of the word in the gospel and the homily expresses the assembly's verbal response to the story of salvation proclaimed in the scriptures and celebrated most fully at the eucharistic table. When viewed as the assembly's active, verbal response to the story of salvation proclaimed in the scriptures, the dialogical nature of the creed, more apparent in the interrogatory credal formulas of the ancient church, may be more fully appreciated.

With the reform of the rites following the Second Vatican Council, the interrogatory form of the creed replaced the declaratory form in the baptismal liturgy, a practice more in keeping with the ancient rite of baptism as it was known in Rome at the beginning of the 3rd century. The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults restores the handing over or presentation of the creed, traditio symboli and the recitation or giving back of the creed, redditio symboli to the prominence they once enjoyed in the baptismal rites of the early church. In the final stages of preparation for initiation, a declaratory form of the creed is "handed over" to the catechumens, and "given back" or recited by them, while in the rite of baptism itself an interrogatory form of either the Apostles' Creed or the Ecumenical Creed of Nicea-Constantinople is used.

The Apostles' Creed and the creed of Nicea-Constantinople continue to be generally accepted by the Christian churches in the West. The creed has thus been promoted as a basis for Christian unity. It has also been proposed as a means for overcoming the gap brought about by the great schism between East and West. But this cannot finally be accomplished until the issue of the inclusion of the filioque is resolved.

The cross is one of the oldest symbols known in the world. It is found in primitive as well as advanced cultures. From the earliest records of humanity, the cross is found carved in stone, in metals, on shells, in pottery and in other materials. It would be a grave mistake to suppose the cross to be of exclusively Christian origin or even explicitly religious origin. For example, from existing records it is probable that the figures of crosses and circles were used as a game in antiquity. The meanings of these pre-Christian crosses are often obscure and sometimes interrelated. For example among Egyptian hieroglyphs, a cross with a loop at the top was known as the Cross of Horus, an Egyptian god. Bearing some reference to life, this symbol was adapted by the Phoenicians to represent their goddess Astarte, the one who offers life. The Greeks transfigured the Egyptian cross in displaying an image of their goddess of life. The Swastika cross is of Sanskrit origin. It appears in early emblems of the Buddhists and is still used by some Hindu sects to represent meanings such as good fortune.

The cross in the Christian era is a symbol rooted in the meaning of Jesus. The terminology associated with the cross in Christian worship, the representation of the cross in various forms of art, and the development of legends about the cross over the last two millennia have Jesus as their foundational reference.

Finding of the Cross

According to early Christian tradition, the mother of Constantine (St. Helena) found the three buried crosses on Golgotha in the 4th century. There are several reports concerning the verification of the "true cross" of Jesus. Some say it was verifiable due to a miracle which confirmed its identity; others say it was identified by a still legible title inscribed upon the cross. St. Ambrose in his Oratio de Obitu Theodos (395) offers the first written reference to the connection of the cross with Helena. Other early church fathers speak of the connection with variations on the theme, though curiously, St. Jerome never mentions the subject, even though he lived near the place where the discovery apparently took place.

Veneration of the Cross

The diary of a 4th century Spanish nun, St. Egeria (Etheria), describes in vivid detail the Holy Week services in Jerusalem, including a rite for veneration of the cross. This devotion seems to have spread to Rome in the church of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme where a piece of the true cross was taken and revered in a reliquary. Eventually the devotion spread to other churches which did not have the relic of Jesus' cross. It seems that it was not until Carolingian times that specific presidential prayers were required in association with this ceremony of veneration of the cross.

In the Latin rite of the Christian church today, a ritual veneration of the cross occurs on Good Friday. Ceremonies similar to this veneration occur in the Eastern churches on September 14, the feast of the Holy Cross/ Exaltation of the Cross. This feast originally celebrated the recovery of the true cross from the Persians by Emperor Heraclius in 629. The first clear record of this feast is by Pope Sergius (687-701).

Meanings of the Cross

True to the nature of a symbol, the significance of the cross is multivalent in its meanings. Jesus' cross communicates a contradiction: how could an instrument of death be a sign of life? It is a paradox of Christian faith that such a sign of ignominious death (cf. Dt 21:23) could reveal the divinity of a human person. Jesus' cross reminds the believer that God saves through the cross (1 Cor 1:17; Eph 2:16, Col 1:20, Gal 6:14). Belief in this fact allows a Christian to face the cross with a certain equanimity and trust in the power of God. Another significance of the cross is that it reveals the extent to which God has gone to manifest God's love for all people. The cross means freedom from slavery to selfishness (Rom 6:6). The cross means reconciling with God and neighbor, being willing and able to return to one another, face to face (Eph 2:16, Col 1:20, 2:14). The cross means renewing life in this world and finding life in the next (Gal 3:1, 6:14). The cross is the means of modeling Jesus (Gal 5:24). To be a true disciple and follower of Jesus, one must choose to take up the cross, even daily (Lk 9:23, 14:27; Mk 8:34; Mt 16:24).

Forms of the Cross

There is some evidence in the Church History by Socrates that St. John Chrysostom encouraged orthodox believers to carry a silver cross in procession to counter the hymn-singing Arians who processed at night at the end of the 4th century. At least by the end of the 6th century in the hymn Vexilla Regis Prodeunt composed by Fortunatus we find testimony to the existence of a processional cross. Numerous examples of different kinds of processional crosses remain since the Middle Ages. Also common during the Middle Ages was the placement of a cross as a central feature of the rood screen which separated the nave from the presbytery.

The form of the cross varies depending upon the rite, tradition, culture and particularities associated with a given saint or event which is being ritualized. Throughout Christian history, the cross has been depicted in scores of shapes, and there are countless varieties of decoration and embellishment surrounding the cross. The Western crosses tend to be more three-dimensional, while Eastern crosses tend to be more in the form of the icon. One design of the cross with a corpus of Jesus' beaten and bloody body attached to it is called a crucifix. There is some evidence that the crucifix dates to at least the 5th century. The early church emphasized the risen Christ, so only a lamb or another biblical symbol or the risen body of Jesus would adorn the cross. In 692 the Council of Constantinople ordered the presence of Jesus' human body on the cross and not, e.g., a lamb. The Carolingian period encouraged a more realistic portrayal of the extent of Jesus' suffering. This increasing emphasis upon stark, graphic realism about Jesus' wounded and bloody body reached its apex between the 12th and 14th centuries. By this point the crucifix replaced the cross as the object of veneration.

Placement of the Cross

Christian churches throughout the world today present the cross as one of their distinguishing symbols. A cross is frequently positioned in a prominent place, for example, atop a steeple or a bell tower of a Christian church. Perhaps a cornerstone, the side of a building, a doorway, a window, a wall, a ceiling, a floor, a tombstone will bear the mark of a cross. The list is far from exhaustive.

During the celebration of Christian worship, the presence of some form of the cross is not only desirable, but often required by Christian traditions. As early as the 5th century in Syria a cross was to be placed on the altar during Mass. Though required use of the cross on the altar was not widespread until the 13th century, soon afterwards the crucifix replaced the cross as a required piece of ceremonial. Yet it was not until the 1570 edition of the Roman Missal that the obligation of a crucifix upon the altar appeared. Prior to 1969 the Roman Catholic church required the crucifix as a central symbol on the altar. Since the recent post-conciliar liturgical reform, the guideline of the American Catholic bishops is to position a cross in a prominent place near the altar, but not on it.

Sign of the Cross

The gesture of signing someone or some thing or some place with the form of a cross is a way of designating a Christian relationship with God and praying for the growing significance of this relationship. This gesture is often used at sacramental celebrations and other Christian rituals.

From some evidence as early as the 2nd century, marking one's body with the sign of the cross was a form of Christian devotion. Sometimes a Christian signed the forehead (St. Basil mentions this); other times a Christian signed the breast or the eyes (and sometimes with the eucharistic bread), and later the entire upper body (5th century). One response to the monophysite heresy was the 6th century custom of signing the body using two fingers (expressing and cultivating the belief in the two natures of Christ) or three fingers (Trinity). In the West it was not until the directive of Innocent III (13th century) that the prescription of signing the body with three fingers and touching the right and then the left shoulder emerged. Later the directive was changed to open the entire hand and move from the left to the right shoulder.

The sign of the cross was customary in some forms of Christian liturgy by at least the 3rd century, for example, the bishop signed the newly initiated with a cross on the forehead (cf. Hippolytus c. 215). It was not until a 9th century decree of an episcopal synod that we find the rubric for the priest to make the sign of the cross over the offerings at Mass with the thumb and two fingers extended. It is unclear when a formula prayer associated with the gesture of the sign of the cross first entered the Christian tradition. The oldest formula seems to have been the trinitarian one, though the Eastern churches use other formula prayers as well.

The marking of the forehead, lips and heart with small signs of the cross by the thumb was a medieval development expressing a desire to open the mind to the word of God, to speak the Good News and to hold it carefully in the heart. The Reformation pruned from Christian liturgy the frequent repetition of signs of the cross within one service. With the advent of the Second Vatican Council, the Roman Catholic church also desired to remove accretions and embellishments which tended to obscure the central actions of Christian worship.

Way of the Cross

The Way of the Cross or the Stations of the Cross, as it is sometimes called, is a Christian devotion which arose as a pious practice to honor the sufferings and death of Jesus. It developed in imitation of the custom of visiting places in the Holy Land where the events of Jesus' passion and death are believed to have occurred. The Franciscans especially encouraged this devotion and it became popular in the 15th century. The number of stations and what scene is recalled before each station have varied over the centuries, though in modern times fourteen stations have been customary. Essentially this devotion includes the positioning of a cross in different locations and meditating before each station with prescribed prayers. Often these crosses are accompanied by an artistic rendering associated with the specific event connected with Jesus' suffering and death.

Throughout the history of Christianity many saints became associated with symbols which characterize them in Christian art. Traditionally many of these symbols include a cross; for example, the representations for the apostles Peter, Andrew, Philip and Simon the Zealot. Other saints whose symbolic representations characteristically include a cross are St. Lawrence and St. Ansanus and St. Margaret of Antioch (3rd century), St. Anthony the Great and St. Helena and St. Jerome (4th century), St. Ursula (5th century), St. Scholastica (6th century), St. Bernard (12th century), St. Bonaventura and St. Louis and St. Anthony of Padua (13th century), and St. Catherine of Siena (14th century).

CULTURE, LITURGY AND

Sustained and intensive concern for the cultural roots and contexts of Roman Catholic liturgy is one of the principal results of the Second Vatican Council. This concern received additional impetus with the completion of the process of textual and ritual revision in the mid-seventies and the recognition that the adaptation of the revised liturgy to various cultures would constitute a principal task of ongoing liturgical renewal.

This essay will examine the history of liturgical adaptation to culture, as well as the insights of Vatican II and the post-conciliar era on the cultural elements of liturgical reform. It will set forth the principal theological paradigms operative in post-conciliar thinking on the relationship between liturgy and culture and indicate some methodological aspects of critical study in this area.

The History of Cultural Adaptation

The emergence of the liturgical and ecclesial forms of early Christianity involved an intrinsic process of cultural creativity. The Christian eucharist is a study in the manner in which traditional Jewish prayer forms were infused with Christian meaning and incorporated into a new ritual synthesis. This process was accompanied by theological controversies about the appropriate relationship that should exist between the Christian and Jewish orders. A process of profound cultural creativity can be identified in diverse ways in the early history of other Christian rites and symbols.

In general, three elements of adaptation were operative in the formation of early Christian liturgy. The first was the movement to imbue the Jewish liturgy with Christian faith and to retain elements and institutional links with the religion of Israel. The second was the extension of the gospel into non-Jewish environments and the adjustment of the requirements made upon pagan converts to Christianity. The third was the advance of Christianity into non-Jewish environments and the recognition that Christian faith must engage the religious convictions and aspirations of pagan religions (Chupungco, 9). However, while Christian liturgy in the early period sought consciously to maintain its roots in the Jewish tradition, the growing alienation of Christians from the Jewish community led to the emergence of a Christian liturgical order independent of the Jewish background. At this time, Christian liturgy began to be marked by the influence of Greco-Roman culture, although this was accompanied by considerable conceptual caution about the dangers and corruptions of paganism.

With the recognition of Christianity as the state religion of the empire in the early 4th century, Christian rites took on a notably public and splendid character and began to be shaped by their celebration in the imperial basilicas. There is ample evidence of the influence of imperial court ceremonial on clerical and episcopal theology, ritual and vesture. The rites of initiation began to incorporate some elements from pagan usage and Christian prayer and teaching began to be influenced by pre-Christian formularies and conventions. The new cultural situation of the church led to a considerable loss of hostility toward pagan cult, although there began to emerge at the same time a certain caution about secular or "mundane contamination" (Chupungco, 20).

The Roman liturgy, fixed in its basic shape and character by the 7th century, incorporated a new set of cultural influences as it moved northward into Franco-Germanic territory. The relatively sober Roman liturgical ethos began to take on a more notably dramatic and expressive character. Notable influences of Franco-Germanic elaboration which became thereafter enduring elements of the Roman liturgy are found in the liturgy of Holy Week and especially the Easter vigil. The more elaborate liturgical life generated in the Franco-Germanic regions was eventually received back in Rome in the 10th century.

Toward the end of the medieval period, the development of the liturgy became more extensive than intensive as the liturgy gave rise to passion plays, dramatic representation of gospel events and extra-liturgical pageants of various kinds. The development of liturgical life in this direction was not surprising given the state of affairs by which the liturgy had become inaccessible to the people and no longer expressed in their language.

The reforms following the Council of Trent gave way to the Baroque "flare for festivity, external manifestations of grandeur and triumphalism" and to an excessively sensuous and ornate liturgical style (Chupungco, 34). In this period, the Roman liturgy began to be celebrated in a notably theatrical, even operatic, manner in keeping with contemporary cultural sensibility.

Perhaps the most celebrated attempt to adapt the Roman liturgy to a non-Western culture was that associated with Mateo Ricci and the missionaries to China in the early 17th century. The Jesuit missionaries proposed the incorporation into Catholic usage of Chinese terminology and sought a Christian adaptation of the traditional ancestral rites which were a profoundly constitutive element of Chinese piety. The controversies which erupted on this matter gave rise to the Roman Instruction of 1659 which distinguished between Christian faith and its European expression. The instruction recognized that Christian faith can make use of non-Christian rites and symbols and that these can serve as suitable instruments in the spread of the gospel. However, the outcome of the Chinese Rites Controversy, as it is called, was not a positive one and the experiment was finally grounded under a pall of official suspicion.

In general, the history of cultural adaptation in liturgical matters can be seen as the interaction of four elements, each operating to a greater or lesser degree at particular moments. The first is a desire to remain faithful to NT origins, themselves organically connected to the religious forms of Israel. The second is represented in the process by which the Christian liturgical order incorporates ritual forms and customs from non-Christian environments. The third is a periodic reassertion of a normative Roman liturgy, especially in moments of perceived ritual corruption or compromise. The fourth is the conscious attempt to conceptualize the relationship between the liturgical tradition and non-Christian cultures so that non-Christian elements may be used as vehicles of the gospel without compromising the gospel and the Christian tradition.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy

The intentions of the Second Vatican Council on liturgical matters are set forth in Article 21 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy which declares: "In order that the Christian people may more certainly derive an abundance of graces from the sacred liturgy, Holy Mother Church seeks to undertake with great care a general restoration of the liturgy itself" (S.C., 21). The article then goes on to assert that, "the liturgy is made up of unchangeable elements divinely instituted, and of elements subject to change. These latter not only may be changed but ought to be changed with the passage of time if they have suffered from the intrusion of anything out of harmony with the inner nature of the liturgy and have become less suitable" (ibid.).

The conciliar commitment to reform the liturgy by means of a recovery of the historic core of the Roman rite was complemented by a desire to adapt the liturgy to new cultural environments. The constitution declares: "The Church does not wish to impose a rigid uniformity in matters which do not involve the faith or the good of the whole community. Rather does she respect and foster the qualities and talents of the various races and nations" (S.C., 37). Accordingly, "anything in these peoples' way of life which is not indissolubly bound up with superstition and error she studies with sympathy, and, if possible, preserves intact. She sometimes even admits such things into the liturgy itself, providing they harmonize with its true and authentic spirit" (ibid.).

Provided that the substantial unity of the Roman liturgy is safeguarded, "provision should be made, when revising the liturgical books, for legitimate variations and adaptations to different groups, regions and peoples, especially in mission countries" (S.C., 38). The constitution recognizes the competence of local ecclesiastical authority to specify adaptations regarding the sacraments, sacramentals, processions, language, music and the arts. Article 40 allows for even more radical adaptation of the rites and prescribes that local ecclesiastical authority must "carefully and prudently consider which elements from the traditions and cultures of individual peoples might appropriately be admitted into divine worship." It prescribes that this process be carried out through a process of approved experimentation and involve the input of experts in cultural adaptation.

In accordance with these principles, the reforms of the liturgical books after

Vatican II provided for *accommodation*es by which individual ministers may adapt some ritual and textual elements to particular congregations and pastoral needs. They also provided for more formal adaptation of rites (adaptationes) by episcopal conferences which must be submitted for approval and confirmation by the Roman See.

Among the more significant examples of post-conciliar adaptation has been the program of the church in Zaire to modify its liturgy according to the local cultural environment. The stated principles undergirding the new rite are "fidelity to the values of the gospel; fidelity to the essential nature of the Catholic liturgy; and fidelity to the religious and culture heritage of Zaire" (Tovey, 35). Underlying the rite is a search for "authenticity that is truly Christian and truly African" (ibid.). The rite incorporates the vesture of tribal chiefs, dance, and the invocation of ancestors.

In North American Catholicism, liturgies adapted to various ethnic communities have been widely proposed. In particular, some attempts have been made to incorporate into the liturgy the musical traditions and festive elements of Hispanic and Black communities.

The practical difficulties of carrying out appropriate adaptation of rites, both in Western and non-Western countries, have proved to be considerable. Theoretical agreement on principles does not translate easily into practical consensus.

Liturgy and Culture: Four Paradigms

Modern discussions about the cultural adaptation of the liturgy are related to fundamental theological convictions about the relationship between the Christian tradition and human culture. In general, four paradigms to the faith/culture relationship appear to be operative in modern American Catholicism. These are the conservative, liberal, radical and neo-conservative.

The conservative paradigm maintains an absolute commitment to the inherited shape of Catholicism and has very little openness to modern culture. While conservatism often manifests strong commitment to traditional cultures in which religion and social life were integrated, it generally regards modern culture as inimical to authentic religious life and practice. Among the more notable examples of the conservative paradigm is the integralist movement in French Catholicism in the earlier part of this century. Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, founder of the Society of St. Pius X, remains the most notable representative of the conservative position today.

The conservative paradigm places strong emphasis on the cultural integrity and autonomy of Catholicism. The church, accordingly, is viewed as a perfect society and conceptions of doctrine and ecclesiastical practice generally have a classicist character which fails to account for change and development within the tradition.

In liturgical matters, this paradigm generates strong opposition to liturgical change or adaptation. It precludes the possibility of significant use of non-Christian ritual elements and symbols in the liturgy. Indeed, it takes a generally hostile attitude towards non-Christian religions, regarding them as defective vehicles for the gospel.

The conservative position is represented by those who reject or merely tolerate the liturgical revisions initiated by the Second Vatican Council. Adherents of this view generally opt for the normative character of the so-called Tridentine Mass and deny that the liturgy should be adapted or changed for cultural or pastoral reasons.

Cultural adaptation of the liturgy in this mode tends to be superficial and incidental. The project here is appropriately characterized as accommodation, whereby some local or native artistic elements or customs are allowed a minor role in liturgical celebrations. The principal concern, however, remains the integrity of the Latin rite in all its elements and expressions.

The liberal paradigm in modern Roman Catholicism is characterized by a commitment to intensive dialogue between the gospel and human culture. It has a strong openness to the religious significance of modern culture and the revelatory character of ongoing human experience. It seeks to overcome the rupture between Christian tradition and the modern world and tends to be optimistic about the congruence between the gospel and culture. It is enthusiastic about cultural pluralism, interreligious dialogue and the emergence of a world church incarnated in diverse cultures.

In liturgical matters, the liberal attitude is strongly committed to cultural adaptation. It is confident that Catholic liturgy can be extricated from its Roman and European forms and expressions. The project here is appropriately described as inculturation, whereby local ritual and symbolic forms are invested with Christian meaning. The goal is to create styles of worship that are authentically Christian, yet structured around the ritual and symbol systems of the particular culture. The project typically involves attempts to "baptize" some non-Christian rites, particularly those associated with passage and transition.

Liturgical inculturation is not, however, free from considerable ambiguity. The attempts to identify and adapt non-Christian ritual and symbolic forms as vehicles for Christian expression can easily be compromised by the internal dynamics and semantic tenaciousness of the forms themselves. Accordingly, the liberal project to wed Christian meanings and cultural forms has a tendency to underestimate the complexity of the project involved.

The radical paradigm is distinguished from the liberal by its commitment to a substantial reformulation of Christian faith. In general, radicalism has a limited and selective commitment to the inherited tradition and generally allows a hermeneutic of suspicion a central role in the appropriation of that tradition. The interest is not so much in opening the gospel or the Christian tradition to cultures as it is in generating a critique of both the gospel and human culture and establishing a new religious/cultural order. Accordingly, the radical project is often apocalyptic and millenarian. Radicalism favors a pluralistic view of religion, allowing other religions equal or similar status to Christianity and asserting the possibility of a number of Christ-figures or saviors. For these reasons, it is not committed to upholding the uniqueness of Christ or of Christian faith.

The radical dialogue between Christianity and other religions is appropriately described as inreligionisation, whereby Christianity undertakes a self-emptying into non-Christian religion so that a new religious order will emerge. What Christianity has to offer other religions in this paradigm is not particular forms or doctrines or an institutional order but a liberating dynamic for self-expression and freedom.

The radical approach is operative in some strands of Christian feminist thought and practice which seek a reconstruction of Christian tradition in order to overcome perceived structures of patriarchy, sexism and oppression. Some feminists, critical of both Christian tradition and patriarchal culture, promote a process similar to inreligionisation whereby Christianity enters into dialogue with non-Christian feminist and utopian traditions and generates new ritual and symbolic expressions.

In the radical paradigm, adaptation brings about a profound reconfiguration of inherited liturgical forms. It favors local religious elements and symbols and rejects those imported from other cultures. It accords scriptural status to non-biblical readings and gives narrative and mythic expression to minority or "suppressed" voices.

The neo-conservative paradigm shares with the conservative an absolute commitment to the priority of the Christian tradition, but is distinguished from it by a more sophisticated appreciation of change and development within the tradition. This paradigm shares with the liberal an appropriation of the positive values of human culture and the need for the church to have a credible presence in diverse cultural environments. However, it incorporates a fundamentally critical and cautious attitude toward modern liberal culture and is aware of the danger to Christian faith in a wholesale embrace of liberal values and philosophical schemes. Accordingly, neo-conservative scholarship is acutely attentive to social-scientific analysis of the anti-institutional, atomistic and individualistic character of modern culture.

Neo-conservatism allows that the church can accept from cultural encounter those elements that will enrich, but not compromise, the ritual and doctrinal integrity of the historic tradition. The point of synthesis is located within the church's historical tradition in such a way that cultural elements may be incorporated into the Church's life when that is deemed fitting, but not allowed to act as significant modifiers of the tradition. The neo-conservative paradigm generates a strong conviction of the creative power of Christian institutions and is skeptical about any project that allows American cultural experience a determinative role in modern Catholic renewal.

The neo-conservative paradigm also generates skepticism about the project to create a liturgical order adapted to modern secular culture. In the advancement of Catholic life in non-Western cultural environments, it promotes a process of acculturation rather than inculturation. By this is meant a process by which ritual and symbolic elements compatible with the Roman liturgical tradition are incorporated in a significant way. The process is one of purification and reorientation of cultural elements, of careful and critical assimilation of cultural forms to the Christian tradition. The neo-conservative approach rejects any discontinuity with the past and is opposed to substantial modifications of the given liturgical tradition. In the incorporation of new cultural elements, it is careful to ensure that developments in the church's liturgy are in continuity with the pre-existing tradition. It has, on the one hand, a strong conviction about the ability of the inherited forms of Catholic life to speak across cultures and, on the other, an appreciation of the inevitable distance that must mark the relationship of the gospel to all cultures.

These four paradigms of the faith/culture relationship are not, of course, rigidly self-contained or mutually exclusive. Considerable overlap is evident in theory and practice and, depending on the issue, there is considerable movement back and forth.

Developing Methodologies

The study of the relationship between liturgy and culture is carried on today in a variety of ways and incorporates methodologies developed in a number of different fields. The philosophical and scientific study of religion provides a general background to the cultural study of liturgical rites. The insights of the phenomenology of religion (Otto, Eliade, Van der Leeuw), philosophy (Ricoeur, Langer), psychology (Freud, Erikson, Jung), and sociology (Berger, Palmer, Bellah) have been usefully appropriated in the study of Christian rites. Of particular importance are the methodologies and findings of ritual studies, the study of popular religion, and the literature of cultural criticism.

Ritual studies is a relatively new field unifying the study of ritual traditionally carried out in the fields of anthropology, sociology, psychology and art criticism. Though the methodologies employed in ritual studies remain quite diverse, they share a common appreciation of the highly dynamic role of ritual and symbol in cultural and religious communities. Much of the work in the field is carried on through minute study of the internal dynamics of ritual elements and systems. An increasing number of liturgists have begun to attend to the operations of Christian liturgy through the insights that are gained from the field of ritual studies. Among the theorists whose work is relevant to liturgical studies are Victor Turner, Mary Douglas, Clifford Geertz and Ronald Grimes. Liturgical scholars are as yet, however, only at the beginning of the process of developing an adequate methodology for the application of ritual studies to the study of Christian liturgy.

An area of study that provides significant insight into the culture/liturgy relationship is that of folk or popular religion. Here attention is not so much upon non-Christian religious communities but upon traditional Catholic societies where a fusion of Catholic ritual and pre-Christian rites and customs has long been effected. While study in this area has traditionally embodied the conviction that folk religion represents a corruption of Christian practice and an unhealthy syncretism, more recent study has come to regard popular or folk religion as expressive of a positive and pastorally appropriate concretization of the gospel in particular cultures.

Impetus for a more positive appreciation of popular religion in Latin America was provided by the meetings of CELAM at Medellin in 1968 and at Puebla in 1978. The study of Hispanic folk religion has since then become an important feature of church life in both Latin America and North America. Considerable attention has also been devoted to the insights for liturgical adaptation that may be gained for the study of Filipino Catholicism, Black Christianity in North America and analyses of Polish, Spanish and Italian Catholicism.

The literature of cultural criticism also provides important elements of reflection for liturgical scholars concerned about cultural adaptation in modern secular societies. American culture critics (Lasch, Sennett, Meyerowitz, Bloom) have analyzed the individualistic, subjectivist and atomistic character of American culture and generated caution among some theologians and liturgists about the prospect of an indigenized American Catholicism. The compatibility of American culture with Roman Catholicism has been the source of debate among neo-conservatives, with some (Schindler, Olsen) arguing for fundamental incompatibility and others (Weigel, Novak, Neuhaus) arguing for a fundamental compatibility, despite the present disorder of American culture.

DANCE, LITURGICAL

The term liturgical dance refers to dance that is an integral part of a religious service. It may be practiced by a soloist, a group of dancers or the entire assembly of worshippers. Through its art form and communal involvement it can serve to deepen the prayer life of the congregation and enrich the celebration. Liturgical dance is formed by its function and purpose within the liturgy, with the reference point being how it serves the worship of the congregation. This entry will focus on history, theology and contemporary developments.

History

The roots of liturgical dance reach far back in time and connect with the wider field of sacred dance. Sacred dance is found in all primitive rituals, and together with drum and chant gave expression to the fundamental religious impulses of humankind. Among both western and eastern civilizations, and on every continent, including the great cultures of India, Tibet, Egypt, Greece and Africa, there is a tradition of sacred dance. In the Americas, from pre-Colombian South America to the native American cultures in the north, we find dance to be an indigenous expression of religion. Dance is a primary, universal mode of religious expression, testifying to a primeval sense of the union of body and soul.

Dance is also a rich part of Jewish tradition, and this heritage is often referred to by religious leaders and dancers as they seek historical roots in Judeo-Christianity. W. Gunther Plaut, and Bernard J. Bamberger (The Torah: A Modern Commentary, Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 1981) state that there are at least eleven Hebrew words denoting dance, and suggest that ritual choreography was extensive and well-developed. There is "a time to mourn and a time to dance" (Eccl 3:4). There were victory dances, dances connected to courtship and wedding, dances to celebrate the harvest. On Sukkoth, a religious festival of thanksgiving and gathering, there were ritual dance processions around the altar, followed by torch dances and the waving of festive palm branches. And the psalms tell us of dances in praise of God: "Let them praise his name with dancing, making melody to him with timbrel and lyre!" (Ps 149).

The Hasidic Jews to this day sway in prayer, dance alone or in a circle, holding one another's shoulders or waists. On the feast of Simhat Torah the rabbi dances, holding the Torah (the book of the Law) close to his heart. Dance was such an ingrained aspect of Jewish religious expression that it was not seen as implying assimilation of practices of the surrounding cultures. When Israelites danced around the golden calf, it was their lapse into idol worship that was deplored, and not that they danced.

While dance remained a part of the Jewish community, various factors seem to have contributed to the gradual decline of dance in the early Christian church. The church was in the process of forming its own identity, and therefore separating itself from the customs of the Jewish community, including dance. It was rejecting at the same time the Roman culture and the "degraded" forms of dance within pagan worship. Finally, the church was being influenced by Greek platonic philosophy that separated the soul from the body. In the Hebrew tradition there has been no such separation, but rather the understanding that we are by nature unified beings.

We must also consider the great cultural change that arose with the official acceptance of Christianity by Constantine, which resulted in major changes in the style of Christian worship. Small, private gatherings of Christians were replaced by a more grandiose and formal style of worship in huge basilicas. The priest no longer sat among the people. The seat of the bishop was removed from the center where the congregation was, to the apse, and later the altar was placed there as well. The ultimate and spontaneous relationship among people was altered, and this change in spirit inevitably affected the practice of dance (Gagne, Kane, VerEecke, pp. 42, 43).

Throughout the early church and during the Middle Ages the struggle continued between approving of dance as a scriptural symbol and metaphor for heavenly bliss, and the actual dance as practiced by the people. The Fathers of the Church viewed dance as a pastoral issue and their sermons and writings colorfully reflect the above dichotomy. St. Ambrose, Bishop of Milan (340-397), referred to King David's dance (2 Sam 6:14) as a model for the performance of sacred dance. After admonishing against indecent dances, he goes on to say: "No, David when he danced before the ark of the Lord, for everything is right which springs from the fear of God. Let us not be ashamed of a show of reverence which will enrich the cult and deepen the adoration of Christ. . . . But thou, when thou comest to the font, do thou lift up thy hands. Thou art exhorted to show swifter feet in order that thou mayest thereby ascend to the everlasting life. This dance is an ally of faith and an honoring of grace." [On Repentance 11. 6:42 (See, M.F. Taylor, A Time to Dance, Philadelphia United Church Press, 1967, p. 77)].

On the other hand, John Chrysostom (345-407) stated, "For where dancing is, there is the evil one. For neither did God give us feet for this end, but that we may walk orderly . . . that we may join the choirs of angels" (Gagne, Kane, VerEecke, p. 50).

During the Middle Ages the best known expressions of dance were associated with the Feast of Fools, the Children's Festival, and the Dance of Death, as well as dances that took place in churchyards to celebrate the victory of martyrs and dance processions for healing in which relics of saints were carried.

In Spain there is an unbroken tradition of liturgical dance known as los seises, six or twelve boys in two sets dance before the altar in a minuet style with castanets. Los seises continues to be performed for the feasts of Corpus Christi and the Immaculate Conception, in Seville and Toledo as part of the Mozarabic rite.

In our times, renewed interest in religious dance has its beginning in the liturgical movement and the liturgical reforms of Vatican II which reaffirmed the importance of the body and the active participation of the faithful in the liturgy. "To promote active participation, the people should be encouraged to take part by means of acclamations, responses, psalms, antiphons, and songs, as well as by actions, gestures, and bodily attitudes... "(Sacrosanctum concilium, 30).

The division in our culture of all aspects of life into either sacred or secular categories makes it difficult for persons not familiar with the potency of dance for religious expression to conceive of its place in the liturgy. Pope Paul VI, desiring to heal the split between the church and her artists, addressed the artists of Rome with these heartfelt words: "We need you. Our ministry has need of your collaboration because, as you know, our ministry is that of preaching and rendering accessible, comprehensible, even soul-stirring, the world of the spirit, the world of the invisible, of the ineffable, of God..." (Rome, Sistine Chapel, 1964).

Theology

The following brief discussion of a supportive theology of dance is derived from the work of J.G. Davies and is founded on an understanding of human nature based on the biblical view of the person as a unified being. One does not possess a body and soul. Each person is a body-soul unity. St. Paul wrote, "Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ?" (1 Cor 6:15), and "... you are the body of Christ..." (1 Cor 12:27). Our very selves are the body of Christ, the living sacrifice to God. To be created in the image of God affirms our material spiritual unity. The body cannot be dismissed as separate and irrelevant to human spiritual life. Just as sacraments are material channels of divine grace applied to the human body, dance is not only a physical activity. It illuminates and inspires because it enhances material-spiritual unity. We are exhorted to glorify God in our bodies (1 Cor 6:19-20). We are present to one another and to God in our bodies.

God has created the cosmos, God has created matter. Matter cannot be anti-spiritual, but instead is a vehicle of blessing. All the sacraments of the Christian church are channels of divine grace through matter, and their administration involves movement and gesture which are necessarily minimal "dances." We pour the water of baptism; we break the bread of the eucharist; we lift our arms in prayer. With these movements we are already dancing and expressing through our unified body-soul the divine presence and action.

The sacred movements of the sacraments are signs of the advent of the Kingdom of God in our midst. In the Hebrew Scripture, dance in particular was a sign of God's favor and grace. There is no reason why it should be anything less for Christians.

Contemporary Developments

By their nature great gatherings and festivities call for music and dance, and dance has indeed been a part of the celebrations of the universal church. Dance was part of the 38th International Congress in Bombay, 1973, the 40th International Congress in Melbourne and Nairobi, 1975, and the 41st Eucharistic Congress in Philadelphia, 1976. Dance has also been included in the ceremonies surrounding papal visits to various countries, notably in Montreal, 1984, under the direction of Fr. Jacques Dubuc. Fr. Dubuc recently stated in the Montreal newspaper, LeDevoir, March 1989, that reintegrating the body at the heart of eucharistic liturgies renders more accessible and credible the mystery of the "Verbe incarné." Perhaps of greatest significance as a model for future official inclusion of dance in liturgical rites is the recent approval of the Roman Rite for the Diocese of Zaïre, fall 1987. In this rite dance plays as integral a role as does music throughout the liturgy.

The essay on dance in the churches, published in Notitiae, II, in 1975, has had a negative effect on liturgical dance in the United States. It affirms the use of dance in cultures where dance is still a reflection of religious values, such as the Syriac, Ethiopian and Byzantine traditions, but looks dubiously on dance in western culture, stating that dance is considered to be primarily connected with diversion and profaneness. This document is considered a reference point for study and offers a challenge for contemporary Christian dancers and religious teachers to affirm the inherent spiritual value of dance that is rooted in the cultural and religious expression of the people.

In the United States today the styles of dance are multiform, ranging from folk to classical ballet and modern dance. Led by Mexican, native and African American traditions, folk dances from all the cultures that have settled America are available to us. Many of these dance traditions find expression in paraliturgical celebrations, such as wedding parties, and can be adapted to liturgical celebrations as a natural, sacred expression of culture. At the conclusion of their Easter liturgy, the Benedictine monks of Weston Priory in Vermont annually perform international folk dances. The folk dance, among its other merits, can serve to bridge the distance between clergy and lay people.

The beautifully disciplined dance styles of ballet, modern and jazz, along with the dance/movement meditations of Yoga, T'ai Chi and similar traditions, are increasingly part of the American consciousness. America has produced some of the outstanding leaders of the dance world, including Ruth St. Denis and Isadora Duncan, who may be considered one day "founding mothers" of sacred dance in this country. Martha Graham, José Limon, Erik Hawkins, Alvin Ailey, to name but a few more contemporary figures, are a rich heritage for dancers seeking movement inspiration for sacred works. The writings and performances of these great artists attest to the depth of their spiritual search. It is precisely because we do not have a handed-down tradition of sacred dance, as in India for example, that these diverse schools are so important. With discernment and adaptation, they have much to offer to the development of a rich vocabulary of sacred dance movements for inclusion within the church.

Liturgical dance has been slowly and quietly developing in the United States. Workshops on sacred dance held throughout the country have been major opportunities for sharing and growth. Requests for both workshops and trained dancers come from retreat centers, high schools and colleges, religious orders, including monasteries and convents, as well as individual churches. The Sacred Dance Guild, founded in 1958, is an inter-faith organization that holds annual conferences on all aspects of sacred dance.

Dance expresses the whole range of human emotions, and therefore is ideally suited for the major feast days and seasons of the church calendar. During Advent dances are part of the procession with the wreath, and prayer gestures may accompany the lighting of the candles. Christmas is a time that has been favorable to the inclusion of dances for children along with adults in celebration of the Nativity. Dancing extends into Epiphany with processions, often to carols, depicting the coming of the Magi. During Lent there are dances choreographed to express both the penitential side of the season and the mystery of Jesus' suffering on the cross. Palm Sunday dances often incorporate the use of palms; dances at Easter seem to spring forth like the flowers, joyous and exuberant. Pentecost has inspired dances that are intense, vibrant and sweeping in nature, like the wind and the tongues of flame.

Dance should be conceived with the overall flow of the liturgy in mind, and be included in such a way as to be an integral part of the worship. It should never be regarded as a spectacle or merely as ornament. The length and appropriateness of the dance is determined by its function in the liturgy and follows generally the same guidelines used for choosing the music. The style of dancing, including use of costumes, will vary from church to church and season to season, should reflect the solemnity or festivity of the day, and bear in mind the congregation it serves.

Dance lends itself to processions, including the gospel procession and the presentation of gifts. The psalm, which customarily follows the first reading, may be both sung and danced. A solo dancer or small dance choir may perform the verses while the congregation joins with appropriate gestures to the antiphon. Simple dance gestures and movements for the entire congregation can easily be taught in a few minutes before the service begins. Dance can stylistically enact the gospel, or guide a meditation on it or other readings of the day. Dance can accompany the acclamation of faith, or the Great Amen. Dance can include the entire congregation in line and circle dances at the conclusion of the liturgy (Gagne, Kane, VerEecke, pp. 95-115).

The contribution of dance to the liturgy is inseparable from its quality of inspired movement and the aesthetic, religious and spiritual values that underline its expression. In the document Environment and Art in Catholic Worship. (National Conference of Catholic Bishops, 1978, 4) we read, "God does not need liturgy; people do, and people have only their own arts and styles of expression with which to celebrate." Concerned with establishing guidelines for art in liturgy, they discuss the experience of mystery: "... a simple and attractive beauty in everything that is used or done in liturgy is the most effective invitation to this kind of experience. One should be able to sense something special (and nothing trivial) in everything that is seen and heard, touched and smelled, and tasted in liturgy" (ibid., 12). The art has to be of high quality, and "be capable of bearing the weight of mystery, awe, reverence and wonder which the liturgical action expresses" (ibid., 20).

The ministry of liturgical dance serves the community with the uniqueness of its gifts. By perceiving, gathering, shaping and celebrating in dance the religious hopes, struggles and joys of the people, it offers an enriched experience of the fullness of life. Keeping focused on the spiritual meaning of dance, we do not become overly preoccupied with preconditioned habits of mind regarding "propriety." As Thomas Merton reminds us, "... we are invited to forget ourselves on purpose, cast our awful solemnity to the winds, and join in the general dance" (New Seeds of Contemplation, New York: New Directions, 1961).

Liturgical dance has a healing and prophetic role to play in the church and for the world. It is not "icing on the cake." It epitomizes our relation to our bodies and by extension our relation to the earth. Redeeming the body and redeeming the earth are connected. In today's world, our earth is in trouble. The earth is dancing a passion. The vibrations of the earth's dance resound in everyone of our cells and the liturgical dance calls us to respond to the anguish around us with a reaffirmation of the spirit. The dance and the dancer may shake us from our lethargy to a positive re-engagement to help restore the earth's harmony.

Hugo Rahner, quoting Lucian of Samosata (Man at Play, NY: Herder & Herder, 1972) states: "Those who most accurately describe the genealogy of the dancer's art declare that its origin is the same as the world itself, and that it appeared together with that primal eros that is the beginning of all things. ..."

DE LA TAILLE, MAURICE (1872-1933)

Jesuit theologian, professor of theology at Angers and later at the Gregorian University in Rome, de la Taille was a major early figure in the 20th century attempt to rescue sacramental theology, and especially eucharistic theology, from the lifeless abstractions of post-Tridentine manual theology. With specific interest in the eucharist, he sought to unify two dimensions of eucharistic faith that had been kept apart, both in the decrees of Trent and afterwards: eucharist as sacrifice and eucharist as sacrament. Under the title Mysterium fidei, The Mystery of Faith (1940), he sought to hold together the Lord's Supper and the cross, a unity now taken for granted, but quite controverted in his day. He stands in the tradition of Odo Casel (1886-1948), seeking to recapture for Christian worship the category mystery, a category officially captured in Mystici corporis (1943) and Mediator Dei (1947) of Pius XII, claimed in abundance in the documents of Vatican II (esp. S.C. and L.G.), and continued as now common parlance for Christian worship in, e.g., Eucharisticum mysterium (1967) and Paul VI's Mysterium fidei (1965).

DEACON

In the history of the church, the role and ministry of the deacon has varied. Always it has been a diakonia, a service, at times to the word, at times to the praying assembly, at times to the bishop.

In current Roman Catholic church order, the deacon is ordained and assigned to assist the bishop and the presbyter in the ministry of word and sacrament. In other church orders, and specifically in the Eastern churches, the deacon is always an auxiliary liturgical minister. Deacons assist; they do not preside. In current Roman Catholic church order, deacons both preach and preside: at the liturgies of baptism, matrimony, and at times Christian burial. Their ordained ministry is therefore far more linked to the ministerial priesthood than it has been to date. In the ministry of preaching and proclaiming the gospel they make present Christ in his word (S.C., 7), and in the ministry of presiding they present and represent both the episcopate (the pastoral office of the bishop) and Christ (prophet, priest, and ruler). In the Roman Catholic ordination rite for deacons, the deacon is presented with the gospel as the primary instrument and sign of the diaconal office: "Receive the gospel of Christ whose herald you are; believe what you read, preach what you believe, and put into practice what you preach" (rite of commissioning). Deacons are recipients of the sacrament of orders; the term "lay deacon" as applied to deacons in the sacramental churches who do in fact ordain deacons is inaccurate.

DEATH, MINISTRY AT THE TIME OF

Pastoral care for the dying and their families involves a special type of compassionate presence. This section will concentrate on a variety of approaches to this presence, emphasizing both the initial stages of ministry and the more immediate companionship during the final days and hours of life. How can a pastoral minister develop a strong relationship with the seriously ill and their families before the last days and what is involved in quality pastoral care as death approaches?

Initial Stages of Pastoral Care

The most effective way of assuring valuable pastoral presence at the time of death is for the minister to establish strong pastoral relationships with the seriously ill and their families as far in advance of the last days as possible. This is especially important because most of the crises in a person's faith occur over a period of time when emotional and physical health is stable enough to concentrate on their relationship with God. Ministers, therefore, need to be available during this grappling with faith in order to assist those facing death to come to an eventual peace with themselves and with God before the final days of life. Often people encountering terminal illness experience a battle with God concerning the reason for their sickness and God's role in it. They also review their lives in an attempt to find meaning and purpose. Mourning and grieving the major losses of their lives can be a painful and lonely process. Gradually most dying persons reach a point where they find an abiding sense of hope and trust and where they can leave the past and the future to God and live as fully as possible in the present.

In struggling with all of these aspects of preparing for death, the seriously ill benefit greatly from pastoral companions who have the time, the patience, the expertise and the trust to be present to them over the weeks and even months prior to the end of life. When the final vigil before death does begin, it becomes a deep consolation for the ill person and for the family and friends to have with them a pastoral minister who has accompanied them along the road from the very beginning.

Frequently a pastoral companion is called upon during both the initial and later phases of a terminal illness to act as a mediator between the seriously ill person and health care personnel, especially the physicians and nurses responsible for primary care. Although great sensitivity may be shown by medical personnel toward the patient, sometimes individuals and their loved ones become bewildered and anxious about what treatment is being pursued, about what medical care decisions need to be made, and about what comfort measures can be assured. Chaplains who are familiar with these concerns can encourage them to ask questions directly of the care-givers and can at the same time urge physicians and nurses to explain their answers and approaches in understandable and compassionate ways. When there are decisions about medical procedures which must be made, with input from both the dying person and the family, pastoral ministers as counselors and as members of a religious tradition can help them reach conclusions which respect life while not prolonging suffering unnecessarily. Their own experience in ministering with and to the dying will teach chaplains how important it is for families, both at the bedside of their dying relative and after death, to have made responsible and caring decisions about treatment. Without being intrusive, pastoral companions can offer their guidance to families in making these determinations so that later on they will live peacefully with the quality of care they provided their loved one.

Another one of the most valuable services which a chaplain can offer persons with serious illness and their families is to facilitate communication among themselves. Sometimes it is very painful to observe members of a family expending a great deal of energy shielding one another from their real feelings and reactions. Each individual may express emotions to some "outsider," fearing that it would be too difficult to be that direct with loved ones. Pastoral ministers often notice the emotional isolation which this approach produces, an isolation that keeps at odds with one another the very people who could potentially offer the best mutual support. By listening individually or in groups to family members who want to express their fears, worries, regrets, confusion, and hope, chaplains can affirm their feelings and then begin to encourage them to let the ill person know how they are reacting. If they are able to identify what makes them hesitate being honest before each other, then their anxieties have less control over them and they might take the risk of being more open. Because pastoral companions with the dying frequently notice that this directness brings tremendous relief and comfort, they can work skillfully and patiently to facilitate this communication, realizing that it will offer much consolation for everyone during the last days of life and in their mourning afterwards.

The celebration of the sacraments, especially reconciliation, communion and the anointing of the sick, represents another aspect of this initial ministry that helps prepare critically ill persons and their families to let go with trust in God. Clearly these sacramental celebrations are appreciated most readily by those who have been regularly involved over the years in the practice of their faith. When Roman Catholics who have participated in a local parish community and have valued the explicit support of their Christian faith are confronted with the trauma of serious illness, they often spontaneously seek the comfort of the sacraments. They bring to them a deeply nourished faith in the Lord. Others who face critical illness may not have been as involved in church communities, but may still appreciate the celebration of the sacraments, particularly after preparatory conversations with ministers who can expand their notions of reconciliation, communion and anointing. However, whether there is a history of participation in the sacraments or not, there is an indispensable need to plan these liturgical celebrations in the context of the pastoral relationships.

Over a period of time, chaplains become acquainted with the ill persons and with their families. They come to know their histories, attitudes, patterns of interactions, faith struggles, shared successes and tragedies, and their apprehensions as they approach death. In offering to celebrate the sacraments with them, pastoral ministers provide occasions for communal prayer which highlight and at the same time enhance the compassion of God as it may be experienced in the context of the ongoing love and concern among all who are involved with the dying person.

When the reality of their dying has had time to penetrate and they have begun to come to terms with their life and their death, seriously ill persons may approach their pastoral minister for help in preparing their funeral liturgy. By responding positively to this request, chaplains participate in a process that can contribute to an integration for the dying person and can be a source of peace for the family. In choosing scripture readings and hymns, in reflecting on the funeral homily and in naming specific loved ones to take part in the liturgy, the critically ill will often talk aloud about the meaning which their life has had and what brings them satisfaction and gratitude as they come to the end. They might articulate how God has been with them throughout life and especially now during their illness and dying. They may wonder about life after death and seek help from the chaplain in deepening their trust in God to take care of them after they die.

With families also there can be many opportunities during this time of preparing a funeral liturgy for reviewing the life they have shared with their dying loved one and with one another. Sometimes pastoral companions find themselves standing with family members who reevaluate their own faith and practices of faith as they are confronted with death and the meaning of their own lives. Whenever this funeral planning occurs together with the dying, their family and their pastoral minister, it helps everyone get in touch with the sources of their hope which will sustain them in the days ahead.

Pastoral Care at the Time of Death

As serious illness gradually depletes the sick person, leaving him or her weaker and weaker, and as death becomes more imminent, pastoral ministers are called upon to offer a unique type of presence. Since the seriously ill person is no longer struggling with looking back on life to discover meaning and purpose and has for the most part laid the past to rest, living one day at a time, chaplains discover that there is more silence in their visits, both with the dying person and with family members. Quite frequently relatives and friends become disturbed by this silence, particularly when they interpret it as rejection on the part of their dying loved one. They need reassurance from ministers that this lack of verbal communication is normal as a person approaches death and lets go of life. Although families may have been prepared for a death through weeks or months or even years of illness, they can become overwhelmed during the final days, experiencing a sense of anxiety or shock or confusion. A chaplain who has become a trusted friend during the time prior to the final vigil can offer a listening ear and heart to them, encouraging their expression of feelings. As the end draws near, a pastoral companion shows much compassion in gently urging the relatives to let their loved one die, to allow themselves and the dying person to let go.

During the last days or hours of a person's life a pastoral minister can offer valuable companionship. It is not a question of many words, but rather a quiet presence which supports all those around the bed of the dying person. By suggesting to the family that they hold the hand of their loved one or moisten parched lips or wipe a perspiring forehead, or by saying a short, simple prayer for God's loving presence, by making a sign of the cross on the dying person's forehead, by staying at the bedside while family members take a break, by all of these common-sense, straightforward gestures, they will speak more loudly of real care than do multiplied prayers and repeated rituals.

If the minister is present at the moment of death, there are some other practical approaches which can bring solace to the survivors. Suggesting that they touch the body and that they talk to it, assuring each of them some privacy if they wish to say good-bye individually, holding the hand of a family member or putting an arm around their shoulders, and letting one's own tears flow, if they are there, will support the family profoundly at a time which is deeply emotionally charged. After relatives and friends have had the chance to say good-bye, a brief prayer by the chaplain often brings closure to the vigil at the bedside and gives permission to the family to leave.

During the days and weeks which follow death, pastoral companionship continues for the family, sometimes by participating in or leading the funeral and afterwards by maintaining periodic contact with the survivors. It can happen frequently that the impact of a death really doesn't hit home for a family until after the funeral, even when they have anticipated the loss for some time. When they do begin to experience the strong feelings and memories relatives will benefit from a chaplain's compassionate listening. The chaplain and pastoral ministers can help them readjust their relationships with one another as part of their grieving, and can offer comfort by assuring them that they will eventually reach a peaceful equilibrium.

There can also be a second-guessing about medical decisions by the family, as they rethink and judge in retrospect their care of their loved one. With gentle firmness a minister may need to remind them that they made the best decisions possible in the circumstances and that, even if there are regrets, they need to move on and be understanding with themselves. Noticing that certain members of a family may be having a more difficult time in their mourning, chaplains might recommend some assistance from a grief counselor or from a support group. Encouraging this kind of help during the first few weeks of grieving invariably prevents serious readjustment difficulties later on. Because friends and relatives often scatter right after a funeral, those closest to the deceased may feel abandoned and disoriented. A sensitive pastoral companion who has known the family through an illness and a death can offer invaluable attention and care to help people experience peace and then move on with living.

After the death of a seriously ill person there is usually a need for care-givers, those who looked after the individual and the family, to mourn their loss and to become comfortable with the way they helped the person to die. Pastoral companions can help in this process by sharing their grief and by structuring a simple memorial service where the care-givers can remember and pray together. Because the end of a person's life can be quite abrupt for medical and other staff and since they are expected to carry on with their care of others, the sadness, the tenderness and sometimes the anger within them doesn't receive enough attention. In order to put the deceased person to rest and to continue to be engaged with other seriously ill women and men, care-givers require the opportunity to pay attention to their own and to one another's feelings. Chaplains who spend time with them and urge them to express their reactions contribute to their experiencing a sense of enrichment from their relationships of care and enable them to let themselves be involved again and again with others who face the trauma of critical illness and dying.

How the Chaplain Grieves

Anyone who chooses to be pastorally present with the dying and their families is forced to learn how to handle personal grief in healthy ways. When true pastoral care is based on compassion by which ministers allow their hearts to be touched by the suffering of their sisters and brothers, they will inevitably experience their own pain of loss after the death has occurred. Sadness, loneliness, emptiness, frustration, regrets and other emotions can leave a chaplain depleted. Learning how to share some of these feelings, at least with one other individual, and reviewing the pastoral relationship with the family, can console the minister and provide some awareness of the meaning of his or her pastoral care. In their prayer, chaplains often are able to discover the gratitude of Christ which heals them and energizes them to reinvest in the lives of other dying persons and their families. Relaxing and enjoying life, creatively using leisure time and nourishing good friendships are also essential in helping pastoral companions to find new life amid the encounters with death.

Conclusion

Christian ministry at the time of death is a gift of the Spirit given to some of God's people. Those who accept it and enter into it will continually find their hearts expanded and their lives enriched, but they come to this only through feeling some of the fears and pain of individuals and families who struggle with the mystery of dying and death. When chaplains approach each person and each family as unique, not trying to categorize or capture the varied ways of dying, they learn over and over a deep respect for the human spirit, sustained by God that refuses to be broken even by the powerlessness and helplessness of death. For pastoral ministers the greatest satisfaction in accompanying the dying is not so much their growing in understanding what serious illness and death are all about, but rather that their encountering the loving face of Christ in the fragility of their brothers and sisters.

DEATH, THEOLOGY OF

Death seldom stands in the center of Christian theology, yet it is an ultimate in human existence. It forces upon us the most serious questions about the meaning and goal of human life, about the very existence of meaning and goal. Faced with the inevitability of death, we feel threatened by forces outside and within ourselves. Faced with the bewildering complexity of our life threatened by death, the ability to remain centered is an ever-present challenge. Every epoch has its own answer to the question of death, but the inadequacy of each answer inevitably leads every new generation to pursue the search. Whatever answer may be given to the question of death, it cannot be given in terms of ideas and concepts, or in abstract generalities.

Death is the one basic reality that makes most manifest that the human participates in the biological and the cultural. As human beings, we live at the edge of a paradox. We belong both to nature and to culture and are consistently affected by the ambivalence of such a situation. Death as an inevitable fact of human existence can be perceived only from within the interplay of biology and culture. Death is as much a social event as a biological one; it is overlayed with symbolic and ritualistic meaning. We can secure our sense of death only from images, from symbols and rituals. In symbols the truth about life and about death is disclosed to us. Symbols light up our experience and give coherence to our existence, enabling us to be human. Far from being unsymbolizable, the language of death is the symbol.

These symbols are not creatures of fancy; they have their roots in the polarities and binarity of human existence, in the ongoing interplay of the negative and the positive. Christianity's answer to the questions of life and death is a complex of symbols: the paschal mystery. The decisive images are of Jesus Christ, of his life, death and resurrection. The images are those of birth, death and rebirth: their emphasis is on life graciously given, graciously sustained—death no longer stands as the ultimate fact, but as the penultimate.

Death in the Old Testament

For both Hebrew and Christian scriptures, the central issue in death is a theological one: the character of God. The OT, reflecting Israel's experience, has no single view of death. Life and death are not simply presented as logical opposites, for both belong to human existence as it issues from God. In the Rabbinic tradition, death is usually seen as a normal part of created existence; Adam, created out of dust, returns to dust. Death is a natural limitation to existence. Death is one thing when it comes to an elderly person, and another when it comes to a young person. In light of the creation story, death can be viewed as the consequences of sin.

Yet the basic concern in the Hebrew scriptures is for life. The God of Israel is the Living One (Deut 5:26; 2 Kgs 19:4; Ps 42:3). God is the source of and giver of life (Ps 36:9). Coming so fully from God, life must be considered as the highest of God's gifts; life is God's original blessing. Life is shalom or well-being; it is the good life in the here and now.

Since life issues from God, and from God alone, it is not an autonomous and inherent power of human existence, but is it totally dependent on God. It is God who gives life; it is God who withdraws life; God has authority over both life and death. "Good and evil, life and death, poverty and riches are from the Lord" (Sir 11:14). An essential dimension of life is the right relationship to God, for life is not understood simply as bios but as life-with-God. Death can therefore be understood as opposed to life in all of its manifestations. Death is all the non-life experienced in the course of one's existence: adversity, suffering, oppression, sickness. Death itself, though, is irreversible for once one is in Sheol, there is no deliverance. "For there is hope for a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again and that its shoots will not cease. . . . But man dies and is laid low; man breathes his last, and where is he?" (Job 14:7-10).

The influence of divine power seems to come to an end at the threshold of Sheol. Death is an event that comes between God and the individual, for death sets the seal for separation from God. Death is relationlessness, for Sheol is a realm of God's absence. "I am like one forsaken among the dead . . . like those whom thou dost remember no more. For they are cut off from thy hand" (Ps 88:5).

In the OT there is a certain ambivalence concerning death. On the one hand, death is a limitation of human existence wanted by God, yet as a situation of unrelatedness to God, of disconnectedness, it can also be understood as a punishment on the part of God, as something unnatural, even as a curse (Gen 2:17; 3:19). And here lies the ambiguity of the OT concept of death. How can God be source of life, as shalom, and of death, as relationlessness. Since death has no power of its own and dualism plays no role in the OT, death becomes a question about God. Israel was essentially agnostic when it came to questions concerning the afterlife. Immortality was conceived in light of Israel's ideas of corporate personality: Israel as the basic unit of existence will remain. Yet the destiny and eternal salvation of the individual was bound to arise. Such questioning begins in the post-exilic period (Dan 12:2; 2 Macc 7). The breakthrough is clearly the result of Israel's on-going faith in God as the living God whose life-giving presence must overcome death itself. Relationship to God must survive death itself.

Death in the New Testament

For Christianity from its beginning death became redefined by the death and resurrection of Jesus. In life and in death we are under the lordship of Jesus Christ. By taking death upon himself, God has set us free both to live and to die. "If we live, we live to the Lord, and if we die, we die to the Lord; so then, whether we live or whether we die we are the Lord's" (Rom 14:8). In the NT, the question of death takes on a moral and theological dimension. "The last enemy to be destroyed is death" (1 Cor 15:26). Finitude and mortality are essential components of the finite embodied human condition. As such they are not sinful; they become an occasion for sin when they become the ultimate concern of human existence, when life is all that is sought for. When that happens mortality becomes "death" in the Pauline sense. And death enters into the theological realm.

Paul says that to be in sin is to be under the domination of death. Death in this sense is the ongoing attempt to hold on to life as one's own possession. The terror of death is the fear of losing ourselves. The wages of sin is death, for the roots of sin is domination and possessiveness. Death becomes an enemy apart from relation to God the giver and sustainer of life.

In the NT, death as a question about God's character is answered in terms of the paschal mystery. God is not only a God of the living but also a God of the dead. In Christ's death, God bears the relationlessness of death and in so doing reveals Godself as love.

Jesus' resurrection is a promise that ultimately we will not be abandoned, but not a promise that God will remove our suffering, pain and death. Jesus offers no palliatives for death in his cry from the cross. Even in the context of hope in the resurrection, death is recognized to be death. Death is a negative reality and this includes Jesus' death. Jesus, through his death and resurrection, turns death into a sacrament, into the expression of God's effective presence in human existence; God does make good with the life originally called into existence.

Death in the Christian Tradition

As we move into the Christian tradition, the theology of death becomes a theology of the afterlife, with its focus on the immortality of the soul. Within that perspective, death is described as the separation of the body from the soul. The emphasis in the patristic period is on salvation from death and the attainment of eternal life. This doctrine of salvation as the overcoming of death is present in liturgies and in the patristic writings. Without such a doctrine, no substantial happiness would be possible since death itself is inevitable. According to Justin, Christians are no longer afraid of death; indeed, they can even rejoice in death because of the promise of immortality, for salvation expresses itself in incorruption.

Salvation from death is intrinsically connected to salvation from sin. In fact, remission of sins in baptism is related to deliverance from death: with deliverance from death came a new life and regeneration. Death as the fundamental expression of human vulnerability and corruptibility stands in the way of man/woman's divinization. Salvation is a restoration of incorruptibility, and therefore a destruction of death. The emphasis is on death as a consequence of sin. That death is a consequence of sin is affirmed at the Council of Trent (D.S., 223).

Specific church teachings on death are rare. Several important statements have been made in our contemporary period. Vatican II, in its pastoral constitution Gaudium et spes, deals with the reality of death in a unique way. It does so in the context of a christological humanism where Christ is presented as the full revelation of what it means to be human. The text presents a coherent and existential understanding of death, reaffirming the anxiety produced by the inevitability of death. "It is in regard to death that man's [sic] condition is most shrouded in doubt" (G.S., 18). Yet there is a basic desire for eternal life. "A deep instinct leads him [sic] rightly to shrink from and to reject the utter ruin and total loss of his personality. Because he bears in himself the seed of eternity ... he rebels against death" (ibid.). While the human person cannot avoid death, yet his/her destiny is for eternal life.

Death is clearly mysterious; Christianity's answer to this mystery is another mystery, the paschal mystery. Humanity is destined to pass from death to life through Christ. The mystery of Christ and the mystery of man/woman are the same mystery. "Such is the nature and the greatness of the mystery of man [sic] as enlightened for the faithful by the Christian revelation. It is therefore through Christ, and in Christ, that light is shown on the mystery of death." (G.S., 18).

ing and death which, apart from his Gospel, overwhelms us" (22).

In 1979 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in its "Instruction on Certain Questions Concerning Eschatology" emphasized the need to acknowledge the existence of a fundamental continuity as well as a radical discontinuity between present and future lives. To ignore this radical discontinuity would be to ignore the finality of death and the uniqueness of historical existence. A creative tension must be maintained between the two spheres.

Death in Contemporary Theology

Theologians today approach death not primarily in terms of the afterlife, and not simply as a point at the end of life, but rather as a pervasive dimension of one's total existence. Death is not excluded from the experience of life, and no theological anthropology is possible without asking about the significance of death. The theology of death is clearly indebted to contemporary philosophical and psychological approaches.

For Martin Heidegger, death does not merely represent the last moment in man/woman's life, but even casts its shadow on the totality of life. Dying is a mode of being, which concerns man/woman existentially so that human existence must be regarded as being-to-death and therefore to be defined only in light of death. It is precisely death that allows human life to have meaning. To live in a realistic anticipation of death is to accept boundaries and to live with some purpose. Meaning is to be found within human life, not by ignoring mortality and finitude, but by taking the inevitability of death fully and frankly into account.

Jean-Paul Sartre made Heidegger's analysis the starting point of his own approach. Like Heidegger, Sartre sees life's mortality as an essential element of human existence. Unlike Heidegger, death is not opportunity for life, but our understanding. As such it leads to the removal of possibilities and the fragmentation of existence; death is the reverse side of freedom. Death deprives life of all meaning; the end of human existence in death is absolute meaninglessness—it is absurdity itself.

The more death is seen as a boundary that robs life of much—if not all—of its meaning, the more the individual and even society is forced to choose between capitulation or affirmation, despair or trust. Contemporary approaches to death make evident why denial and repression are deeply operative in our approaches to death. The pervasiveness of death leads Ernest Becker to affirm that the effort to repress the terror of death is the very foundation of all human culture. Humans cannot live without limiting their perception of reality; in the face of death there is a need to build an armor to protect ourselves. The basic fact of human reality is the realization that one has no control over death or over the meaning of one's life.

Becker's anthropology is centered on the conviction that the consciousness of one's mortality provides the key to understanding the human condition. Failure to cope with personal mortality leads to mental illness, and the denial of death is the core of most neuroses.

Contemporary approaches to death have forced Christian theology to concentrate on death not simply in the abstract, but as a concrete process, as dying. Death can no longer be considered as the instant when life finally ends, but as a recurrent experience where life itself is failing, such as in illness, as in losses and separations. Every illness, every loss is a dying, so that death is going on within us at all times.

Death as a Personal Act

The most important theological development concerning death is its emphasis

According to Karl Rahner, because man / woman is a union of nature and person, death has two dimensions, a personal and a natural one. Because men and women always appear within a spatio-temporal world, over which they have no absolute control, their death will always have a natural aspect. Death is something which happens to them. Biologically, the human organism wears out. It weakens and collapses, or it is destroyed. In its personal aspect, though, death is something active and performed, not simply passive and suffered. Because human persons are free, they have the ability to dispose of themselves. In its personal aspect, then, death can be the culmination of personal history of freedom. As a person, one can assume a stance at the end of one's journey, a stance of acceptance or of rejection. "The end of man[sic] as a spiritual person is an active consummation from within, a bringing of himself to completion. A growth that preserves the issue of his life; it is total entry into possession of himself, the fullness of the being he has become by all his free acts" (K. Rahner, H. Vorgrimler, 117). Dying is an active personal consummation and maturation of what is already present in a person's life. Death is the ultimate act of human freedom which gathers up and in some way gives meaning to all the individual events that go into making up one's life. It is in the personal nature of death that the reality of sin plays a role. Biological death cannot be seen as a consequence of sin for death belongs to human finitude rather than to human sin. Yet in a sinful world, death as the dissolution of human personhood assumes terrors and anxieties of its own. Death is the dissolution of the person and of the personal realm.

Contemporary insights into the nature of persons are helpful in discerning all the implications of death as personal. According to many contemporary authors, the personal is essentially interpersonal. There is a for-otherness that is constitutive of the person as person. I am the person I am precisely because of my relationship to this history, this family, these friends. The personal is constituted by personal relatedness, by its relation to the other self. As a person, I begin to exist as one pole in the complex "you and I." The personal is constituted by personal relatedness.

From birth to death, the human environment, the human ecological context, is an interpersonal one. Life begins as a process of attachment, of separation and of bonding, of interconnectedness, and interdependence. The interpersonal context, the "holding environment," provides for a variety of needs such as security and place, social integration and friendship nurturing, reassurance of worth leading to self-esteem. Meaning never develops in a vacuum; it is always embedded in a specific context, in a web of relationships. The interpersonal context leads to structures of meaning. These are organized structures of understanding and emotional attachments by which individuals interpret and assimilate their environment. Personal meaning includes, therefore, a sense of attachment as well as of understanding, as when we say that something means a great deal. Clearly then, one of the most important products of relationships is the emergence of structures of meaning that are essential to our existence. Meanings are learned in the context of specific relationships and circumstances. Meanings and purposes are learned and consolidated through a lifetime's experience, are embodied in the relationships which sustain them.

With the emphasis on personhood as relational, and meaningfulness as interpersonal, the death of a person is the dissolution not only of an individual but of meaningfulness and of personal environment. Death strikes directly at the human person by threatening the person with radical relationlessness. Since communication, the ability to communicate and to receive communication, is a constitutional element of the person, death manifests itself in the absence of communication. Life consists in active participation in a set of relationships. Death for its part means the destruction of what has been slowly built up and has come to form the very fabric of a personal existence. The problem of death does not arise primarily because of our biological reality, but because of the unconditional and the uniqueness that is personhood. Death becomes a problem because it ends something unique and therefore is something more and other than a natural process. So human dying transcends medical and biological definition.

Because of the interpersonal nature of personhood, every threat to human solidarity and interdependence is perceived as personal threat. But whenever communication is fostered, community nurtured, relationships encouraged, death becomes more acceptable. This implies that there is a personal ecology to death and dying: at the core of this ecology is care. There is a responsibility to uphold the human dignity of the other person in their process of dying, and therefore the ecological system of human family and community may not be replaced by any other institution, medical or otherwise. In a personal world there can be no abdication of the care role to any institutions.

The personal nature of death and dying also implies the upholding of truthfulness, for the ultimate betrayal of personhood is to deceive another about his or her death. While there are many reasons to conceal the truth about death, such as the therapeutic and existential value of hope, yet awareness of death is also a fundamental element of the truth of life. We uphold each other not by concealing the truth about death, but by bringing this truth within the reality of

Emphasis on human death as death of a person must also have an influence on the criteria used to certify death. The death of a human being cannot simply be conceived as the death of an organism. In determining what constitutes the death of a human being, we must consider the conditions of existence and non-existence of persons. The bare continuation of organismic function cannot be justified, for the concept of death is not simply the concept of the cessation of life.

The loss of temporality of embodiment, of holding environment, is a radical deprivation of essential elements of personal existence. It is death seen in its personal aspect that can also lead to a renewed understanding of immortality. The bond of personal relationship transcends distance and time, and can in a similar way bridge the gap of death. There is something about belonging at the personal level of existence that can prevail over the physical separation of death. Communion with the living and the dead is based on memory, on remembrance. Remembering is a fundamental element of personal belonging and of the interpersonal world. Within the Christian perspective the interpersonal world extends beyond this time and space.

The communion of saints means that we form a society with those who have lived and died in fellowship with Christ. Since personal existence is communal and interdependent, death within the Christian framework can be perceived as a transition from one form of personal existence to another, in continuity and discontinuity with this present life. What cannot be brought to an end with one's death is one's community. Within the paschal mystery, God remembers the dead for God is a God of the living and the dead. "Nothing can separate us from the love of God as manifested in Christ...." Solidarity with God and God's community remains; meaning is permanently attached to a community of love that death cannot in any way destroy. Within the Christian context, the death of a person does not mean entry into another world that is alien and inaccessible to the living. Within our human and temporal/spatial context, death is a loss of the I-Thou relationship and therefore a reduction to being an "It." Yet at another level, death itself cannot destroy a personal relation to God. The I-Thou relationship with God can be severed only by sin. Solidarity with God in Jesus means salvation from death.

Death and the Christian Sacraments

Within the framework of the paschal mystery, the binary opposition of life and death is resolved in a positive and meaningful way without denying the negativity of death: the mystery of Christian faith is that through dying, Christ conquers death and is life-giving. Both baptism and the eucharist are the two sacraments that ritualize most fully the paschal mystery. Baptism celebrates participation in the paschal mystery and the eucharist re-enacts it. Baptism is imaged as a participation in the death of Christ so that life in Christ might be secured. In baptism, one is immersed into water to die so that one might rise to new life in Christ as a member of his body, the church. In the eucharist this new life is nurtured, sustained and ritualized.

In its "Rite of Christian Death and Burial," the church emphasizes the interpersonal dimension of life and death. The church ritualizes the passage from life to death. Death is a liminal experience for the bereaved. The ritual of funeral and burial are rites of memory and change of status. The deceased is introduced into the realm of the dead as well as into the community of living with a new status. This new status must bring about a new relationship for the bereaved and the community of the living. After an individual's death, the focus is the family, the friends and the community of the deceased. Not only is the deceased person commended to God, but also the community and its hope. The ritual recalls the sacramental life of the deceased and identifies his/her future as being-with-Christ. The celebration of the eucharist at a funeral is an affirmation of the community that the deceased sought meaning in life and discovered such meaning in the person of Jesus Christ. In the celebration of the eucharist not only is the deceased commended to God but also the community. While the ritual identifies the future of the deceased as that of being-with-Christ, it promises this same future for the bereaving community. In celebrating the eucharist the community manifests and expresses its understanding of life and death and affirms that the deceased shared in this same meaningfulness. The worshipping community, as it proclaims the victory of Christ over death, intensifies its faith in the paschal mystery. In the sacramental life of the church and its worship, death is personalized.

To personalize death is not to privatize it, but it is to emphasize its social context. Without the Christian community death might well be meaningless. Without a community the solitariness of life would be the final victor in death. Loneliness in life is only a faint image of the isolation incurred when death happens without community. If meaning is found by incorporation into Christ, then the meaning itself is in and through the community of the body of Christ, the church.

Emphasizing the social nature of death should lead to a greater engagement with the concerns of this world. According to Leander Keck, "the starting point for a theology of death and of resurrection is moral outrage against the world in which there appears to be no justice on which the weak can count . . ." (Keck, 97). The struggle for justice and the transformation of this world cannot be sustained when the fear of death leads to debilitating bondage. The paschal mystery is a symbol of the ultimate triumph of justice. The power of death pervades many economic and political structures. Moral outrage against such deaths is expressed in the sacramental life of the church. For the sacraments are anticipatory and mediating signs of ultimate justice and solidarity with God. They are symbols of protest, subversive acts, serving to unmask the injustice of an existence that perceives this time, this space, as all there is. The paschal mystery, sacramentalized in all of the Christian sacraments summons us to resistance to all personal and communal death and to liberating action in our world. The sacraments mediate, nourish, and keep alive fundamental hope in the liberating love of God. At the same time, the sacramental liturgy is the place where men and women can be made aware of the reality of their situation, of the "not yet" and pilgrim nature of their situation, of their creaturehood.

In an existence marked by conflict, the sacraments are signs of contradiction and of the possibility of an alternative vision. In their signifying role, they function prophetically in announcing universal salvation, universal peace, the overcoming of death in all of its modalities. As proclaimed in the last words of the Christian scriptures, "he will wipe away every tear from their eyes, and death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning nor crying nor pain any more, for the former things have passed away" (Rev 21:4).

DEVOTIONS, POPULAR

Different approaches to the task of defining and describing popular devotions yield complementary understandings of the devotions themselves, and thus a deeper appreciation of them.

Legal Definition

Definition in legal terms is the clearest and most precise. In the strictest legal sense, popular devotions are peculiar to Roman Catholic worship. They are religious exercises—prayers, methods of meditation, orders of service, rituals, gestures—whose texts and rubrics are not contained in the official liturgical books of the Roman rite. Examples of popular devotions that were almost universally observed in the years just preceding Vatican II are: the rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Way of the Cross, eucharistic communion in honor of the Sacred Heart of Jesus on the first Fridays of nine consecutive months, and novenas (nine consecutive days of prayer) for various occasions or in honor of various heavenly patrons. Themes characteristic of these devotional exercises are also called devotions. Thus, devotion to the mercy of God or to our Lady of Lourdes.

Popular devotions have been and continue to be an important part of the Roman Catholic religious experience. Though some devotions are by their nature either for public and communal use or for private and individual use most of them may be observed either by individuals or groups. The devotions are clearly recognized by church authorities at every level as authentic and for the most part praiseworthy forms of Catholic worship, and they are frequently mentioned in church documents. Nonetheless, their status is somehow inferior or at least other than official: they are Catholic worship but not Catholic liturgy in the strict sense.

The twinned character of Roman Catholic worship, composed of the official liturgy and popular devotions yoked together in tandem, is a consequence of the reform of Catholic worship that occurred in the wake of the Council of Trent. In the third quarter of the 16th century, the content and extent of the official liturgy were determined in a new way by the issuance of authoritative liturgical books intended for the first time for uniform use in almost all the churches of the Latin rite. Whatever did not find a place in the books of the new worldwide Roman rite—no matter how widely practiced in other parts of the Latin West and no matter what its propriety and utility—was considered in a legal sense non-liturgical. Explicit authorization by the central Roman authority in time came to be considered an essential characteristic of the authentic Roman liturgy. And so rites that became universally popular after the appearance of the official books were practically incapable of attaining official status. Thus, for example, the Forty Hours devotion in honor of the reserved sacrament, though imposed by authority and usually celebrated in parishes and religious communities as one of the greatest solemnities of the church year, remained still just a devotion. It was, paradoxically, a devotion composed principally of a chain of strictly liturgical services. On the other hand, some themes that arose in popular devotions have found a place in the official church calendar and are observed in the official liturgy of the church with Masses and offices, for example, on feastdays dedicated to Jesus and Mary under different titles, as the Sacred Heart of Jesus, or Our Lady of Sorrows.

Though the distinction between popular devotions and the official liturgy dates from the period following the Council of Trent, many of the Western ways of worship later to be identified as popular devotions had flourished since the Middle Ages.

Some Western popular devotions have been imported into some of the Catholic Eastern churches, with different degrees of sensitivity about and adaptation to the different ecclesial settings. Phenomena analogous to Roman Catholic popular devotions are also found in some non-Catholic Eastern and Reformation churches.

Devotions and the Religious Emotions

If a legal approach to understanding popular devotions focuses on their popular, that is, non-official character, a second way of understanding considers them precisely as causes and effects of religious devotion. All forms of Christian worship, and especially those which are frequently and communally celebrated, express and form the consciousness of Christian believers. The emotional component of the Christian consciousness, which is set in resonance and is tuned by the experience of Christian worship, is called devotion. This complex of emotions and habits of feeling includes admiration at the wonderful works of God, security in God's loving providential care, familiarity with Jesus and the saints, the habit of praying frequently and specifically about concrete events, and joy in companionship with other believers.

Popular devotions express and foster devotion—the religious feelings of worshippers. Precisely for that reason the popular devotions reached such prominence in the worship life of the Roman Catholic church. The devotions compensated for a deficit in the ability of the official Roman liturgy to engage the emotions of believers. Roman prayer texts, in comparison with those of other ancient classical liturgies, are concise, elegant, rational—just as the Roman style in ritual too is restrained and utilitarian. Classical Roman prayers do speak about religious emotions, but in a distant and abstract way, as theological concepts rather than as actual experiences. They are prayers of the head and not of the heart. They do not express and cannot well engender emotion.

More importantly, for most of its history the Roman liturgy was celebrated in a language not directly intelligible to most of the worshippers. Both during liturgical services and in supplementary exercises, something had to be done “to occupy the people.” These “somethings” were popular devotions.

The non-professional worshipper at the Tridentine liturgy—whether the eucharist or the divine office—was something like an intelligent and interested visitor to an important national archive. The visitor knows that significant treasures are safeguarded there, a few of the more spectacular of which are elegantly displayed. And the visitor realizes that the treasures are available as needed through the mediation of trusted, well-trained experts. But for all practical purposes, the visitor’s experience of the archive is contained in and controlled by the guidebook in the visitor’s hand. The actual Tridentine liturgy was in many ways an acted-out archive, and the trusty guidebook was some form of popular devotion.

A Principle of Liturgical Evolution

The special cultural and linguistic situation of the Roman rite has proved to have been a particularly favorable medium in which popular devotions could root and flourish. But there is a third way of understanding popular devotions which is founded upon a consideration of factors and tendencies common in the evolution of all Christian liturgies. Phenomena like popular devotions are generated whenever Christian liturgies grow.

There is about all Christian liturgy a givenness: the liturgy is always in the first instance something “handed on”—from one church to another and from one culture to another. Adjustments, accommodations, exploitations of the given in its new situation always take place. The adjustment may be as obvious as translation into a new language or a change of movements to fit a new physical space. Or the elaborations may over time respond to differences in the sense of cultural and religious propriety. Thus the classical liturgical families have developed different ways of ritualizing the so-called soft spots of the eucharistic liturgy. Such soft spots include all that precedes the readings; the space between the liturgy of the word and the eucharistic prayer itself, in which items like the transfer of the bread and wine and the approach of the ministers to the altar may be ceremonialized; and again the space between the end of the eucharistic prayer and communion. These elaborations, which introduce and link the more primitive “givens” of the Christian eucharist, have much of the character of popular devotions.

Elaborate processional and stational arrangements preceded the solemn papal and patriarchal liturgies of Rome and Constantinople, and have had lasting influence on the classical forms of the Roman and Orthodox eucharistic liturgies. Had these preliminary rites been invented a thousand years later, they would have fallen into the category of popular devotions. The church of Jerusalem in the 4th century created the weekly Sunday morning commemoration of the resurrection and the veneration of the cross for Good Friday. Both have become part of the liturgical heritage of many of the ancient churches. Had these rites become widespread in the 18th century, they would be popular devotions. The Way of the Cross, a Counter-Reformation import from Jerusalem in many respects analogous to the earlier veneration of the cross, is proving to be one of the most resilient of the devotions. If it were twelve hundred years older, it would be liturgy.

The impulse or genius that enables all Christian churches to make the originally received liturgy at home in new physical, linguistic, and cultural settings is the impulse or genius that creates popular devotions. The spirit that makes devotions is not optional but intrinsic. The devotional bent is not a somehow baleful tendency to the periphery, but a principle central to the evolution and transmission of the Christian liturgy.

A Form of Cathedral Worship

A fourth way of understanding popular devotions employs the distinction between the cathedral and monastic forms of liturgy. The cathedral-monastic distinction applies originally to styles of the liturgy of the hours, but it has implications important for the understanding of all kinds of communal worship.

Monastic worship developed initially to serve the needs of monks and nuns. It also tends to arise among religious professionals of any kind, when they pray with their own kind or design liturgies to cater to their own needs and tastes. Religious professionals are people with extreme familiarity with the religious sector of life, in whom a state of preparedness for worship (something like a state of recollection) can be assumed. Monastic worshippers in this sense would include in addition to monks and nuns: cler ; directors of litur , church music, and religious education; campus ministers and their devotees. Monastic worship is long and long on text. It is thematically diffuse, relatively non-melodic, straight-line in structure, unrationalized, unconcerned with specific, transient situations (times of the day, natural seasons of the year, concrete needs), and full of variety. Monastic worship is characterized by intensity, motionlessness, closed eyes, postures of repose.

Cathedral worship is designed to be used by groups of ordinary Christians—laypersons led in prayer by the clergy. Though the word cathedral today implies grandeur, formality, hierarchical sensitivity, and rubrical precision, these connotations are misleading in this case. Cathedral here means parochial or popular. Specifically religious categories occupy only a relatively small part of the attention of ordinary believers. Cathedral worship is therefore fashioned to help the worshipper to cross the threshold between life “out there,” with its legitimate concerns and beguilements, and life within the fields of force of the Christian community at prayer. Cathedral worship is relatively brief and has relatively little text. It is obvious, christocentric and staurocentric (i.e., cross-centered) in theme, melodic, spiral in structure, highly ritualized, concerned with concrete and specific persons and situations, and very repetitive. Cathedral worship is intrinsically initiatory: it comes in a series of similar small parcels which do not demand an extended attention span for their effectiveness.

Popular devotions, compared to the corresponding official liturgy, fall squarely within the category of cathedral worship. They represent the continuance of that strain in the prayer life of the Latin West in a hidden way, after the almost total monasticization of the liturgy of the hours removed the divine office from the comprehension of the ordinary faithful.

Medieval Beginnings

Though the dynamic which creates popular devotions is common to Christian worship in all its embodiments, the first forms of worship later to be identified as popular devotions can be traced to Western monastic reforms of the 8th century. The received monastic form of the liturgy of the hours, as laid out in the Rule of Saint Benedict, was supplemented with other prayers and offices. Among these were the gradual psalms, the penitential psalms, the Office of the Dead, and the Office of All Saints, soon supplanted by the Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

These prayers and services were in time universally celebrated intermingled with the older canonical hours of the original Benedictine monastic office. These new forms of worship are often given the name "accretions," and they are conventionally cited as examples of the lush overgrowth of the medieval Western liturgy that was to choke off the blooming spirit of authentic worship. In fact, the origins and subsequent history of these devotions make it just as reasonable to suppose that they originated precisely when the received monastic office was becoming inadequate as a vehicle for the real worship of the monks, and that most of the real communal praying of medieval monasteries took place during the devotional offices rather than during the adjacent canonical hours.

However that may be, the devotional offices were soon separated from their original setting and gathered together to form the nucleus of a collection of prayers called in English the Primer. This book of hours, first in Latin and then in the various vernaculars, and enriched over the centuries with other items, remained the prayer book of choice for the literate laity up through the 18th century. Non-clerical religious communities commonly used the Office of the Blessed Virgin as their form of hour prayer until the reforms

The devotional offices were in structure and content exactly like their canonical counterparts. The elements (psalms, antiphons, readings, hymns, responsories, collects) were all arranged in the traditional way. But the selection was attractive: favorite psalms, often those already familiar from the Sunday canonical office; antiphons sometimes stunningly beautiful in language; central, obvious, evangelical themes. And there was only one office of each kind, to be used almost without variation each day of the year. Other office devotions, called little offices, were modeled on the commemorations that concluded the principal hours of the canonical liturgy of the hours. They were thematically unified; when possible, events chronicled in the scriptures were commemorated at the appropriate hour of the day, as in the hours of the Passion or of the Holy Spirit. Sometimes these offices were keyed to and associated with specific days of the week.

If one begins by assuming that the rangy, opaque, and diffuse canonical hour prayers of the medieval Western church are essential and the norm, then obviously the devotional offices will seem unessential and excessive. If the old office is the meal, then the new offices have to be the dessert. But if one compares the canonical office and the adjacent devotional offices as vessels of Christian prayer, then the devotional offices may well seem essential and appropriate, and the monastic canonical office more like an accumulation of accretions. The meat and drink of Christian prayer is certainly contained in the devotional offices; their canonical counterparts, certainly not dessert, are more like roughage. In any case, it seems clear that the devotional offices are nothing but the old cathedral hour prayer, forced by the conditions of medieval religious culture to appear in monastic garb.

Counter-Reformation Devotions

Another kind of popular devotion had its origins not in a reformulation of the liturgy of the hours, but as an elaboration of specific observances in the calendars of some of the northern European churches. These services had long been intrinsic to and important in the life of these churches, but they fell into the category of popular devotions because they had not been observed at Rome and thus did not appear in the books of the purified Roman liturgy. Such devotions were thus free to continue to evolve during the Counter-Reformation period. In time the role played by the reserved sacrament in these devotions was enhanced, and the Blessed Sacrament became the popular focus of the re-enactment in worship of the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. These rites were frequented by crowds of enthusiastic worshippers in centuries when some of the strictly liturgical rites had become the province of the very devout few. While the clergy were picking their way through the rubrical thicket of the prescribed Easter vigil, anticipated early in the morning of Holy Saturday in the chancels of nearly empty churches, the popular paschal worship of the northern churches focused on the absolutely obvious public vigil before the hidden reserved eucharist in remembrance of the Lord's burial, and on the evidently triumphal eucharistic procession at dawn on Easter Sunday in commemoration of his rising from the dead.

Other devotions arose during the Counter-Reformation as means of mediating the official liturgy to worshippers. Medieval Mass-goers were taught to worship by looking: to follow and interpret the movements of the liturgical ministers, to study and to take to heart the great crucifix on the screen between the chancel and the nave, and to gaze with adoration at the sacred host when it was elevated during Mass.

Counter-Reformation Mass devotions are more verbal. In Catholic countries in which the vernacular tongue was not a romance language, programs of metrical hymns were composed to accompany the Mass. The congregation sang these songs in their own language to popular melodies while the priest and his assistants recited the official liturgy quietly in Latin. These early folk Masses paraphrase parts of the ordinary of the Mass (singing direct translations was forbidden). Or they are catechetical interpretations of the soft spots in the Mass liturgy.

In places where and on occasions when Mass hymns were not used, the laity not literate in Latin were expected to participate in the eucharist through some form of popular devotion. It might be the recitation of the rosary, sometimes communally but more frequently privately; or reflecting upon a sequence of written suggestions for meditation during Mass; or silently reading a series of prayers that paraphrased the official text of the Mass. In the generation immediately before Vatican II, the use of vernacular hand missals with close translations of the Latin text had become relatively common in some places. The translated text of the liturgy itself had become a Mass devotion, and the layperson became as adept as the priest at setting ribbon markers and flipping pages.

During the centuries between Trent and Vatican II, vernacular Mass devotions functioned as a kind of verbal icon screen. In one way they shielded the literal content of the official liturgy from ordinary worshippers; in another and more important way they revealed the meaning of the liturgy to laypersons in words they could understand and feel.

The liturgy of the hours was also given the devotional treatment. In some places a vernacular reduction of canonical vespers, shortened and simplified, was provided for use in parishes on Sundays and feastdays. More frequently, vernacular prayer services were composed in an entirely new style, reminiscent of the formal meditations that were being proposed for the private use of individuals. These prayer services exploited popular devotional themes but were also correlated with the principal seasons of the church year. They were intended for public worship on Sunday and feastday afternoons, usually in connection with canonical vespers and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament.

Exposition and Benediction

The centerpiece of Counter-Reformation popular piety was exposition of and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. On special occasions it became the custom of some churches to expose the Blessed Sacrament in the monstrance to add solemnity to canonical vespers. Additional prayers and songs were appended to the service, and the people were blessed with the sacrament before it was replaced in the tabernacle. In time the eucharistic benediction became a separable unit that might be celebrated by itself or, more usually, in connection with some other service.

During the Counter-Reformation heyday of popular devotions, English-speaking Roman Catholics were restricted in their public church life both by minority status and penal statute. They had to be satisfied with unobtrusive observance of the minimum essential liturgical rites, and a distinctively English pattern of public popular devotions did not develop. By the mid-19th century, however, a more elaborate devotional life became possible. Its focus was the reserved sacrament. In England itself and in English-speaking lands overseas, the presence of the Blessed Sacrament rendered the sometimes poor and provisional and almost always recently constructed houses of Roman Catholic worship instantly sacred places. Prayers to the Mother of God and other heavenly patrons and Sunday vespers, an office still prescribed by local statutes to be celebrated with the people, inevitably concluded with eucharistic benediction.

The rite of benediction was highly ceremonious and easy to understand, in contrast to the inaudible low mass which was the ordinary Sunday eucharistic celebration of the same period. Eucharistic benediction unmistakably portrayed the benevolent and effective presence of the Lord in the midst of the church, and at the same time enabled worshippers to adore him clearly, directly, and graciously. It is probable that until the reforms mandated by Vatican II, the popular Roman Catholic sense of the meaning of the eucharist and the church was primarily formed by the experience of popular devotions to the Blessed Sacrament rather than by participation in Mass and the reception of holy communion.

Official and Professional Evaluations

Since the beginnings of widespread liturgical renewal in the years immediately preceding Vatican II, the attitude of church authority towards the popular devotions may be described as balanced and reserved. The Vatican II Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy maintains the distinction between devotions and the official liturgy. Devotions that conform to church laws and norms are recommended; they form part of the actual, though extra-liturgical, spiritual life of the church. Devotions which have long been part of the distinctive worship life of local churches deserve special esteem. The devotions should be oriented towards the official liturgy, which by its very nature is superior to them. Devotions should harmonize with the seasons of the church year. Devotions should lead people to the official liturgy. Church leaders, both by exhortation and example, have continued to foster a few central and almost universally observed devotions, like the Angelus, the rosary, and the Way of the Cross.

Popular liturgical reformers at first tended to view the devotions as obstacles to successful liturgical renewal. The devotions were, to superficial analysis anyway, patently "unliturgical." They did not seem to follow the supposed principles of authentic liturgy with regard to structure, content, and style. They were criticized as being practically bereft of the formal proclamation of scripture, tending to inculcate an individualistic and subjective piety. They were said to be unresponsive to the rhythms of the liturgical calendar, repetitious, and sentimental.

It is reasonable to assume that the real problem with the devotions was precisely that they were popular—frequented by many worshippers who seemed to be enjoying themselves—while the "liturgical" concoctions sometimes proposed to supplant them were not. Attempts to reform existing devotions or to create new ones have generally not been successful. Substitutes for the devotional services, often called "paraliturgies," mimicked liturgical forms, with much Bible reading and self-conscious use of symbolic gestures. The didactic element was strong and sometimes not straightforwardly advertised: worshippers expecting to be enabled to sympathize with the Lord in his sufferings might find themselves subjected to a lesson on the human suffering engendered by worldwide socio-economic injustice.

If the devotions have not fared well of late as means of worship, they have recently attracted the attention of thinkers and pastors for other reasons. For the years between Trent and Vatican II especially, the devotions provide privileged access to the religious experience and understanding of different generations, social classes, ethnic and political groupings and local churches. Scholars in women's studies note that some of the most prominent and successful devotions were initiated by women, and certainly most of the devotions were practiced mainly by women. If the official Roman liturgy can be fairly characterized as stereotypically masculine, then surely the popular devotions are stereotypically feminine. Reflection on the cathedral character of the devotions yields precious insights into the dynamic of all Christian prayer, both individual and communal. Some observers have suggested that movements for church renewal in Latin America would be strengthened by incorporating rather than ignoring the already existing devotional religion of the people. Some devotions, long associated with particular ethnic groups and until now practiced almost exclusively by them, are being appreciated both because they embody an experience of the gospel distinctive of their parent group and are potentially enriching for the larger church.

Present Status

Former appraisals of the relative value and propriety of the official liturgy and the devotions are no longer of interest. The changes in worship mandated by Vatican II have blurred the distinction between liturgy and devotions, and for many reasons the devotions are no longer so widely practiced. The many different novena forms common in the United States were usually couched in an idiom and style, both in language and music, that have become quaint and unsatisfying. The devotional occasion par excellence—afternoon or evening services in church—has been occupied by the afternoon celebration of the eucharistic liturgy, formerly possible only in the morning. Much of the appeal of the devotions lies in the use of the vernacular language, familiar expression, and light music; but now all of these find a place in the official liturgy itself. Warmth, directness, and informality in Roman Catholic worship had formerly been associated almost exclusively with the devotions, but can now be found sometimes in the official liturgy and always in the piety and styles of the Catholic charismatic movement. Explicit and detailed intercessory prayer, once a specialty of the devotions, is now a beloved moment—“the prayer of the faithful”—in most celebrations of the eucharist. And, though the typical American Catholic worshipper probably has more time to dispose of than ever before, less time is actually available for worship.

Some few great devotions are still commonly practiced, though with some diminishment. The Way of the Cross usually retains its place in the Lenten schedule of parishes. The rosary, formerly the all-purpose devotion adaptable to almost any group or religious occasion, is now only infrequently recited as a communal exercise; but there are indications that it is making a comeback as a form of individual prayer. Private devotion to the Blessed Sacrament reserved in the tabernacle still flourishes, and the recommended provision of a special chapel of reservation apart from the principal public worship area in parish churches is thought to encourage individual adoration. But the formerly common and highly prized ceremonious exposition and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament now seems somehow incongruous and overblown. Catholic worshippers have become accustomed to a more domestic approach to eucharistic reverence: they usually receive the host in their own hands and not infrequently themselves handle the consecrated bread and wine as extraordinary ministers of communion.

Enduring Values

The great days of popular devotions are over, and no one expects to see them return. Most of the conditions which generated the devotions have been banished in the reforms of Roman Catholic worship following Vatican II.

The principle that liturgical forms inherited from the distant past are somehow immutable and obligatory is no longer assumed, and the more recent ideal of liturgical uniformity has been dismantled. Instead, the currently reigning liturgical principle is carefully guided evolution of the liturgy, and local adaptation and variation of rites have become the ideal. The authentic liturgical books of the post-Tridentine Roman rite can be carried in a single attaché case with room for the morning paper and a sandwich besides; the Roman rite of today is comprised in a library of volumes printed in scores of different languages with a bewildering variety of textual and ritual variants. Even so it makes sense to ask which characteristics of the devotions one would like to see perennially enshrined in a new system of worship for the Roman Catholic church and, indeed, for the ecumenical church as well.

First, the devotions are a reminder that it is a worthy function of Christian worship to cultivate Christian affectivity. It is fair to say that the creators of the devotions had the knack of catering to the devotion—the religious feelings—of worshippers and that liturgical planners of our time do not. A clue to understanding our insufficiency in this regard may be found in the relative absence of rubrics in the devotions; in practice they were controlled by few rules outside the comprehension and experience of the worshippers. But contemporary reformers are still very dependent on the rubric—the law from outside—for their warrant and their sense of success. Of course it is seldom any more the rubric in the book that rules, or directions from a distant central authority that control. Rather today it is members of the professional liturgical establishment—communicators about liturgy, those who work in diocesan liturgy offices, parochial directors of liturgy—who dictate and are experienced as dictating to believers—laypersons and clergy—what their experience of worship ought to be. Yet it is possible for a liturgy to be absolutely legal both according to the rubrics in the books and the rubrics in the air, i.e., to be exact in performance, fashionable in music, contemporary in expression, up-to-date in theology, current in social awareness, and inclusive in language, and still be perceived by worshippers more as a political statement or an educational moment than a way of knowing and feeling their relationship with God. Becoming conscious of and sophisticated about the experience of actual worshippers is an important task for those responsible for the management of continuing liturgical renewal. Their questions should precede their answers.

Secondly, devotions remind us that the educative function of Christian worship operates subtly and respectfully. Instruction, in the crude sense of the transmission of data, and motivation, in the sense of an efficient goad to some particular behavior, are not prominent features of the devotions. The devotional service is conceived of as enabling the worshipper to do something rather than doing something to the worshipper. The great devotions tirelessly recount the central mysteries of the Christian faith: the incarnation, the saving passion and resurrection of the Lord, the enduring presence of Jesus in the church, the continuing intervention of the God in the course of human life. The constant repetition of the same themes is not boring precisely because its purpose is not to inform the mind but to nourish the spirit of the believer. In the devotions the worshipper is not so much one to be instructed or motivated as a privileged person, a chosen and choosing one, a powerful intercessor who shares the friendship of the saints. Briefly, the worshipper is subject, not object. And the project is formation, not information. In the work of enfranchising worshippers, we can learn from the devotions. Though they would hardly have used the words, practitioners of the devotions were constantly treated as, and thus came to know themselves to be, members of a royal priesthood.

Finally, the devotions are a reminder that Christian worship is a kind of prayer. The devotional structure is circular or spiral. Connections are by association rather than according to logic. The devotions are shaped more like musing than like formal discourse; they are more like a conversation than a lecture. Devotions typically consist of a number of small, similar units frequently repeated. They are almost unvarying in form. The devotional predilection for sameness and repetition is an indication that prayer has expectations and satisfactions of its own, which are not easily comprehended by those who do not pray. We can learn from the devotions that the rhythms of communal and individual prayer are similar; and that variety, whatever its attractiveness in other contexts, is not the spice of liturgical prayer.

DISABILITIES, LITURGY AND PERSONS WITH

Jesus proclaimed the special places marginalized people have in the life of the Christian community: when you give a feast, invite the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind..." (Lk 14:13). He reminds us that disabilities are not, of themselves, cause for excusing and thus excluding the persons who have them from feasting at the Lord's table. Nor is the Christian community whole if any of its members are missing or thought unnecessary for its life. "The eye cannot say to the hand, 'I have no need of you', nor again the head to the feet, 'I have no need of you'. On the contrary, the parts of the body which seem to be weaker are indispensable..." (1 Cor 12:21-22). However, enabling those who "seem weaker" to take their rightful place in the community of the baptized very often requires breaking down structural barriers and barriers of the heart and mind as well. Society tends to devalue persons with disabilities, perceiving them to be among its "weaker" members. Therefore, some awareness of the nature of disabilities, viewed in relationship to the persons who have them, is important for the Christian community's understanding of itself as the mystical body of Christ which it brings to public expression in its worship.

Disability, Personhood and the Christian Life

A disability is caused by an anatomical, physiological, mental or emotional impairment which restricts or prevents a person from meeting certain life activities in the manner or range considered normal. To walk, to see, to hear, to speak, to know and understand, to behave according to societal norms—these, in varying degrees, are among the areas in which disabling conditions occur. Disabilities are present in persons of all ages; they may be permanent or temporary, visible or invisible to the eye; they affect an estimated one out of ten persons.

More importantly, these disabilities do not define the people who have them, nor diminish their value or dignity, nor express their unique strengths, potential and gifts. Joining its voice to that of the United Nations' General Assembly, the Holy See, in its statement on The International Year of Disabled Persons (4 March 1981), underscored the principle: "...that the disabled person (whether the disability be the result of a congenital handicap, chronic illness or accident, or from mental and physical deficiency, and whatever the severity of the disability, is a fully human subject with the corresponding innate, sacred and inviolable rights" (chap. 1, 1). In its sweeping concerns for the integration of persons with disabilities in society, the statement urged Christian parishes and youth groups to a loving care, suitable catechesis and inclusion of these persons in cultural and religious activities "so as to ensure that they will be full members of their Christian community, in accordance with their clear right to appropriate spiritual and moral education" (chap. 2, 16).

That all the baptized should come together to actively participate in the church's liturgy, "the summit towards which the activity of the Church is directed," is made abundantly clear in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (S.C. 10, 14). The challenge confronting the Christian community includes a transformation of fears, prejudices, ignorance and apathy towards its sisters and brothers who are disabled so that the community will truly become one heart, one mind, one body.

The Whole Body of Christ at Worship

Among the pastoral statements issued by episcopal conferences addressing worship and persons with disabilities is the Pastoral Statement of U.S. Catholic Bishops on Handicapped People (U.S.C.C., 16 November 1978). Stressing that the local parish community is the place where, for most Catholics, the community of believers is embodied, the bishops issued the challenge of making sure that the parish "door" is always open for participation of persons with disabilities in all forms of the community's liturgical celebrations (18-24). This open door, however, includes much more than just accessible buildings. In responding, the parish must first ask itself: "Who are our disabled sisters and brothers?"

Awareness

Persons with disabilities are often the invisible members of the local Christian community, some physically absent because of structural barriers, others because of denigrating attitudes or lack of awareness and sensitivity to their needs. Many of these persons and their families have been wounded not only by society but by the human frailties of the church. If their "invisibility" or absence is presumed to mean the non-existence of any persons, young or old, with any form or degree of disability, that would simply belie the realities of life and demographic information. But it is imperative to know who and where the disabled are if we will meet their needs for presence and participation.

Many need to hear again the proclamation that Jesus healed the blind, made the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, cleansed the lepers, raised the dead, and preached the good news to the poor (Mt 11: 4-5; Lk 7:22). Census and survey taking, awareness raising, networking within the parish community and with human service agencies—all these are among the avenues for reaching-out and extending the community's invitation. Seek out those isolated in their own homes and in community residences for persons mentally and emotionally disabled. It is then that persons with disabilities and, for those unable to speak for themselves, family members and advocates can make their needs known and thereby become the primary consultants in the community's ministry with them. The "with" is essential for negating any predisposition towards condescending patronization which fails to recognize that these persons know best what they need, and have strengths, potential and gifts to bring to the discipleship of equals which identifies the Christian community as one of interdependent relationships.

Accessibility

For persons whose mobility is in any way impaired, distant parking spaces, curbs, church stairs and hard to manage doors fail to convey a message of welcome; rather, they suggest one of "enter if you can." Such structural barriers, including the absence of outdoor and indoor tactile clues for persons visually impaired (e.g., textured floor markers), impose handicapping conditions for accessing the community's life of prayer and other shared experiences. The interior space can likewise promote either inclusiveness or isolation, depending on how accommodating it is to a person's special needs. A greeting, an offer of assistance, consideration of the extra bit of time some need to take their place—these suggest "welcome." Those who use wheelchairs or other mobility assisting devices such as a walker will appreciate a choice of where to sit within the gathered assembly provided some pews have been modified. Similarly, locations for more optimal hearing and seeing by persons in whom those faculties are impaired should be identified or provided. For some, accessible, adapted toileting facilities are critical. However, while guidelines and other resource information for removing structural barriers are readily available, the transformation of the inaccessible to the accessible ultimately depends upon the commitment of the community's heart and finances.

Additional Resources

Different disabilities, uniquely experienced by each person, inform the need for other adaptations and resources. For example, a hearing impaired person may need nothing more than to be seated closer to a well-lit sanctuary for lipreading or an amplification system for an acoustically poor environment; conversely, an assistive hearing device may be required. Some persons who are deaf "hear" through the interpreting hands of another "speaking" in sign language. A person who uses a wheelchair may well be able to put his/her gifts of proclaiming the word at the community's service if the sanctuary is accessible and a portable microphone available. Blind or visually impaired persons can likewise serve as lectors using Braille or large print lectionaries respectively. The words of the eucharistic minister can be spoken by some who are deaf. Many persons who are developmentally delayed (e.g., mentally retarded), contrary to common misconceptions, are capable of serving in many ministerial roles (e.g., eucharistic ministers, ministers of hospitality, cross bearers, altar servers) if invited and provided with preparation adapted to their mode of learning. As a final example, there is also the gift of ministry of profoundly disabled persons who, by their presence alone, serve to call the Christian community deeper into the mystery of life and the paradox of the cross.

Liturgical Celebrations: Considerations

The elements of good liturgy are at the service of enabling persons with varied disabilities actively to participate. Concrete, recurring, sumptuous symbols of our faith; color; full but simple gestures for all to share; hymns that are singable and, for the voiceless, capable of evoking the body's own response; sensitive touching and being touched in warm, accepting gestures of welcome, reconciliation, love and peace; word proclaimed; silence—all provide a range of receptive and expressive communication available to the assembly of people drawn into relationship through baptism. What an individual person with mental retardation may not be able to know and understand through abstract language may become known at the intuitive level through symbol, gesture and human interaction. Adapting some of the community's liturgies, for example, through simplified texts and more prominent use of visual elements, can serve to accommodate not only the attention span and learning modes of children and some persons with mental and emotional disabilities, but the limited physical endurance of others. This can also provide some diversity for the larger community. The Directory on Children's Masses (S.C.D.W., 1 November 1973) offers suggestions and guidance in this regard.

Separate liturgies, held at times other than the community's regularly scheduled liturgical celebrations, may serve certain needs for smaller groups of the community, such as persons living with disabilities, to share and reflect on their common experience. They can also be an important part of the catechesis on Christian sacramental worship for persons with mental retardation. These separate liturgies, however, should not replace a coming together with the whole community. Any inclination towards excluding oneself or those with disabilities for reasons of impaired mobility, appearance, altered speech, mannerisms and other behaviors that may be considered disruptive or socially unacceptable fosters denigration and isolation. Conversely, the heart of the community may be best known by the hospitality, support and guiding presence it gives to those in need as all take their rightful place in the worshipping assembly. There, it gives public witness to the loving, inclusive wholeness of the mystical body of Christ, a light to the world.

DIVORCED, MINISTRY TO THE

This article contains elements of pastoral ministry suitable for any divorced people. Because of the special situation of Roman Catholics, however, it is directed primarily to them.

The Experience of Divorcing Catholics

Divorce affects people differently depending on their particular situations and personalities. A woman in her late sixties who has several adult children and is divorced after forty years of marriage, faces concerns unlike those which confront a younger woman whose marriage of two years ends. The problems which precede a separation and the turmoil which follows vary from one divorcee to another; but in each case divorce alters every aspect of a person's life.

Socially, divorcing people often feel isolated. Friends avoid them or stop inviting them to social gatherings and dinners. Family members may live far away, and even those who are nearby often do not know how to offer support. Less frequently now than in the past when divorce was a rarer occurrence, some families ostracize those who are divorced or relate to them with an ill-concealed superiority. At times the well-meaning sympathy of others—such as a parent's assurance that the former spouse "never was good enough for you"—adds to their own ambivalence and pain. Even when families and friends reach out to them sympathetically, divorcing people may isolate themselves, feeling inadequate or unworthy.

Economically, divorce often has a disastrous affect, especially on women. The no-fault divorce laws which prevail in most states disregard the economic inequalities which existed during the marriage and which hamper single women's efforts to support themselves and their children. Child support, often inadequate, frequently goes unpaid and can be collected only with difficulty and with additional attorney's fees. Mothers of dependent children and older women who counted on the support of their husbands' pensions and health programs, often find themselves economically devastated. Men, too, find themselves financially burdened by the cost of the divorce proceedings and by supporting a former family while trying to begin a new one.

Divorcing people speak of the emotional roller-coaster they unwittingly boarded when their marriages ended. After the initial shock lifts, they are overwhelmed by feelings of rejection, anger (at the former spouses, families and friends, themselves, God and the church), and depression. They frequently enter long periods of anxiety about the future, about their financial situations, and about a host of other practical concerns the other person used to attend to. Loneliness becomes intense. Often their spouses were their best friends as well as their most constant companions, and now they have no one to share their lives with, no one to tell their problems to, no one to ask for advice. They miss the sexual intimacy they once had; they may become promiscuous or they may avoid any physical expression of affection. They liken the dissolution of their marriages to the death of a loved one, and they resonate with Elizabeth Kubler-Ross's outline of five stages of death and dying (denial, bargaining, anger, depression, acceptance). In many cases, one person takes the initiative in acknowledging the demise of the marriage by moving out or filing for divorce. That person may begin the mourning process before the actual break-up of the marriage and feel relieved by the time the divorce proceedings begin. The other person may be completely surprised by the other's actions and begin grieving only as the other finishes. The different timetables of grief often cause bitterness ("I'm depressed and my former spouse seems satisfied, even at peace; I thought our marriage meant more than that"). It takes years for most people to recover emotionally from a divorce, and all of them report that the feelings continue to resurface during the holidays or special occasions such as anniversaries and birthdays.

Divorcing Catholics turn to the church with ambivalence, in need of comfort but fearing judgment. They think they have failed not only themselves but God, and any hint of disapproval from clergy or others connected with the local church intensifies their guilt and makes them feel isolated and unwanted. They feel out-of-place in a church which so consistently promotes marital fidelity and family life and which condemns divorce. They imagine that all other parishioners know of their situations as if they are branded with a large "D" (for divorce) on their foreheads. Some parishes ask them to refrain from lectoring, serving as extraordinary ministers of the eucharist, teaching, or sitting on the parish council. Divorcing Catholics most frequently complain about feeling invisible in their parishes: no one acknowledges their presence, except perhaps on special occasions such as the Feast of the Holy Family and Mother's Day, and then only negatively. Confused about their ability to approach the sacraments, many stop receiving communion under the false impression that they are excommunicated. Some parishes, on the other hand, go out of their way to make them feel welcome, and their hospitality speeds their recovery.

Divorcing Catholics frequently find their previous understanding of their faith inadequate. They grew up believing that God loved them because they kept the commandments and more or less obeyed the rules, but their experience of separation and divorce makes them question these former assumptions. Wondering whether God still loves them, they are surprised by the moments of grace which surface in the midst of their struggles. Many find themselves feeling closer to God than ever before and report hearing the gospel with new ears, identifying for the first time with the lost sheep Jesus sought while leaving the ninety-nine behind.

The Pastoral Needs of Divorcing Catholics

When divorcing Catholics turn to the church in their need, they automatically turn to their local churches, to particular parishes and pastors. Their experience of a parish and of one or two priests colors, for the most part, their perception of the church's concern for them. Homilies given by understanding pastors and expressions of support from parishioners mean more to them than hierarchical pronouncements. When they do learn of some official statements—usually through the news media—the divorced are often distressed; general condemnations of divorce seem to blame them for what they themselves most wish they could have avoided. When they speak—either favorably or with bitterness—about the church's concern (or lack of it) for them during their crisis, they most frequently describe how a specific local community and its pastoral leadership related to them.

The first thing divorcing Catholics seek from the church is acceptance. They do not expect or ask for the church's approval of the collapse of their marriage, since they themselves may be mourning the loss of a love they had counted on. They do, however, seek acceptance of themselves both as Catholics and as divorcing people.

Homilists need to recognize that a sizeable proportion of every congregation is touched by divorce in one way or another. To ignore the prevalence or complexity of divorce in contemporary life or to blame those who suffer from its pain for undermining the stability of the family, disregards the good faith, the sorrows, and the wisdom of Catholics who grieve the ending of a love they once cherished. Divorcing Catholics understand probably better than anyone else the "evils of divorce"—after all they know first hand the emotional and social turmoil it causes—but they cannot hear a homily on the subject without feeling personally judged and branded as evil. They ask for homilies which acknowledge their pain and difficulties without condemning them as failures, and most especially they long for assurances from the pulpit that God does indeed continue to love them and to offer them forgiveness and compassion.

Simple gestures during the liturgy communicate the acceptance divorcing Catholics seek: a single parent with children bringing the gifts forward at the presentation, a homily that acknowledges their faith commitment as well as their difficulties, an announcement in the bulletin about a diocesan retreat or a parish support group for divorcing Catholics.

Divorcing Catholics need support. They need to share their concerns, feelings, and problems with others who will understand them. Since they frequently cannot afford professional help, they often turn to self-help groups. Beginning in the early 1970s, support groups for separated and divorcing Catholics have developed throughout the United States and Canada. (The North American Conference of Separated and Divorced Catholics is a network of such groups and offers help in establishing and promoting groups.) Although groups vary in size, composition (some include widows and widowers), frequency of meetings (weekly, biweekly, or monthly), and format (open discussion, formal presentations, small group sharing), most groups present themselves as an informal gathering of people who care for each other's welfare, and all exist to offer mutual support to those in need. Whatever their structure, the most effective groups are directed by peers (i.e. divorcing Catholics helping divorcing Catholics) and meet consistently (at a regular time and in a set place). Just the presence of such a group in a parish lends support to many divorcing Catholics who may never turn to such a group themselves.

With their many questions about their standing in the church, divorcing Catholics need guidance and accurate information. In 1884 the American bishops meeting in Baltimore asked Rome to impose the penalty of excommunication on those Catholics in the United States who dared to contradict the church's authority and teaching that a sacramental marriage is indissoluble and who remarried invalidly after divorce. In 1977 the United States bishops voted to lift the penalty of excommunication imposed on divorced Catholics who have remarried. Some divorcing Catholics still think they are excommunicated (whether or not they are remarried), and they refrain from receiving the eucharist at the very time they are most in need of its grace. It is the responsibility of priests and pastoral ministers to inform them of the church's current teaching. Nothing in Canon Law or in the teaching of the church prevents them from approaching the sacraments simply because they are separated or divorced; indeed much in our tradition encourages believers who are in crises and in need of forgiveness and consolation to avail themselves of the sacraments. The case of Catholics who are divorced and remarried without the church's recognition is a different matter; they need the pastoral guidance of compassionate ministers to discern the extent of their participation in the sacramental life of the church. Priests and pastoral ministers can best serve divorcing Catholics—remarried or single—by clearly and consistently assuring them that they are not excommunicated and that nothing they have done excludes them from the church or God's love.

When divorcing Catholics find in the church a welcoming acceptance, open support, and guidance, they then are able to seek the church's aid in experiencing reconciliation. Burdened by anger, guilt, resentment, self-doubt, and feelings of failure, they look for something more meaningful and efficacious than words of absolution. They must face their own failing, accept responsibility for their lives, assign guilt where it rightly belongs, seek forgiveness for their sins and comfort for their pain, let go of paralyzing memories, and begin risking again. Reconciliation takes time, and those who are involved in the process need encouragement and support. The sacrament of penance may be helpful in this process, although divorcing Catholics frequently are not prepared to celebrate it until later in their healing. Initially, the sacrament is linked in their minds too much with sin, guilt, and failure and "going to confession" only adds to their sense of inadequacy. Later, as they come to accept themselves as both good and flawed, both loved and sinning, and as they come to a more adequate understanding of the sacrament of penance, they find it a fitting conclusion to the forgiveness they have already begun to experience. With all of the ambivalence they feel about their ability to receive the eucharist, separated and divorcing Catholics instinctively feel drawn toward the eucharist as the source of reconciliation. They speak of it as medicine for those who are ailing and food for the journey, and they recall how Jesus met opposition for "welcoming sinners and eating with them" (Lk 15:2).

Support groups help divorcing Catholics in their efforts to forgive and be forgiven, and numerous retreat programs have been developed over the years to facilitate the process. "Beginning Experience" is a nationwide program which sponsors weekend retreats for those who suffer the loss of a loved one through death or divorce.

Divorcing Catholics speak more of recovery (a term borrowed from recent studies of dysfunctional families) than of reconciliation, although the two processes are familiar. Both result in an increase of confidence, a new-found self-identity, and the ability to face the future without being crippled by terror or distress. It is difficult to overestimate the impact of the trauma suffered by divorcing people. Creating a new sense of self, restructuring relationships with family and friends, establishing financial stability, and coming to peace with the church and God, take time and energy, and divorcing Catholics need all the help others can offer.

Critical Issues in Ministry with the Divorcing

Three major issues facing those who minister with divorced Catholics revolve around remarriage: (1) annulments; (2) internal forum; and (3) remarriage preparation. Possibly the most significant concern today is the effect of divorce on children.

(1) An annulment (a popularized term describing both a process and the decree of nullity issued by the tribunal) is the Roman Catholic church's way of determining whether a person is free to marry in the church after a previous marriage has ended in divorce. While an annulment allows some people to find a sense of reconciliation with themselves and their church and while it offers hope to those who desire to remarry in the church, it also produces resentment among those who do not understand the process or what it entails. Many find the procedure alienating and painful, offended by the cavalier way their pain and private lives are dealt with. Non-Catholics find the process totally incomprehensible and alienating; it reinforces their impression that the church is simply a bureaucracy and they object to having human beings judge their worthiness before God. Many people worry that their children will become illegitimate if their marriage is declared null and void. Paradoxically, as the annulment process becomes more accessible, many divorced Catholics are beginning to see it as little more than an expensive and time-consuming exercise in administrative red-tape. Most people are disturbed, sometimes outraged, by the tribunal's judgment that what appeared to be a marriage was, in fact, not a marriage as the church describes it. Still mourning the ending of a relationship which once gave them joy, they are offended by the inference that they really were not married in the first place. Priests and pastoral ministers can help divorced Catholics by acknowledging the love, good intentions, hope and happiness that their previous marriages represent and by presenting the annulment process as the community's involvement in their healing and reconciliation.

(2) Priests and pastoral ministers need a better understanding of internal forum so that they can assist divorced Catholics who remarry without receiving an annulment to discern their ability to approach the sacraments. The issue of internal forum is a highly disputed one in the church, and it demands study and pastoral sensitivity. When the church's ministers fail to address the issue or to provide the necessary leadership, invalidly remarried Catholics who were unable to receive an annulment are left to their own resources. Often they leave the church (since they feel it first abandoned them) or turn to others for advice (and are told to do "what their consciences tell them to do").

(3) Programs for those who are considering remarriage must be developed to help them deal with their unique problems and concerns. People should be counselled to take sufficient time following a divorce to assess their part in the break-up of the previous marriage and to make sure they do not repeat former patterns of relating. They need special attention if children are involved. Some parishes and dioceses have the policy of excluding divorced people from marriage preparation programs unless they have already received an annulment. Such policies are meant to reinforce the church's teaching about the permanence of marriage, but they frequently alienate people who already feel condemned by the church. Even if they plan to be married in a ceremony not recognized by the church, divorced Catholics can profit from the preparation offered by such programs; they may have a positive experience of the church and its approach to marriage which will then lead them to explore the possibilities of having their union recognized by the church.

A major problem of confronting those who minister with divorcing Catholics is the effect of separation on children. Their grief is as real as that of their parents for they mourn the loss of a loved one or of a particular relationship, and they have fewer resources available to help them confront their anger and fears. They often feel responsible in some way for the break-up of their parent's marriage. They also feel abandoned, since frequently the non-custodial parent starts over with a new family and ignores or denies former ties. Divorcing couples often use their children, consciously or unconsciously, as weapons against each other, and the legal maneuverings about custody often leave children confused and hurt. Custodial parents, dealing with their own grief, have little or no emotional energy left over to give to their children. As the number of children living with a single parent or in a step-family increases, more energy and attention should be directed to their welfare and recovery.

DIX, GREGORY (1901-1952)

Anglican Benedictine of Nashdom Abbey of which he was elected prior in 1948, Dix is best known for his Shape of the Liturgy (Westminster: Dacre Press, 1945), a work which continues to be a liturgical classic. Presenting a rich picture of the eucharist in the early church, and indeed throughout its historical development, Dix formulated the action "shape" of the eucharist: "Our Lord (1) took bread; (2) 'gave thanks' over it; (3) broke it; (4) distributed it . . . he (5) took a cup; (6) 'gave thanks' over that; (7) handed it to his disciples" (Shape, 48). He asserted that "with absolute unanimity the liturgical tradition reproduces these seven actions as four": the offertory, the prayer, the fraction and the communion. All rites for the eucharist, both East and West, share this common "shape."

DOCTRINE, LITURGY AND

1. Substantial Consistency

"Our doctrine agrees with the eucharist, and the eucharist confirms the doctrine," wrote St. Irenaeus towards the end of the 2nd century (Adv. Haer. IV. 18, 5). The bishop of Lyons was establishing the internal coherence of Catholic faith and practice against the Gnostics. When, two or three generations earlier, the christological Docetists had given up the eucharist, they were at least, as Ignatius of Antioch informs us, being consistent: "They abstain from eucharist . . . because they do not confess that the eucharist is the flesh of our Savior Jesus Christ which suffered for our sins and which the Father raised" (Letter to the Smyrneans 7:1). But the Gnostics of St. Irenaeus' time proved self-contradictory when they made sacramental use of elements from a material creation they despised. Catholic liturgy and doctrine, on the other hand, harmonized in their recognition that the creator and the redeemer were the same God, active throughout in the creative Word who had become flesh and given to humankind the sacraments and promise of salvation. The orthodox apologist argues aggressively: "How will they [the Gnostics] allow that the bread over which thanksgiving has been said is the body of their Lord, and that the chalice is the chalice of his blood, if they do not say that he is the Son of the creator of the world; that is to say, his Word through whom the tree bears fruit and the fountains flow and the earth yields first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear?" (Adv. Haer. IV. 18, 4).

And again: "Since, then, the cup which is mixed and the bread which is made receive the Word of God and become the eucharist of the body and blood of Christ, and of them the substance of our flesh grows and subsists: how can they [the Gnostics] deny that the flesh is capable of the gift of God which is eternal life, that flesh which is fed by the body and blood of the Lamb and is a member of him? . . . And as the wood of the vine planted into the ground bears fruit in its season, and the grain of wheat falls into the ground and molds and is raised manifold by the Spirit of God; and afterwards through the wisdom of God they come to be used by human beings, and having received the Word of God become the eucharist which is the body and blood of Christ: so also our bodies, nourished by the eucharist, and put into the ground, and dissolved therein, will rise in their season, the Word of God giving them resurrection to the glory of the Father" (Adv. Haer. V. 2, 3).

Around the same time as Irenaeus,

Tertullian made with fierce irony a similar point against Marcion, who had not dared to drop the eucharistic institution from his bowdlerized gospel, nor his followers the sacraments from their practice: "[Your 'superior God'] has not up to now rejected the Creator's water, for in it he washes his own people; nor the oil with which he anoints them; nor the mixture of milk and honey on which he feeds his children; nor the bread by which he represents his own body. Even in his own 'sacraments' he needs things begged from the Creator" (Adversus Marcionem 1, 14).

And, in defending Catholic teaching on the resurrection of the body, Tertullian again points to the sacraments, for in them the body is already the means by which the soul receives grace: "The flesh (caro) is the hinge (cardo) of salvation. . . . The flesh is washed, that the soul may be made clean; the flesh is anointed, that the soul may be consecrated; the flesh is signed, that the soul may be strengthened; the flesh is shadowed by the imposition of the hand, that the soul may be enlightened by the Spirit; the flesh feeds on the body and blood of Christ, that the soul may feast on God. Therefore the things that are joined together in labor [i.e. body and soul] cannot be separated when it comes to the reward" (De resurrectione carnis, 8).

After the defeat, in principle, of Gnosticism, the next major test of the substantial consistency between liturgy and doctrine came with the Arian controversy, which lasted through most of the 4th century. In their desire to uphold the inferiority of the Son to the Father, Arians cited Catholic liturgical texts in an attempt to show that the Catholics themselves, while their doctrinal writings defended Nicea on the consubstantiality of the divine persons, in fact belied their own teaching in their worship: "They themselves [the Catholics] in the creed put the Father before the Son when they say 'Do you believe in God the Father almighty, maker of heaven and earth? Do you also believe in Christ Jesus his Son?' . . . They themselves in their oblations put the Father before the Son by saying 'It is right and fitting that we should give thanks to you here and everywhere, holy Lord, almighty God; and there is no one through whom we can have access to you, pray to you, offer a sacrifice to you, except the one whom you sent to us' and 'It is right proper and fitting that we should give thanks to you above all things, holy Lord, almighty Father, eternal God . . . asking you in your great and merciful kindness to accept this sacrifice which we offer you before the face of your divine goodness through Jesus Christ, our Lord and God, through whom we pray and ask. . .'" (from the so-called "Mai Fragments," published in G. Mercato, Antiche reliquie liturgiche, Rome 1902, pp. 45-71).

In meeting Arian arguments from the liturgy, the method adopted by St. Ambrose of Milan was not to "correct" or change the Catholic custom but rather to explain and defend such a practice as praying to the Father through the Son. Thus he writes to the emperor Gratian, with echoes of John 14:13f and 16:23: "The Father wishes to be asked through the Son, the Son wishes the Father to be asked. . . . Whatever the Father does, the Son does the same and likewise. The Son does it likewise and the same, but he wishes the Father to be asked for what he himself will do, not that one may see therein a sign of his incapacity but rather a sign of their unity in power" (To Gratian, On the Faith 1.2, 12f).

It was, in fact, the Arian controversy which provoked the church to some of its most profound reflection on the coherence of liturgy and doctrine, in the light particularly of soteriology. As already with Ignatius, Irenaeus and Tertullian in the confrontation with Docetists and Gnostics, it was again a matter of the nature of the saving God and of the salvation bestowed by this God on humankind. St. Athanasius and the Cappadocians recognized that the stakes were high. If Christ was, as the Arians taught, a creature, and if the divine epithets predicated upon him were mere "courtesy titles," then the Catholic worship of him would be idolatry (Athanasius, Letter to Adelphius, 3f; cf. Gregory Nazianzus, Oration XL on Holy Baptism, 42; Gregory of Nyssa, On the Holy Spirit against Macedonius). But ritual practice and a theological axiom are jointly advanced to show that the God who saves us, whom Christians worship, and in communion with whom human salvation consists, is in fact Trinity: the name confessed and invoked in the saving mystery of baptism is threefold, Father, Son and Holy Spirit; and only God can reveal, redeem, and sanctify, or give participation in God (Athanasius, Letter to Serapion I, 29f; Gregory of Nyssa, Sermon on the Baptism of Christ; Basil, On the Holy Spirit, 24-26; cf. Ambrose, On the Mysteries V, 28; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Catechetical Homilies XIV, 14-21).

St. Basil's treatise On the Holy Spirit, written around 373 against the Pneumatomachians who denied the deity of the Holy Spirit, is a sustained treatment of the relations between trinitarian worship and doctrine. In face of the accusation that he himself was innovating by introducing a "coordinated" form of doxology, Basil gives examples to show that the church has always used not only the "mediatorial" formulation of "Glory to the Father through (dia) the Son in (en) the Holy Spirit," but also such forms as "Glory to the Father with (meta) the Son with (sun) the Holy Spirit" and "Glory to the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit," in which the three divine persons are "ranked" together. The mediatorial type is appropriate to thanksgiving, which is returned to God by the same route as God's blessings first reached us: the Father's gifts come to humankind through the Son in the Spirit, and our prayers of thanks in the Spirit are directed through the Son to the Father. But the indivisibility of God's work in God's dealings with the world (the "economy") is grounded in the mutual coinherence of the three persons in the inner life of God; and so, when God is regarded in se, it is entirely fitting that the coordinated doxology be used. Just a few years after Basil, the Ecumenical Council of Constantinople (381) would declare its credal faith in "the Holy Spirit, . . . who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified," thus completing the trinitarian teaching begun at the Council of Nicea (325) with the "consubstantiality" of the Son to the Father. Soteriologically, it is the engagement of God's very self with the world that allows the reconciled into communion with God.

It is again a matter of salvation in the next great occasion during the formative patristic period for the mutual consistency of liturgy and doctrine to be tested and established. Against Julian of Eclanum, who maintained that children are born without original sin, St. Augustine points to the practice of pre-baptismal exorcism as implying that, on the contrary, infants are until then in the power of the devil (Against Julian VI, 4-5). He further appeals to the fact that baptism itself, which is administered for the remission of sins, is given also to infants, and that infants also receive communion "in order that they may have eternal life": "Why have recourse to the remedy if the ailment is absent?" (Sermon 174). And against the semi-Pelagian monks of Marseilles Augustine defends his doctrine of grace—its necessity in both conversion and perseverance—by reference to the "prayers of the church" both that unbelievers may be brought by God to the faith and that believers may continue in the faith of Christ (On the Gift of Perseverance 23, 63-65; cf. Epistle 217).

The argument with semi-Pelagianism provides the source for a formula which, as an abbreviated tag, has been twisted many ways in later discussions of the relations between liturgy and doctrine, namely lex orandi, lex credendi. To a letter of Pope Celestine I (422-432) there became attached certain "chapters" which are now thought to be the work of Prosper of Aquitaine, a lay monk and literary disciple and defender of Augustine. The phrase "ut legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi" there has the very precise meaning that the apostolic command to pray for the whole human race (1 Tim 2:1-4)—which every Catholic church obeys in its intercessions—establishes the obligation to believe that all faith, even the beginnings of good will as well as growth and perseverance, is from start to finish a work of grace (cf. also Prosper's treatise On the Calling of All Nations). It may incidentally be noted that the many collects in ancient Western sacramentaries which in turn appear to have been composed with a deliberate anti-Pelagian intent nevertheless recognize the place of works in the salvation of believers. In ways that leave open a variety of theological interpretations concerning the interplay between grace, faith and works, such prayers correspond to the deepest structures of worship, which show Christians ascribing salvation to God's grace alone yet themselves engaged in the active response of faith.

A final example concerning the consistency between worship and doctrine may be given, this time from the East again, from the close of the patristic period. In the iconoclastic controversy of the 8th and 9th centuries, the battles were fought theologically in the technical terms of Christ's person and natures. The soteriological heart of the matter was expressed, from the iconodule side, by St. John of Damascus thus: "I do not worship matter, I worship the Creator of matter, who for my sake became matter, and accepted to dwell in matter, and through matter wrought my salvation. I will not cease reverencing matter, for it was through matter that my salvation was effected" (On Icons I. 16).

The judgments of the Second Council of Nicea (787) in favor of the use of icons were a reprise, at another level of liturgical practice, of the decision of the Council of Ephesus (431), against Nestorius, that Mary was properly called Theotokos, God-bearer: it was the understanding and reach of the incarnation, as it came to expression in the worship of the church, that was at stake in both cases.

So far, examples have been taken from the most formative period of church history to show, in a general way, the recognized need for consistency between "liturgy" and "doctrine," with an indication of which way the Catholic and Orthodox decision went in controversial cases. It is now time for a more systematic reflection on the meaning of "liturgy" and "doctrine" and the relations between them.

II. Rhetorical Relations

According to the gospels, the first declaration of the Christian faith can be either a second-person address to its object ("Thou art the Christ," Mk 8:29) or a first-person proclamation to others concerning him ("We have found the Christ," Jn 1:41). Transferred to the third-person, the confession "Jesus is Lord" (Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 12:3) is at once an acclamation, an announcement, and an assertion. In the most elemental cases of Christian speech, "liturgy" and "doctrine" thus coincide.

However, a diversification of purposes and contexts soon brings a differentiation of linguistic usage. As soon as functions and circumstances change, Christian language develops in a variety of ways, and there is a perpetual need to correlate what is said in the several modes in order to ensure that the reference and meaning remain the same.

A. Worship is the "sacrifice of praise," the "tribute of lips that acknowledge God's name" (Heb 13:15). In its loving address to God, worship tends towards exuberance and abandon. Here spontaneity is of the essence, though habituated hearts will easily find themselves drawing upon the familiar language of the scriptures and the phrases hallowed by previous intercourse with God. In the very act of self-surrender, Christian worshippers will not find it necessary to "justify" what is taking place. But they will quickly want to sing the praises of their divine lover before the world.

B. In evangelization Christian preachers have to accommodate to the culture which is hearing the gospel for the first time. Other languages will be corrected and filled, converted and brought captive to Christ, as their speakers are challenged and changed by the gospel. This process, when successful, will also enrich the linguistic repertoire of the whole Christian tradition.

C. In apologetics the defenders of the faith engage with those who resist, oppose and even attack it. Here language acquires a sharp point, takes on a combative edge. Yet the aim must remain to persuade opponents and win them for God's church and kingdom. Linguistic swords and spears are destined to become plowshares and pruning-hooks.

D. In its internal controversies the church is seeking by argument to clarify the gospel and the faith. Fine distinctions are drawn. When, after examination and debate, a position is deemed heretical, a doctrinal definition is made that will exclude it. In a combination of positive statement and explicit or implicit exclusion, the definition declares the faith. It thereby also, as George Lindbeck emphasized in The Nature of Doctrine (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1984), sets the rules for other Christian speech on the topic. In turn, the definition itself may get taken up into direct doxological usage. Most notably, the "Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed" originated from baptismal professions of faith, was filled out by the conciliar definitions affirming the full deity of the Son and the Spirit, and eventually found a place in the eucharistic liturgies of both the Catholic East and West.

Signalled by the shifts and variety of linguistic use, an element of theological reflection thus belongs to debate within the church, to the defense and proclamation of the gospel, and even to the Christian worship of God. In the nature of the case, such reflection is in a sense secondary, but it is not essentially alien to the faith. In Anselm's famous phrase, theology is "faith seeking understanding." It may be even more accurate to say that reflective theology is faith seeking a greater or deeper understanding of itself and of its object. For faith involves the intelligence from the very start; the initial gift and act of faith already contain a moment of understanding, the intellectus fidei, whereby God enlightens the heart and mind and enables it to accept the truth of God's own being and history as these are testified in the gospel. Certainly theological reflection has played its part in the establishment and formulation of doctrine, which tells what is properly to be believed, how the gospel is to be purely preached, and how God is to be rightly worshipped—all the while seeking to maintain substantive consistency amid the various forms of speech appropriate to statements of belief, proclamation, and liturgy.

Christian doctrine is literally "the teaching." The teaching is characteristically kept close to the liturgy, both drawing on it as a resource, proof or illustration, and also, in the return direction, seeking to guide, purify and enrich the worship of Christians. In the early church, the decisive teaching was attached to baptism. After a more or less lengthy catechumenate in which they were instructed in the scriptures and in morals, the "elect" shortly before their baptism underwent the traditio and redditio of the creed and the Lord's prayer: these crucial texts were "handed over" to them and had to be "returned." If you were not ready to affirm the faith and to practice the prayer, you would not be baptized. Thereafter continuance in membership of the church meant sticking to the faith of your baptism and participating in the liturgical life to which you had been admitted. From extant "mystagogical catecheses" of the 4th and 5th centuries (see Edward J. Yarnold, The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation: Baptismal Homilies of the Fourth Century, Slough, England: St. Paul's Publications, 1972) we know that Christians were taught the meaning of baptism, chrismation and the eucharist either just before their initiation (as in some series by St. John Chrysostom) or else in the immediately succeeding days (as in the lectures by Cyril, or John of Jerusalem, Ambrose of Milan, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Narsai of Edessa and Nisibis). St Augustine's sermons show the bishop of Hippo, in teaching and exhorting his congregants, making frequent appeal to his hearers' baptism and to their experience of the eucharist.

In the centuries of Christendom, it was above all by their assistance at the liturgy that Christians learned the faith, whatever the degree or mode of formal catechesis undergone retroactively by those who had been baptized as infants. This persisting insight of Eastern Orthodoxy needed to be rediscovered in the modern liturgical movement among the Western churches in the midst of a society turning secular. Herein lies one of the great contributions of Dom Lambert Beauduin, for example, which eventually bore fruit in the liturgical revisions following Vatican II. By encouraging active participation in rites whose symbolic lines are sharper through having their excrescences docked, the postconciliar services become the means for a continuing and deeper penetration into the faith. In Protestantism, the liturgical movement has meant, above all, the rediscovery of the principal sacraments and the enrichment of the repertory of communicative signs.

A number of prominent theologians in the Western churches have returned to the ancient baptismal creed as a structure for teaching the faith in a comprehensive yet concise form. Thus the Apostles' Creed is followed by the Swiss Reformed Karl Barth in his Dogmatics in Outline (German 1947; English trans. New York: Philosophical Library, 1949; Harper and Row, 1959), by the Roman Catholic Joseph Ratzinger in his Introduction to the Christian Faith (German 1968; English trans. London: Search Press, 1969), and by Jan Milic Lochman of the Czech Brethren in his The Faith We Confess: An Ecumenical Dogmatics (German 1982; English trans. Philadelphia: Fortress Press 1984), while the German Lutheran Wolfhart Pannenberg presented The Apostles' Creed in the Light of Today's Questions (German 1972; English trans. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1972). The French Catholic bishops have issued a catechism based on Eucharistic Prayer IV of the Missal of Paul VI, where the whole sweep of salvation history is rehearsed in doxological style: Il est grand le mystère de la foi (1978).

The Eastern tradition of a teaching commentary on the liturgy, with famous examples from Maximus the Confessor in the 7th century and Nicholas Cabasilas in the 14th, has been resumed by Alexander Schmemmann of the Orthodox Church in America. In a basic description of "sacraments and orthodoxy" dating from 1963, Schmemmann expounds worship as God's gift "for the life of the world" and as the exercise of the human vocation to a royal priesthood on behalf of all creation (For the Life of the World, Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, rev. ed., 1973). Then Schmemmann's Of Water and the Spirit (Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1974) is a detailed interpretation of the rites of the catechumenate, baptism, chrismation and communion as entry into Christian existence. The posthumously published The Eucharist (Russian 1984; English trans. Crestwood, NY: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1987) adopts the sequence of the rite itself to show it as "the sacrament of the assembly, of the kingdom, of entrance, of the word, of the faithful, of offering, of unity, of anaphora, of thanksgiving, of remembrance, of the Holy Spirit, of communion."

III. Dogmatic Authority

We have shown that liturgy and doctrine in principle coincide in substantive content and may even, at their most elemental, share a common expressive form. In Cardinal Ratzinger's felicitous phrase, the liturgy is The Feast of Faith (German 1981; English trans. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1986). Yet a differentiation of purposes and contexts, of functions and circumstances, may drive liturgy and doctrine apart. While the differentiation is natural and necessary, it may induce a certain "rivalry" between them. Which is to have the upper hand, the lex orandi or the lex credendi? How far are these "laws" descriptive, how far prescriptive? Where resides the authority to moderate them?

It was doubtless the experience of redemption at his hand that led the first Christians to worship Jesus Christ as Lord. If he is Lord, then it is a reasonable theological deduction that he has played a divine role from the beginning of things. Hence he will have always been the Father's agent in creation. That is how the hymns embedded in the NT already describe him (1 Cor 8:6; Col 1:16; Jn 1:1-3), and it is Christian teaching that Christ is thus the mediator of creation from the side of God ("through whom all things were made," says Nicea of the Son). Again, it was the direct address of praise and prayers to Christ—for which we have rudimentary examples in the NT and then some other instances in popular literature and hymns in the first three centuries—which helped to establish the Nicene teaching of the Son as "homousios" with the Father. With the defeat of Arianism, however, there also occurred a proliferation of strictly liturgical prayers to Christ alone, which veered in a dangerously monophysite direction and tended to eclipse the role of "Jesus Christ our Lord" as our mediator from the human side before God the Father (see J.A. Jungmann, The Place of Christ in Liturgical Prayer, German 1925, rev. 1962, English trans. London: Geoffrey Chapman 1965). Or yet again: the popular devotion to Mary as "spotless" and "Queen of heaven," celebrated in feasts that the Roman magisterium came to sanction and encourage, eventually led to the Immaculate Conception of Mary and her Assumption being solemnly proclaimed to be de fide by Popes Pius IX and Pius XII respectively. In all those cases, there is a sense in which worship has been "leading" doctrine, and theological—and ecclesiastical—judgments will vary as to how unmixed the blessings have been.

On the other hand, reflective theology may lead to critical action being taken upon particular manifestations of worship. The Protestant Reformers intended to correct developed liturgical and paraliturgical practices—"the sacrifices of Masses," indulgences, relics—that were in their eyes the outcrop of distorted teaching and belief concerning God, humankind and salvation. The Reformers acted in the name of the scriptures which, though they themselves were to a great extent liturgically composed, defined and transmitted, nevertheless possess a special doctrinal authority in view of their canonical status as word of God. In turn, the leading Reformers, with the help of sympathetic institutional powers in church and state, issued their own orders for public worship. Understandably in the circumstances, these had a somewhat aggressive doctrinal thrust. As a result, Protestant services have tended to an undue stress on the didactic over the laudatory, whereby (in, say, Dutch Calvinism) the eucharistic prayer is almost entirely displaced by exhortations to the communicants. This failing is not, however, these days limited to Protestants: Catholics with a "cause" have also taken to "using" the opportunity of the liturgy for "indoctrination."

At issue in the relations between liturgy and doctrine is pastoral authority and the place of dogma. There is everything to be said for the exercise of the extraordinary magisterium only in matters of genuinely fundamental and central importance where the gospel, the faith and the church are at stake. Absolutely decisive doctrinal deliverances are then carried forward in the fixed structures and parts of the liturgy. The job of the ordinary magisterium is to give particular teaching for the circumstances of everyday belief, witness and living. It is most appropriately exercised through the sermon. Coming after the biblical readings, the sermon is naturally grounded in the scriptures as the permanent norm of Christian faith and conduct. The stable liturgical structures provide a continuing tradition and an expectant context in which the hermeneutical "fusion of horizons" can be attempted. The setting of worship and sacrament reminds the preacher that all Christian teaching is directed toward "man's chief end," namely "to glorify God and enjoy Him for ever" (as the Westminster Catechism of 1648 puts it).

The precise nature, exercise and location of pastoral and dogmatic authority is, of course, controversial between the churches. But there are today some signs of ecumenical convergence in liturgy and doctrine, and the relations between them, that may make those problems more tractable.

IV. Ecumenical Opportunities

Drawing on and contributing to the complementary movements of biblical theology, patristic scholarship and ecclesiological renewal, the modern liturgical movement has brought the separated churches into many convergences among themselves where liturgy and doctrine are closely joined. The main rites of the church are now celebrated in similar ways by the different communities, with matching orders of service, formularies that are substantially identical, and indeed many texts in common. The most comprehensive documentation of these convergences in matters of sacramental belief and practice is found in "the Lima process," where some 200 churches, each at its "highest appropriate level of authority," have responded to the statement itself on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry that issued from the WCC Commission on Faith and Order meeting at Lima, Peru, in 1982 after 55 years of remote and 15 years of proximate preparation.

The way in which the very significant response of the Roman Catholic church expresses its general appreciation of the sections on baptism and eucharist in particular deserves quotation, not only for its positive judgment but also because it captures very well the character, method and content of the original. First, baptism: "We find the text on baptism to be grounded in the apostolic faith received and professed by the Catholic Church. It draws in a balanced way from the major NT areas of teaching about baptism; it gives an important place to the witness of the early church. While it does not discuss all major doctrinal issues that have arisen about baptism, it is sensitive to the effect they have had on the development of the understanding of this sacrament and to the positive value of differing solutions that emerged; it appreciates the normative force that some forms of liturgical celebration may have and the significance of pastoral practice; within the ecumenical scope it sets for itself, it articulates the development of the Christian understanding of baptism with a coherent theological method. It has many affinities, both of style and of content, with the way the faith of the Church about baptism is stated in the Second Vatican Council and in the Liturgy of Christian Initiation promulgated by Pope Paul VI" (Max Thurian, ed., Churches Respond to BEM volume VI, Geneva: WCC Publications, 1988, p. 9f).

And with regard to the eucharist (ibid., p. 16f): "Catholics can recognize in the statement on the eucharist much that corresponds to the understanding and practice of the apostolic faith, or, as it is said in the document, the faith of the church through the ages. We especially appreciate the following:

a) The sources employed for the interpretation of the meaning of the eucharist and the form of celebration are scripture and tradition. The classical liturgies of the first millennium and patristic theology are important points of reference in this text.

b) The eucharist is described as pertaining to the content of faith. It presents a strong christological dimension, identifying the mystery of the eucharist in various ways with the real presence of the risen Lord and his sacrifice on the cross.

c) The structure and ordering of the basic aspects of the document, as well as their relation to one another, conforms with Catholic teaching, specifically:

•The presentation of the mystery of the eucharist follows the flow of classical eucharist liturgies, with the eucharistic theology drawing heavily on the content of the traditional prayer and symbolic actions of these liturgies. The text draws on patristic sources for additional explanation of the mystery of the eucharist.

•There is strong emphasis on the Trinitarian dimension. The source and goal of the eucharist is identified as the Trinity.

•The explanation of the content of the act of the church in the eucharistic prayer includes basic elements required by Catholic teaching as well: thanksgiving to the Father; memorial of the institution of the eucharist and the sacrifice of the cross; intercession made in union with Christ for the world; petition for the Spirit's coming on the bread and wine and on the community, in order that the bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ, and that the community be sanctified; the meal of the New Covenant.

d) There is a strong eschatological dimension. The eucharist is viewed as a foretaste of Christ's parousia and of the final kingdom, given through the Spirit. It opens up the vision of the kingdom and the renewal of the world.

e) The eucharist is presented as the central act of the church's worship. Because of this, the text recommends frequent celebration.

f) The text has important ecclesiological dimensions and implications for mission."

It is important to notice that the Lima text not only contains such substantial agreement on the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, on which it focuses, but also, in an incidental and therefore rudimentary way, implies some common teaching on other topics of dogma, such as the Trinity, the person and work of Christ, the Holy Spirit, sin and redemption, grace and faith, the church and the kingdom. The Catholic theologian Hans-Joachim Schulz was prepared to argue on the basis of their eucharistic liturgies that they already exists among Roman Catholics, the Orthodox, and some Protestant churches sufficient "unity of faith" (Ökumenische Glaubenseinheit aus eucharistischer Überlieferung, Paderborn: Verlag Bonifacius-Druckerei, 1976). Certainly the Lima process suggests that the liturgical way towards unity in faith, doctrine and life holds great promise. Pursuance of that route will require further attention to doctrinal detail in the sacraments themselves (and perhaps a little consequent liturgical revision), the location of the sacraments in the broader dogmatic context (hence the importance of the current WCC Faith and Order study, "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today"), and settlement of the thorny problem of the recognition of ministries.

The longing among many Christians for the possibility of a common celebration of a common faith is shown by the popular welcome given to the so-called "Lima Liturgy." Although this text was formulated for a particular occasion and is too strongly thematized towards "baptism, eucharist and ministry" to be suitable for general use, its widespread employment on ecumenical occasions testifies to a goal of unity in liturgy, doctrine and life.

DOCUMENTS, ROMAN LITURGICAL, SINCE VATICAN II

Nature and Provenance of the Documents

This article is concerned with the documents which form part of the post-conciliar implementation of Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Sacrosanctum concilium (S.C.). Not all of them are postconciliar in the chronological sense, since the process had begun before council had finished. Since they number more than 550, merely to list their full titles and provenance would take more than the space allotted to this article. One has, of necessity therefore, to be selective. The 1496-page Documents on the Liturgy 1963-1979, Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts, published by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy, contains 554 documents, including 14 conciliar texts. When referring to that collection this article uses the letters D.O.L., followed by the number of the document in question.

The documents were published by the popes, by the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (see below) and by various Vatican congregations, more especially the ancient (est. 1588) Sacred Congregation for Rites (S.C.R.) until 8 May 1969, when by the Apostolic Constitution, Sacra Rituum Congregatio (D.O.L., 94), it was divided into the Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship (S.C.D.W.) and the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of the Saints (S.C.C.S.). From then the S.C.D.W. published most non-papal documents on the liturgy until 11 July 1975, when, by the Apostolic Constitution, Constans Nobis (D.O.L., 101), it was merged with the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments (S.C.D.S.) to form the Sacred Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship (S.C.S.D.W.). However, the two congregations were again separated, from 1984 to 1988, by a hand-written document, a chirograph, of Pope John Paul II, Quoniam in celeri, 5 April 1984 (Notitiae, 1984, p. 237), only to be joined together again as the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments (S.C.D.W.D.S.), with the publication of Pope John Paul II's Apostolic Constitution, Pastor bonus, 28 June 1988 (A.A.S. 80 (1988) 841-923). A smaller number of non-papal documents on the liturgy have been published by other Roman Congregations, including the S.C.D.S., the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (S.C.D.F.), which had been known as the Supreme Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (S.S.C.H.O.) until 1965, the Secretariate for the Promotion of the Unity of Christians (S.P.U.C.), the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy (S.C.C.) and the Sacred Congregation for Bishops (S.C.B.).

The Consilium was disbanded in 1970, but the S.C.D.W. was allowed to retain the services of its experts and members until the completion of the liturgical reform. The Consilium thus had a considerable input into the postconciliar liturgical documents. Much is owed to the sizeable group of experts in liturgy, theology, the Bible, liturgical law, sociology and language who formed the Consilium's study-groups. It was they who did the necessary research and who prepared the drafts for the revision of the liturgical books. In this they were joined by some forty to fifty bishops, drawn from all five continents. All of them, bishops and experts, were pastorally motivated and many of them were people of outstanding competence in their own fields. They were drawn, in the main, from the pre-conciliar international group of people who had been in the forefront of the liturgical movement. It is they, by and large, who must be given the credit for the high quality of the postconciliar documents, for their pastoral sensitivity and excellent exposition of the nature of the liturgy.

The reform of the liturgy involved a thorough revision of the liturgical rites themselves, their translation and publication in the vernacular languages and, while this was under way, the interim adaptation of the existing rites. It also involved a massive pastoral-liturgical and theological education of pastors and people, plus occasional correction of abuses and responses to criticisms. There were thus over-lapping stages in the implementation of the reform and all of this is reflected in the documents.

Getting the Reform Under Way

Of mainly, but by no means exclusively, historical interest are documents which belong to the preliminary stage of the liturgical reform. These are the documents which launched and guided the process by which the liturgy was reformed, some of them prescribing the interim adaptations of the existing rites.

The five more important documents in this stage of the liturgical reform, two of them followed by implementing Decrees, are: (a) Pope Paul VI, motu proprio, Sacram Liturgiam, 25 January 1964 (D.O.L., 20), on how the reform of the liturgy was to be phased, on the instruction of the people and on the setting up of diocesan commissions. It ordered that certain prescriptions of the Constitution be put in effect immediately and announced the establishment of the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy; (b) S.C.R. Instruction, Inter Oecumenici, On the Correct Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, 26 September 1964 (D.O.L., 23), gave directives on the implementation of S.C., made changes in the celebration of Mass, issued directives on the use of the vernacular and on the competence of bishops; Inter Oecumenici was followed by a Decree of the S.C.R., Nuper edita Instructione, 27 January 1965 (D.O.L., 196), promulgating the changes it had made in the Mass; (c) S.C.R. Second Instruction, Tres abhinc annos, on the Correct Implementation of the Liturgy, 4 May 1967 (D.O.L., 39), introduced still further changes "to the end that the reform of the liturgy may, progressively, be brought to a satisfactory conclusion"; Tres abhinc annos was likewise followed by a S.C.R. Decree, Per Instructionem alteram, 18 May 1967 (D.O.L., 201), promulgating the further changes in the Mass; (d) S.C.D.W. Instruction, Constitutione Apostolica, on bringing the Roman Missal into use gradually, 3 April 1969 (D.O.L., 209); (e) S.C.D.W. Third Instruction, Liturgiae instaurationes, On the Correct Implementation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, 5 September 1970, (D.O.L., 52), on using to full pastoral advantage the Roman Missal and the Order of Scripture Readings for the Mass, on the responsibility of bishops and on unwarranted improvisations. This phase of the reform which, as far as guidance of the reform is concerned, still continues, is marked by a large number of addresses and documents by Pope Paul VI and Pope John Paul II. The more important of the papal documents will be dealt with later.

The earlier years of the reform saw several other statements on its progress, on the preparation of translations of the liturgical rites and on their publication. Statements issued by the Consilium between June 1965 and January 1969 include three on the reform in general: Le renouveau liturgique, 30 June 1965 (D.O.L., 31); L'heureux développement, 25 January 1966 (D.O.L., 32); Dans sa récente allocution, 21 June 1967 (D.O.L., 41); and four which were on specific topics: liturgical experiments, Expériences litur- giques, December 1966 (D.O.L., 36); the use of mechanical and electronic devices in church, Mécanique et Liturgie, January 1967 (D.O.L., 38), gesture in worship, Des gestes qui révèlent, January 1968 (D.O.L., 42); and the translation of liturgical texts for celebrations with the people, the Consilium's main contribution on the subject, Comme le prévoit, 25 January 1969 (D.O.L., 123).

S.C.R. issued a Decree, Cum nostra aetate, 27 January 1966 (D.O.L., 134), on the publication of liturgical books and a Declaration, Da qualche tempo, on arbitrary liturgical innovations, 29 December 1966 (D.O.L., 35), and S.C.D.W. issued a Declaration, Plures liturgiae, that translations of liturgical texts may not omit anything of the original, 15 September 1969 (D.O.L., 125).

Ecumenical Dimensions

The validity of baptism administered in other Christian churches was acknowledged by Vatican II and is re-affirmed in S.P.U.C. Ecumenical Directory, Part I, Ad totam ecclesiam, 9-20 (D.O.L., 147). Shared worship, or communicatio in sacris, is seen to present certain difficulties and the same document deals with it (38-63), as do three other documents issued by S.P.U.C. Declaration, Dans ces derniers temps, 7 January 1970 (D.O.L., 150); Instruction, In quibus rerum circumstantiis, on admitting other Christians to Eucharistic Communion in the Catholic Church, 1 June 1972; and Note, Dopo la pubblicazione, interpreting that Instruction, 17 October 1973 (D.O.L., 157). On the ordination of women the views of the Catholic church are at variance with those of the Anglican Communion. Pope Paul VI wrote two letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury on the subject in 1975 and 1976 (D.O.L., 161, 162) and more recently, 8 December 1988, Pope John Paul II in a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury said that the Catholic church viewed it as a break with tradition of a kind we have no competence to authorize (Origins, 19, 4, p.64). See also S.C.D.F. document under "The Other Sacraments" below.

Directives on the liturgical celebration of marriages between Catholics and other Christians form part of three longer documents: S.C.D.F. Instruction, Matrimonii sacramentum, 18 March 1966 (D.O.L., 351), Decree, Crescens matrimoniorum, of the Sacred Congregation for the Eastern Churches, 22 February 1967 (D.O.L., 352) and Pope Paul VI Motu Proprio, Matrimonia mixta, 31 March 1970 (D.O.L., 354).

The Praenotanda to the Liturgical Books

The documents of most enduring importance are those which form the prefatory material, the Praenotanda, to the new liturgical rites. They are, especially, the Instructions on the liturgical rites and Introductions to them, plus the Apostolic Constitutions, Apostolic Letters and Decrees which promulgated the rites.

They contain a rich pastoral and sacramental theology and thus have had a crucial role in effecting the change of emphasis in sacramental administration introduced by Vatican II: "Since Trent the Church has been concerned to uphold the truth that the sacraments really effect what they signify. Now she is as strenuously concerned to ensure that they really signify what they effect" (Christopher Walsh, Instructions on the Revised Roman Rites, p. 9). The Praenotanda are designed to help celebrants ensure that, to quote some of the remarkable phrases in S.C., the faithful take part in liturgical celebrations with "their minds attuned to their voices . . . fully aware of what they are doing . . . and enriched by [the rites]." (11) "[that the sacraments] nourish, strengthen and express [faith] . . . [and] that the faithful should easily understand the sacramental signs. . ." (59). To this end, the Praenotanda to each rite explain its meaning, structure, parts and ministers, how it may be celebrated to maximum effect, inculcating concern not just with validity but with the clarity, effectiveness and wholeness of the sign, and how to secure maximum participation by the faithful.

The obligatory inclusion of the Praenotanda in the Latin originals and vernacular language editions of liturgical books (S.C., 63b) ensures their universal distribution and enduring availability.

After the publication of D.O.L. changes necessitated by the publication of the new Code of Canon Law were made in a number of the Praenotanda, as directed by S.C.D.W. Decree, Promulgato Codice, 12 September 1983 (Notitiae 1983, p. 539). They are listed in an article, Variationes in Novas Editiones Librorum Liturgicorum, hereafter referred to as Var. (Notitiae 1983, pp. 540 ff).

The Eucharist: Doctrinal and Pastoral Documents

Several important pastoral and doctrinal documents on the eucharist have been issued by Paul VI and John Paul II and by Roman congregations. We here list the more important.

On the eucharist in general: Paul VI's encyclical, Mysterium Fidei, On the Doctrine and Worship of the Eucharist, 3 September 1965 (D.O.L., 176), deals with "opinions that upset the faithful," about Masses said in private, transubstantiation and eucharistic devotion; S.C.R.; Instruction, Eucharisticum mysterium, On the Worship of the Eucharist, 25 May 1967 (D.O.L., 179), on catechesis on the eucharist, its proper celebration and worship of the reserved eucharist; John Paul II Apostolic Letter, Dominicae cenae, On the Mystery and Worship of the Eucharist, 24 February 1980 (Origins, 9, 41, pp. 653-665), addressed to bishops, priests and deacons about eucharistic worship and its relation to their life and ministry; S.C.S.D.W. Instruction, Inaestimabile donum, on Certain Norms Concerning the Worship of the Eucharistic Mystery

3 March 1980 (Vatican Collection, Vol. 2, edited by Austin Flannery, O.P., hereafter referred to as F2, pp. 93-102); John Paul II Apostolic Letter, Vicesimus quintus annus, On the 25th Anniversary of the Promulgation of the Conciliar Constitution Sacrosanctum concilium on the Liturgy, 4 December 1988, (Origins, 19, 2, pp. 17-25), on the principles which guided the reform of the Mass, the need to accept it wholeheartedly and implement it loyally.

On special eucharistie celebrations: S.C.D.W. Instruction, Actio pastoralis, on Masses with special groups, 15 May 1969 (D.O.L., 275); S.C.D.W. Pueros baptizatos, Directory for Masses with Children, 1 November 1973 (D.O.L., 276); S.C.S.D.W. Circular Letter, Officium mihi est, extending indefinitely permission to use eucharistic prayers for children and for reconciliation, 13 December 1980 (F2, 118).

On the eucharist prayers and Prayers of the Faithful: S.C.R. Norms on the use of the Eucharistie Prayers I-IV, 23 May 1968 (D.O.L., 242); Consilium Letter, La publication, on the eucharistic prayers and how to use them, 2 June 1968 (D.O.L., 243); S.C.D.W. Circular Letter, Eucharistiae participationem, on the eucharistie prayers, 27 April 1973 (D.O.L., 248); S.C.D.F. Declaration on the Eucharistic Prayers and Liturgical Experiments, 21 March 1988 (Notitiae, 1988, pp. 234-236); Consilium, The Universal Prayer or Prayer of the Faithful, 13 January 1965, second edition, 17 April 1966 (D.O.L., 239).

On communion: Paul VI Concession, announced at public session of Vatican II, reducing eucharistic fast to one hour, 21 November 1964 (D.O.L., 272); S.C.D.W. Instruction, Memoriale Domini, report on a survey of hierarchies' views on communion in the hand, 29 May 1969 (D.O.L., 260); S.C.D.W. Letter, En Réponse à la Demande, to bishops' conferences who had requested permission for communion in the hand, 29 May 1969 (D.O.L., 261); S.C.D.W. Instruction, Sacramentali Communionem, extending practice of communion under both kinds, 29 June 1970 (D.O.L., 270); S.C.D.S. Instruction, Immensae caritatis, on facilitating the reception of communion, 29 January 1973 (D.O.L., 264); S.C.S.D.W. Letter, Instructione 'Memoriale Domini' on communion in the hand, 17 March 1976 (D.O.L., 267); S.C.D.W. Notification on communion in the hand, 3 March 1985 (Notitiae, 1985 pp. 259-265).

On Ministers of the Eucharist: S.C.D.S. Instruction, Fidei custos, on special eucharistie ministers, 30 April 1969 (D.O.L., 259); S.C.D.F. Letter on Some Questions on the Minister of the Eucharist, 6 August 1983 (A.A.S. 75 (1983) 1001-1009, Origins 13, 14, pp. 229-233); only ordained priests can celebrate the eucharist.

The Eucharist: Praenotanda

The Mass: Apostolic Constitution on the Roman Missal, Missale Romanum, 3 April 1969, promulgating first edition of the Roman Missal (D.O.L., 202); S.C.D.W. DOXOLOGY

Doxology (Gk. doxologia; from doxa, glory, and logos, word or utterance) is an utterance which expresses praise to God. Such utterances occur from the earliest strata of scripture (Gen 24:27, Exod 18:10), and are highly developed by the end of the scriptural era (Rev 19:1-18, Jn 17:1-5). They are a constant and necessary part of the worship of the Christian church.

Definition. The word doxa is almost invariably translated "glory" in English versions of scripture, and is most frequently used by the LXX to translate the Hebrew word kabod, though more than twenty other Hebrew words are also translated as doxa. Kabod comes from the root kbd, "to be heavy," and stands as a metaphor for that which is weighty, honorable, important, of high esteem. Thus, the scripture referent for the Advent "O Antiphon," Isa 22:22-24, speaks of the weight or glory which will hang on the one who bears the Key of David. Kabod designates the sum total of one's possessions, indeed of all that one is, as one's glory (Ps 49:16-17).

Though the root meaning of kabod is based on external objective criteria, it also refers to inner qualities and becomes a metaphor for the essence or essential quality of an individual or a people. Kabod is used to designate honor, renown and importance (Gen 45:13, Ps 8:6, 1 Kgs 3:13). It refers to the central identity of Israel (1 Sam 4:21). To ascribe glory to some one or some thing is to acknowledge power and authority and by implication, the respect and perhaps fealty of the one who ascribes (Esth 1:4). Thus, kabod referred to the qualities of power and holiness in God, reflecting the esteem which worshippers brought (Exod 16:4-7, Josh 7:19, Isa 42:12, 48:11, Jer 13:16, Mal 2:2).

Glory Breaking Through to Visibility. It is of the nature of God to "show forth" or to manifest glory. Throughout scripture there is an emphasis on the visibility of God's glory, and God's self-revelation, God's epiphany, is spoken of as a phenomenon of light. "To behold God's glory" is to reflect God's glory and to give glory to God, as with Moses (Exod 3:2-6, 19:16-21, 24:17, 34:29-35), who beheld God in light and whose face shone with the reflected glory of God's presence. God, in kenotic act, shares glory which shines forth as a cloud, and in the shekeinah which is known in the theophanies of tent and temple (Exod 29:43, Lev 9:22-24, Num 16:19, 1 Kgs 8:11, Isa 6, Ezek 9:3). The human response to God's glory is doxology.

The storm image of theophany is a dominant scriptural theme. Psalm 29, with its flashing flames and thundering glory, causes everyone and everything in the temple to respond "Doxa!" They respond with doxology (Ps 29:9). Ezekiel in his initiating vision saw fire flashing forth continually, and Ezekiel 1 is itself a doxology of praise, a reflection of the prophet's vision, though the prophet confesses at the end that it is but a poor reflection or representation. It is only a picture of a picture of a picture: "... such was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord" (Ezek 1:28). In this life, the doxology can never do justice to the infinite power and holiness, beauty and radiance, awesomeness and splendor, love and grace which God reveals.

Doxology In and Through Jesus Christ. Christ is the perfect doxology, the perfect reflection of the glory of God (Heb 1:3). So great was the awesomeness of God that the brightness of God's face was beyond human seeing (Exod 33:18-34:8). Yet, Christians have affirmed that God's glory is seen in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor 4:6) and that to see and receive this glory is salvation and empowerment. This is a glory that belonged to Jesus before creation (Jn 17:5) and to which he will return (17:22, 24). Indeed, God doxologizes the Son as the Son doxologizes the Father (Jn 13:31-32, 17:1-5), the doctrine of perichoresis. While the transfiguration is a primary epiphany of the visible glory of Christ (Mt 17:1-8, Mk 9:2-8, Lk 9:28-36), the glorification par excellence is the paschal mystery of Jesus' death and resurrection, foreseen by Isaiah (Jn 12:41) and made complete when Jesus' hour had come (Jn 17:1, Heb 2:9, Lk 24:26). It was in Jesus' death-resurrection that the self-giving love of God, God's power and might, God's judgment on sin and injustice and God's will for humanity and society were most perfectly reflected. For this the church gives glory to God in endless doxology.

We ascribe glory to God through Christ. As Christ has entered into glory, so we draw near to God through Christ (Heb 7:25, 13:15) and ascribe glory to Christ as God (Heb 13:21). As early as the Didache we find, "For thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ for ever." The eucharistic prayer in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus concludes with a prayer for the Holy Spirit and a doxology: "In order that we may praise and glorify you through your Child Jesus Christ, through whom be glory and honor to you, with the Holy Spirit in the holy church, now and unto ages of ages." A trinitarian doxology, differing slightly from rite to rite, has continued to mark the conclusion of eucharistic prayers down to the present time.

The Holy Spirit and Doxology. Through Christ, in the Holy Spirit, we have access to the Father, and when we behold Jesus Christ aright it is by the Holy Spirit that we are changed from glory into glory (2 Cor 3:12-18, esp. v. 18). Doxology is implicit epiclesis, voicing the prayer and desire that the Spirit will bring forth the fruit of glorification with Christ (Rom 8:16-23). It is the desire of the Christian to reflect and render glory to God, in service and obedience, so that God might be all in all (see Wainwright, Eucharist and Eschatology, chap. IV).

Doxologies in worship seek to give expression to the inexpressible. They seek to break the boundaries of the limitations of words. They are the work of the Holy Spirit seeking to bring the glory of God to word, song and adoration. Often they are summaries, and they bear the implication that everything which precedes them is insufficient to give expression to what God is and what God has done. Nonetheless, our words and song seek to express what the Spirit and indeed the whole creation seek to proclaim (Rom 8:16-23). Charismatic worship is replete with doxologies.

Doxologies in the Old Testament. The psalms are doxological. Psalm 29 is a very early ascription of glory. Representative are Psalms 19 (esp. v. 1) and 96 (esp. vv. 3 and 7). Each of the books of the psalter concludes with a doxology (41:13, 72: 18-19 and Ps 150). OT doxologies are often uttered as blessings (1 Kgs 8:56-61, Ezra 7:27). Frequently the doxology ends in an act of penitence (Job 42:1-6, Neh 9:6ff).

Isa 6:2ff is of primary interest because of the prominent place it has in the eucharistic prayers of the church: "Holy, holy holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory." Though taking place in the temple, the vision of glory is cosmic: the whole earth. When God's glory is revealed, all flesh will see it together (Isa 40:5). The celestial creatures of the Apocalypse join the song (Rev 4:8,11) and in the liturgy the church joins this all-encompassing doxology.

Doxologies in the New Testament. Doxologies break out spontaneously and very frequently in the NT. The angelic hosts sing, "Glory to God in the highest and peace to God's people on earth" (Lk 2:14); Simeon ascribes glory (2:32); Mary's song itself is a doxology (Lk 1:46-56). Jesus says that the one leper turned back "to give glory to God" (Lk 17:18). Paul's letters are punctuated with doxologies: each of the three main structural parts of the letter to the Romans ends with a doxology (Rom 8:38-39, 11:33-36, 16:25-27; see also Eph 3:20-21, Phil 2:5-11, 3:20-21, 4:19-20, 1 Tm 1:17, 2 Tm 4:18, 2 Pet 1:3, 17, 3:18, Jude 24-25 and the several hymns in the book of Revelation). It is noteworthy that many of these passages are considered to be hymns which were used in the worship of the apostolic church and thus figure prominently in early Christian worship.

The Lesser Doxology. The doxologies of the NT were early adapted to liturgical usage with the ascription of glory to God, and ended with "... forever. Amen" (Gal

1:15, Eph 3:21). In the period of the trinitarian controversies, the "through Jesus Christ" (Rom 16:27, 1 Pet 4:11) and the "in the Holy Spirit" (Prayers of Serapion) were changed in order to counter Arianism. The two verses of the resulting doxology avoid the supposed implicit subordinationism of the prepositions "through" and "in": "Glory to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit as it was in the beginning, is now and will be forever. Amen." This doxology came to be used almost universally in churches of both the East and the West as the summary conclusion to psalms and canticles, both in the Mass and in the daily office.

Metrical doxologies are the result of setting the Psalms to meter and the related transference to hymns. Within the Protestant churches, "The doxology" is almost universally recognized to be the metrical translation of the Gloria Patri by Bishop Ken, set to the tune Old Hundredth: "Praise God from whom all blessings flow, Praise God all creatures here below, Praise God above, ye heavenly host, Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost. Amen."

Similar metrical doxologies are found in Roman breviaries.

The Greater Doxology (Gloria in Excelsis). The simple form of this doxology is found in Lk 2:14, "Glory to God in the highest and peace to God's people on earth." It is found in this form in the Liturgy of St. James. However, the form soon expanded and was elaborated in a number of variations (e.g., Apostolic Constitutions). An extensive 5th-century text is titled "Morning Hymn" and is found at the end of the Psalms and Canticles in the Codex Alexandrinus. A form of the Greater Doxology, sung as the climax of the orthros (morning prayer) in the Byzantine rite, is an early and consistent usage.

The use of the Greater Doxology, as a part of the eucharistic service of the church, is peculiar to the West. Though not yet in its final form, it had an established place in the eucharistic service in Rome by the beginning of the 6th century, though only when a bishop presided.

The final Latin form of the text is found in an 8th century manuscript in the British Museum (Reg. 2A. xx). It retains only the single biblical verse from Luke's gospel, but continues with three strophes of theological acclamation. By the 11th century, this version was commonly used in the Western Mass, though it was omitted during Advent, pre-Lent and Lent.

In the Roman rite as well as in the Lutheran liturgies, the Gloria is sung as a part of the entrance rite and before the collect of the day. In the 1552 Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England, the Gloria was moved to the conclusion of the eucharist, after the post-communion prayer. This utilized the Greater Doxology as a summarizing ascription to the entire eucharistic action. However, with the 1979 Book of Common Prayer, the Gloria in Excelsis is again within the entrance rite of the eucharistic liturgy. The "free churches" suggest the use of the Greater Doxology as an option following the penitential portion of the entrance rite (e.g., United Methodist and Presbyterian).

Doxologies and Prayers. It became customary to conclude a collect or other prayer with a trinitarian doxology after the 5th century. The wording of such conclusions was varied, though several formulae became common.

The eucharistic prayer came to have an almost invariably trinitarian acclamation of glory from an early date. This, which has come to be identified as "the great doxology of the eucharist," has taken various forms in various traditions. That of the Roman rite, "Jesus Christ, by whom and with whom and in whom, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, all honor and glory be to you, Father almighty, world without end," has continued as the paradigm for all Western rites, though in (Cranmer's Book of Common Prayer the omission of "in whom" continued until it was restored in the 1979 Book of Common Prayer.

A similar development has taken place with reference to the baptismal prayer, though convergence to a concluding trinitarian doxology within the churches of the West is an achievement only of the latter half of the 20th century.

The Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:9-13, Lk 11:1-4) was given a closing doxology very early in Christian history. As early as the 2nd century the custom arose in the Eastern church of adding "for the kingdom, the power and the glory are yours, now and forever. Amen." at the end of the "Our Father." This became common when the Lord's Prayer was recited in public worship (see Didache 8:2-3, 9:4, 10:2). This doxology was inserted into some translations of the Matthean account, but this is a contribution of the church and not a part of earliest texts of scripture.

Amen As Doxology. 2 Cor 1:20 affirms that "we utter Amen through Christ to the glory of God." The word Amen (so be it) is repeated responsively by the Jewish congregation after doxologies and prayers and following each verse of the priestly benediction. People were encouraged to say "Amen" following blessings, e.g., those spoken before and after meals. The Amen was understood as the ratification of any blessing.

Christians continued this practice from the biblical period (1 Cor 14-16), though it was not at first repeated after liturgical formulae or creeds. It was, however, spoken vigorously at the conclusion of the eucharistic prayer and was spoken when communion was received and at the conclusion of other prayers. It signified the appropriation of the intent which had been expressed, and thus, functioned as an affirming doxology for worshippers.

Doxology and Ethics. The Christian who has caught a glimpse of the divine glory and who reflects, ascribes and renders glory to God comes to resemble that glory. Indeed, to sin is to deny the glory and to be cut off from the glory. To reflect the glory is to become an instrument of the glory. Thus, the whole creation, the miracle of human life and relationships, as well as the bread, wine and water, are transformed by doxology. In worship, both we and the material world, and most particularly the bread and the wine of Christ's glorification, render the divine glory and become doxology, the oblation by which God's glory fills the universe. Thus, we "glorify God in our human bodies" (1 Cor 6:19). We become doxology.

DRAMA, LITURGICAL

Throughout most of the history of civilization, the contemporary western distinction between drama and religious ritual has not existed. The earliest evidence of rituals and drama is found in Paleolithic times. Persons related to the sacred through symbols, myths, song, dance, and mimetic activity. In the Christian tradition, ritual drama has a theological base in the concepts of creation and incarnation. Matter, word, and embodiment express more than themselves; they point to the divine. Scripture has examples of God's messages being dramatized: Jeremiah broke a pot to give visual force to God's threat (Jeremiah 19); Ezekiel lay on the ground to illustrate the devastation of Jerusalem (Ezekiel 4). At the Last Supper, Jesus acted out, rather than merely tell his disciples, how they were to relate to others (John 13). He washed their feet. Then, as often through the ages, the dramatic message was so strong that some were distressed.

Jesus' action challenged hierarchical power relationships and this upset Peter. Drama empowers both those who share it and those who witness it because it evokes empathy and emotional involvement.

Religious ritual had developed into theater for entertainment among the classical Greeks and then the Romans. By the 4th century of the Christian era, violence and spectacle dominated entertainment. Tertullian called the theater the devil's church. Some have said the Christians' attitudes destroyed the theater, but actually the period of social upheaval, including the Lombard invasion in 568, brought the end of theater.

Drama seemed to have been lost, except for the wandering mimes, minstrels, or jugglers who might share a poem or story, and for folk celebrations which were associated with primitive rituals to invoke the fertility of the earth. Greek and Roman dramas were not performed and practically forgotten. An exception to this was the reading of Terence's plays in textbooks. These inspired the 10th century German nun, Hrotsvitha of Gandersheim, to write six plays for the moral edification of her readers, but the plays seem never to have been performed and have been neglected for centuries.

Liturgy As Drama

To understand the development of dramas used in liturgy from about 900 until 1700 and in the 20th century, it is important to consider how Christian ritual itself is dramatic. Drama can be defined as dialogue, movement, and impersonation. The liturgy, as drama, often has dialogical form with an utterance and then a response with parts for individuals, choruses, and congregations. Liturgy includes movement. Medieval persons thought of the liturgy as involving a type of impersonation.

Amalarius of Metz in the 9th century

Mass in which the introit to the gospel was said to represent Christ's life until the entry into Jerusalem, the offertory through the Pater Noster represented the passion and burial, and the rest of the liturgy represented the resurrection and the ascension. The outstretched arms of the priest were like those of Jesus on the cross and the deacons and subdeacons represented the prophets, the disciples, or the women at the cross. Honorius of Autun wrote that the celebrant impersonates Christ as the actor does the character in a tragedy. Though this and other allegorical interpretations can be criticized as unsound, they were extremely popular, substantially influenced piety, and gave a conceptual framework for the development of drama.

The liturgical year involves dramatic aspects such as the procession with palms on Palm Sunday, the washing of the feet on Holy Thursday, and the plunging of the catechumens into the "tomb" of water to be resurrected in baptism at the Easter vigil. During the 10th century, the practice of the "Depositio" began between Mass and Vespers on Good Friday. A consecrated host, a cross, or both were buried in a receptacle called the "sepulchrum," some type of chest or enclosure. The "Elevatio" would be a ceremony taking the host or cross from the sepulchre before matins Easter morning and displaying the empty grave linens. A ritual of Gallican origin for the dedication of a church had one of the clergy on the inside representing the evil spirit. The bishop and his procession came to the front door and began a dialogue saying "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in."

Drama in Liturgy

Charlemagne, as part of his political program of unification, spread the Roman rite with some Gallican elaboration. This period, the Carolingian Renaissance, brought both aspects of uniformity to liturgical texts and a great outpouring of artistic creativity including the development of tropes. A trope is an amplification (introduction, interpolation, and conclusion) of a part of the authorized liturgy to reinforce its meaning and enlarge its emotional appeal. Specific liturgical plays began in the tropes used in services.

The introit of Easter morning Mass was elaborated in a trope called Quem Quaeritis which is usually considered the first liturgical drama. The first version of this seems to be by the monk Tutilo of St. Gall written about 900. Nine texts of this drama survive from that century and almost fifty from the next century, and thirty-five from the 12th. In rules written by Bishop Ethelwold of Winchester between 959-979 can be found the directions for the Easter service. Three priests were to represent the three Marys and another dressed in white was to be the angel who said, "Whom to you seek in the sepulchre?" Dialogue, singing, movement, and bells were used.

In the countries of western Europe, more than four hundred texts of Visitatio Sepulchri were preserved in both manuscripts and printed books and the dramas were used for both Mass and the office. During the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries the drama often became more elaborate with additions such as Mary Magdalene's encounter with Christ from Jn 20:11-18, Peter and John racing each other to the tomb, the women or men displaying the empty grave linens, and a non-biblical incident of negotiating with a spice merchant.

The drama called Peregrinus on the Emmaus story was used at different times, but especially for vespers on Easter Monday or during the Easter season. Antiphons, other liturgical texts, and hymns such as the Victimae paschali were woven into the drama. In some versions a structure for the pilgrims' shelter was constructed within the church.

Sometimes the altar itself was used for the table and rubrics described using wine and bread either in loaf or in water form. The story of Thomas was occasionally added to the pilgrim's drama.

About twenty Christmas plays, both visits of the shepherds (Officium Pastorum) and of the Magi (Officium Stellae) come from the 11th century. The Shepherds' plays were usually a part of matins. The crib was placed near the altar. Boys representing angels sang the "good tidings" and the "Gloria." Three or more shepherds came to the crib and were met by two priests representing the midwives who delivered the Christ child and they told the shepherds about it. Over two hundred and twenty manuscripts with variations of these two liturgical plays are extant.

Other liturgical plays associated with the Advent and Christmas season were Prophetae (prophets, Virgil, and the Sibyls testifying to Christ), Lamentatio Rachel for the feast of the Holy Innocents, and Tres Reges for Epiphany. Besides these there were Latin drama, Conversio Beati Pauli Apostoli, Suscitatio Lazari, Daniel, and dramas on Isaac and Rebecca, the Antichrist, St. Nicholas and St. Catherine of Alexandria who were the patrons of scholars, and other subjects.

While most of the dramas are by anonymous authors, Hilarius, a traveling scholar, who was a pupil of Abelard about 1125, is known by name. He wrote three Latin plays with a few French lines. The 12th century also produced the French dramas on Adam and on the resurrection which showed marked independence from the liturgical tradition.

By the 12th and 13th centuries many records throughout western Europe spoke of the popularity of religious dramas within liturgies, outside the church buildings, and in other places such as city squares. Objections that religious drama belonged only in the churches and should be done only by clerics and nuns (within their convents) arose, but guilds and townspeople also wanted to participate in the drama. On the other hand, as the dramas began using more human characterizations, some persons said the dramas belonged outside the churches and not within. Every country of western Europe has some records of the Feast of the Holy Innocents in which the choir boys would lead festivities and there would be a "Boy Bishop" who would go and jest with the real bishop. During the Mass, after the epistle, the reader threw a spear towards the congregation beginning a dramatization of the flight into Egypt. A cleric played Mary riding on an ass and the animal was led around the church. In some places the flight into Egypt was dramatized on the Feast of Fools. Eventually the feast became bawdy and was suppressed.

Few dramatizations of the crucifixion exist in relation to the very large number of those of the resurrection. In the 13th century, the composition form called the placitus or lament, expressing the emotions of one of the persons present at the crucifixion, was elaborated. Early forms were merely poems, but eventually some began to give directions for the dress and movement of Mary and John and the women. This was sometimes performed between the adoration of the cross and the communion of the Mass of the Presanctified on Good Friday.

Early theologians frequently described the atonement as a dramatic victory of Christ over Satan and used much heroic imagery. This seems to be the background of the popularity of the apocryphal legend of the Harrowing of Hell in the liturgy and in art. Katherine of Sutton, abbess of Barking from 1363 to 1376, developed a dramatic ceremony on the idea of the popular "Elevatio" service. The story of the Harrowing of Hell described Christ knocking at the gates of hell and then entering to free Adam, Eve, and others.

All the members of the religious community, who represented the patriarchs in hell awaiting the coming of Christ, were imprisoned in the chapel. The priest stood outside the door and said three times the passage beginning "Tollite portas." The doors were opened and the sisters processed out singing and waving palms of victory. The abbess wanted this to be a powerful drama to "dispel completely the sluggish indifference of the faithful."

In celebrations of the ascension clerics climbed constructed platforms or elevated pulpits to suggest Christ's movement. In some places a singer moved out of sight and sang alone the antiphon beginning "Non vos relinquam orphanos." A record of a 15th century description of a dramatic trope mentions payment for the service of painting scars on Christ's hands. In 14th century Moosburg, the celebration was quite elaborate with a ring of silk cloths representing clouds into which the image of Christ was raised. Rings of flowers enclosing images of a dove and of an angel were slowly lowered at the appropriate times. Down below were choristers representing that twelve apostles, with names written on their crowns, Mary, and two angels. The closing rubric recommended dropping wafers and flowers at the end, but forbade the horseplay of dropping the effigy of the devil which seems to have been popular.

On Pentecost in many places, including St. Paul's in London, while the Veni Creator was sung, a variety of things were let down through a hole in the roof. These includes: a globe of fire, a dove, bits of burning towel to represent tongues of fire, flowers, pieces of flaky pastry, or a censor. For the annunciation or the day in Advent when the annunciation gospel was read, two clerics would dress as Mary and the angel for the gospel reading. A dove descended from the roof when the words "Spiritus Sanctus supervenit in te" were read.

Spanish, Italian, French, English, German, and Latin American nuns wrote of and sometimes recorded dramatizations of services, music, dance, theater, devotional exercises, and spiritual colloquies accompanied by music that contributed to their celebrations of the liturgical year and of religious professions.

Rebirth of Drama in the Western World

Not only is liturgical drama important in itself, but it brought about the rebirth of drama in the western world. These main types of plays developed: mystery plays, morality plays, and miracle plays. The mystery plays were based on biblical stories and began to develop in the vernacular languages, but had occasional Latin passages to add solemnity. The plays conveyed the grandeur of God's plan, but also had very human characters. Humor was frequently used and contemporary dress and characteristics brought the biblical characters very close to people's life experience. For instance, Annas and Caiaphas were in the garb of bishops.

Individual mystery plays were joined together in cycles. Some cycles went from creation to the day of judgment. In England cycles from York, Chester, Towneley, Wakefield, and Coventry survive; Beverley and Dublin cycles are spoken of in registers. Cornwall had a group of pageants. Corpus Christi was one of the most popular times for the cycles. For that feast, around 1400 in the York cycle, there were forty-eight plays which lasted from dawn to dusk. Scenes took place on carts that moved to twelve stations in different parts of the city and a large part of the population was involved in one way or another with this event. Corpus Christi meant the consecrated host and it also meant the mystical body of Christ, i.e., all the faithful throughout time. In the Corpus Christi procession the host was carried through the community and in the Corpus Christi plays the history of the faithful throughout Spanish missionaries brought religious dramas to the Americas and used them extensively in evangelization. The medieval mystery plays have survived as living traditions in Los Pastores, which are Christmas plays done in Latin America and in areas of the United States settled by the Spanish (esp. New Mexico, Texas, Arizona and Colorado).

The morality plays were allegories in which persons represented virtues and vices. The earliest recorded morality play was the Paternoster from 1387. The seven deadly sins had come to be connected with the seven petitions of this prayer. The play described a contest between personified sins and virtues for a person's soul. Everyman is the most popular example of a morality play and this piece, which originated among the Dutch, has been continuously performed. The morality play was different from the cycles in that it was not based on historical sources. The plays were associated with moral doctrine and related to a sacramental psychology. Miracle plays were a late development and were based on the lives of saints. After religious drama became popular, secular drama began to develop.

Liturgical drama and religious dramas outside of the churches did not die out spontaneously, but were often suppressed by the Reformation. There was a shift in world view from the older sacramental psychology to ethical, political and protopsychological doctrine. Though liturgical dramas can be found in 17th century Catholic service books, the Counter-reformation fear and defensiveness severely curtailed the variety and vitality of European liturgy after the Council of Trent.

The Modern Period

In the 20th century several aspects of renewal in worship have called forth a revival of liturgical drama. These aspects are summarized in ideas in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1) the desire for the full, conscious, and active participation of people (S.C., 14); (2) the desire for scripture to be proclaimed and explained more effectively (S.C., 24); (3) the desire to affirm the cultural expressions of people throughout the world (S.C., 37). Quality liturgical drama contributes to fulfilling these goals.

Drama has been used within celebrations of the eucharist, of other sacraments, of the liturgy of the hours, in many types of prayer and evangelization experiences, and in religious education. Drama may function as a means of proclamation, of homiletic reflection, to embody part of the prayers, or as a means of emphasizing and reflecting on symbolic actions which are already parts of the Christian ritual.

"Michael Moynahan (see, Mossi, Modern Liturgy Handbook, pp. 153-164) has written that there are at least seven types of liturgical drama: (1) interpretive proclamation of biblical and extra-biblical readings; (2) group interpretive proclamation (as multiple readers for the passion); (3) mime or pantomime (with silence, music, or narrative); (4) improvisation on a theme (which has been developed before the liturgy); (5) an adapted form of psycho-drama; (6) scenario or story dramatization of biblical text or a contemporary story interpreting the text; (7) the total dramatic liturgical experience (e.g., Holy Week liturgies). To Moynahan's list could be added the dramatic monologue which can portray biblical persons, saints, or other historical figures.

By the middle of the 20th century many denominations within the United States had committees, organizations, or elements of existing organizations for the promotion of drama. Though a number of denominational groups have waxed and waned, during the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s, there has been a general movement towards ecumenical groups. These groups seem to give artists more financial and moral support and creative stimulation.

Significant among these has been the Ecumenical Council for Drama and the Arts; the Inter-faith Forum on Religion, Art, Architecture, and the Environment; the Christians for the Fine Arts; and the sub-groups of the National Council of Churches of Christ, such as the Commission on Drama in the Department of Worship and the Arts and the Drama Committee of the Division of Christian Education; the National Clown, Mime, Drama, Puppet, Dance Ministry Conference; and Phoenix Rising.

The publication of the U.S. bishops' document, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship, in 1978 called for the encouragement and support of artists including those in drama, dance, mime, and audio-visual media. The document also encouraged the education of congregations on the artistic tradition of the church. Some dioceses, such as that of Oakland, Calif., through its use of quality drama, mime, storytelling, and dance in St. Francis de Sales Cathedral, have given models of how the arts can attract persons to the church, strengthen congregational unity and participation, and encourage social action. Modern Liturgy magazine, founded in 1973, and persons such as Judith Royer, Doug Adams, and Michael Sparough, S.J., have encouraged the development of religious drama.

EASTER SEASON, THE

The Easter season is a fifty day liturgical period, beginning with Easter Sunday. The season concludes on a Sunday, the fiftieth day, which has been called Pentecost Sunday since the late 4th century. The fifty days of the Easter season celebrate the mystery of the Christian passover, the new life of the Spirit, inaugurated in the passion, death and resurrection of Christ. Thus, the Easter season is intrinsically connected with the meaning and celebration of the paschal triduum. The Easter season is celebrated as one festival extending for a week of weeks, and has sometimes been called "the great Sunday." With the renewal of the catechumenate, the Easter season is also called the period of mystagogia, the fourth catechetical period of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

History

The earliest written evidence for the existence and importance of the fifty-day festival of Easter is provided in the writings of Tertullian at the beginning of the 3rd century. In his treatise On Prayer (23.2) he identifies the season as the spatium pentecostes, the space of pentecost. Thus, the word "Pentecost" is used to identify the fifty-day period of the Easter season, and not a single day, as it was later to be used. In his treatise On Baptism (19.2), Tertullian identifies the season as a laetissimum spatium, a most joyful space of exultation. The joy of this "space," for Tertullian, is discovered in the eschatological hope given in the resurrection of Christ and poured forth in the Spirit upon the church, the promise of regenerated humanity gathered into God. During the days of Pentecost, there was to be no fasting or kneeling. Legislation to this effect is found in Canon 20 of the First Council of Nicea in 325. "Rejoicing in the presence of the bridegroom" was a common theme among the early writers to describe the motivation for the festivity of the Easter season. In the presence of the bridegroom the community could not fast or be sad.

Scholars have connected the origin of celebrating the Easter season for fifty days, or as a week of weeks, to the 1st century understanding of the Jewish Feast of Weeks. This feast of Israel is described in Exod 23:16 as the "feast of the harvest." It is also mentioned in Tob 2:1 and 2 Macc 12:32 as the Pentecost, or the fiftieth day of the festival. The more common name of the feast is Shabuoth, which means "Weeks." This harvest festival of Israel extended for seven weeks, beginning with the day after the "sabbath" of Passover and concluding with the Pentecost itself on the fiftieth day. These weeks, beginning with the feast of Unleavened Bread, brought the harvest season to a close. The Pentecost, or the fiftieth day was kept as a sacred feast with pilgrimage to Jerusalem as is attested in Acts 2:9-11. The Pentecost was celebrated as the solemn conclusion of the period of weeks that had begun at Passover.

By the 1st century of the Common Era, Pentecost was celebrated more than simply the conclusion of the harvest festival of the week of weeks. For Israel, it also celebrated the renewal of the covenant and the giving of the Law. Traces of this meaning can be found in the Book of Jubilees (ca. 140-100 B.C.). In later Christian lectionaries, this celebration of law and the covenant renewal on the Pentecost was taken over in the choice of readings for the Pentecost vigil. The historicization of the festival of Pentecost as a time of the renewal of the covenant became part of the celebration in the Qumran community of the 1st century and it included the commemoration of the giving of the Law on Sinai. on Sinai.

Thus, the harvest festival of Israel with the Pentecost, or fiftieth day, that celebrated the renewal of the covenant is claimed by some scholars to be the origin of the fifty-day celebration of the Easter season. In the Christian celebration, each day was envisioned as having the same importance and value. Originally, the fiftieth day had no greater significance than any other day of the season. Early on, however, it was associated with both the ascension of the Lord and the giving of the Holy Spirit.

Many church writers attest to the importance of the fifty-day festival. Athanasius claims that the joy of the fifty days is really Christ's own joy, as the one slain who now lives. For Athanasius, the fifty days is a symbol of the eschatological time of the world to come. Basil reflects on the theological importance of the fifty days by commenting on the multiplication of the number seven. The number seven multiplied seven times is the eternal multiplication of the first day of the resurrection and symbolizes the fullness of life in the risen Christ. The fifty days become the symbol of the life that is to be consummated in heaven.

Augustine mentions the importance of the singing of the alleluia during this season. This song echoes the song of the multitude portrayed in the eschatological victory of the book of Revelation 19. It is a song sung to the Lamb who was slain and in it the Christian community joins in eschatological hope of the risen promise.

By the 4th century, the unity of the fifty days began to be divided. Three divisions emerged: the Easter octave, the fiftieth day, as the closing feast of the period, and the fortieth day, commemorating the ascension of the Lord.

The Easter Octave. The Easter octave, or the week in albis, as it was called in Rome, originated from the concern of pastors for the post-baptismal catechesis of the newly baptized. Sometimes known as Easter week, the origin of celebrating the eight first days of the season may have its roots in the Passover and the seven days of the Unleavened Bread. Some scholars suggest that the Christian community may have taken the inspiration for the octave days from the testimony of the gospel of John which places the appearances of the risen Christ on the evening of Easter and again eight days later. By the 4th century, there is evidence that this week was used for the gathering of the neophytes by the bishop for the post-baptismal, or mystagogical catechesis.

The texts of the mystagogical catechesis still exist. The noted mystagogues are Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose of Milan, Augustine of Hippo, John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia. Unfortunately, there are no traces of any Roman baptismal catechesis, although a set of homilies for the Easter octave are recorded, without mention made of the newly baptized. In Milan, in Spain and in Gaul there is evidence that two Masses were celebrated during the octave of Easter, one for the newly baptized, with post-baptismal catechesis, and another for the octave day, attended by the faithful. Participation in the Masses of the octave of Easter was facilitated in Milan by a civil law enacted in 389 which made the entire week of the octave a holiday. The custom of a civil holiday being observed on Easter Monday, as well as the Monday after Pentecost, still remains in some parts of the world.

As the practice of the Easter octave continued, there emerged various ways of explaining the eight days following the Sunday of the resurrection. Special focus was given to the eighth day of the octave. This Sunday is often called the "Sunday to lay aside the white garments." This name originated from the neophytes' gesture of putting aside the white garments that were received at baptism. The mystagogues spoke of the eighth day of the octave as a symbol of the mystery of eternal life and its anticipation. Because this was the concluding day of the post-baptismal catechesis, the pastor took the occasion to offer the final words of exhortation to the new Christians to live faithfully in the midst of the world.

The Gregorian sacramentary entitles the closing day of the octave "the Sunday post albas." Some scholars interpret this to mean that in Rome the white garments were put aside on the Saturday of the Easter octave. Nevertheless, the Sunday following Easter was still celebrated as the final day of the octave of post-baptismal catechesis as is attested to in the Gelasian sacramentary and the evangelary of the mid-7th century.

The Fiftieth Day: Pentecost Sunday. Until the beginning of the 4th century, the festival of the fifty days was considered as a unitive feast in which each day, commemorating the richness of the paschal mystery, was celebrated with equal festivity. With the celebration of the Easter octave, which began to weaken the notion of the unitive festival, came the celebration of the fiftieth day as a significant ending to the season. The first evidence of the celebration of the fiftieth day is found in a decree from the Council of Elvira which, in 300, prescribed that all were to celebrate the day of Pentecost. This decree was a corrective of the custom that was emerging of celebrating the end of the Easter season on the fortieth day. Regardless of the intent, this decree can be seen as contributing to the tendency to shift the meaning of the term Pentecost from signifying the fifty days of the Easter season to designating the last day of the festival. The fiftieth day, was seen as the commemoration of the descent of the Spirit upon the church.

In 332, Eusebius of Caesarea included the commemoration of the Lord's ascension with the fiftieth day, thus giving a dual nature to the closing day of the season. This dual nature of the fifty days is attested to in the journal of Egeria who wrote of the liturgical practices of Jerusalem in 383. Egeria reports that the morning services on the fiftieth day celebrated the outpouring of the Spirit on the church, while the afternoon celebration on the Mount of Olives recalls the ascension of the Lord.

The dual meaning of the celebration of the fiftieth day was not long-lived. In examining the Armenian lectionary (c. 415-439), scholars have observed that the commemoration of the ascension had already been removed from the afternoon service of the Jerusalem liturgy, and the celebration of the bestowal of the Spirit was given prominence. Some have speculated that this move was made in the interest of promoting the importance given to the Spirit in the life of the Church. This importance was the direct result of the declaration of the divinity of the Holy Spirit at the First Council of Constantinople in 381.

By the close of the 4th century, there is ample testimony that the fiftieth day of the Easter season had gained its own focus and was given the name Pentecost. It was a day designated to celebrate the coming of the Spirit. Taking on its own importance, Pentecost began to parallel the celebration of Easter. Baptisms began to be celebrated at Pentecost and, in the course of a few centuries, a vigil Mass and the practice of fasting on the day before the feast were in place. The practice of fasting would have been unheard of in the Easter observance of the first centuries of the church.

By the beginning of the 7th century, the parallel with Easter Sunday was completed with the creation of a Pentecost octave for post-baptismal catechesis. By the 7th century, the celebration of a separate feast of Pentecost which imitated Easter by a preceding fast day, the celebration of baptisms and an octave for post-baptismal catechesis, disrupted the original sense of the Pentecost as a fifty-day unitive festival.

The Fortieth Day: The Commemoration of the Ascension. The celebration of the fortieth day of the Easter season as a commemoration of the ascension of the Lord further weakened the unitive sense of a fifty-day festival. The development of this commemoration corresponded to the growth of the fiftieth day as the Feast of Pentecost.

Besides the mention of the celebration of the fortieth day in the canon of the Council of Elvira in A.D. 300, a sermon on the ascension delivered by Gregory of Nyssa in 388 seems to be the first evidence of the celebration of the day. After this date, the testimony for the existence of the feast exists in both the East and the West in such authors as John Chrysostom and Augustine. The Apostolic Constitutions, the dating of which is not certain (c. 375-380), gives the most explicit mention of the time and content of the festivity. The homilies of Leo the Great for the Feast of the Ascension offer significant evidence for its meaning and celebration. The 5th century Armenian lectionary from Jerusalem lists the readings for the day and offers a clear sketch of the meaning of the festival.

The Effects on the Fifty Days. Three effects on the unitive experience of the fifty days resulted from the development of the fiftieth and fortieth day. First, as the fiftieth day was dedicated to the celebration of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the Great Fifty days were deprived of their traditional name, Pentecost. Second, the development of the fiftieth and fortieth days was closely associated with the development of orthodox beliefs of the late 4th and 5th centuries. The Feast of the Ascension, according to Leo the Great (Sermon 74, 3-4), was the proof of Christ's divinity. The fiftieth day, now Pentecost Sunday, supported the doctrine of the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Third, and most important of all, the introduction of the commemoration of the Ascension and Pentecost undermined the integrity of the Easter season by dividing it into two parts: one lasting forty days and extending from Easter to Ascension; the other lasting ten days and extending from Ascension to Pentecost.

By the time of the Tridentine reform, and up until the Second Vatican Council, this dual division of the original fifty days was the liturgical practice. The Easter season was seen to last for forty days. The extinguishing and removal of the paschal candle following the gospel proclamation during the Mass on the Feast of the Ascension demonstrated this division. The intervening days between Ascension and Pentecost were seen as days of preparation for Pentecost. The vigil of Pentecost began to be regularly celebrated in the morning, not unlike the Easter vigil of later practice. Pentecost Sunday continued to have its own octave, and was celebrated as the birthday of the church. The octave of Pentecost was similar to the Easter octave. An interesting twist that emerged through the centuries was the addition of three fast days called Ember days, associated with the changing of the seasons, and celebrated on the Wednesday, Friday and Saturday of the octave of Pentecost. These days were also seen as the occasion for the preparation for the celebration of ordination to the diaconate and the presbyterate, which was often the practice on the Saturday after Pentecost. The Rogation days, also days of fasting and prayer, were celebrated before the Feast of Ascension.

The 1969 Revision of the Roman Calendar

In the "General Norms for the Liturgical Year and the Calendar" (G.N.L.Y.), approved and promulgated by Pope Paul VI on 14 February 1969, the reforms of the Second Vatican Council dealt with the revision of the liturgical feasts and seasons. This document instituted measures to restore the unity of the fifty-day period of the Easter celebration that held prominent place in the church until the end of the 4th century. While maintaining the long standing tradition of celebrating the feasts of the Ascension and Pentecost, and preserving the Easter octave as days of solemnity, the unity of the fifty days of the Easter season was stressed. Par. 22 of G.N.L.Y. states that "the fifty days from Easter Sunday to Pentecost are celebrated as one feast day, sometimes called 'the great Sunday.'" In harmony with the ancient church practice, as mentioned by Augustine, the document states that the "singing of the alleluia is a characteristic of these days."

Several important changes will be noted. First, in order to keep the integrity of the fifty days as a laetissimum spatium, the Rogation days preceding the Feast of the Ascension have been suppressed. Ember days and Rogation days are to be arranged at other times of the liturgical year by the competent authorities to meet the different needs of the people. The removal of these fast days attempts to restore the integrity of the fifty days and the ancient custom of not fasting during the Easter season. The second change is the suppression of the octave of Pentecost. The octave originally extended the Easter festivity in order to provide a period of post-baptismal catechesis for the neophytes baptized at the Pentecost vigil.

A final change marks the attempt to unite the fifty days. Par. 23 of G.N.L.Y. adopts the Byzantine custom of calling the Sundays of the fifty days "the Sundays of Easter." In the pre-Vatican II calendar they were called "the Sundays after Easter," implying that Easter was a one day celebration, the Sunday of the Resurrection. The paschal candle, as the symbol of the risen Christ, is not to be extinguished at the Ascension, but is to remain in the sanctuary throughout the fifty days of Easter, to be removed only on Pentecost Sunday.

One inconsistency can, however, be noted. Par. 26 of G.N.L.Y. continues to put forward the notion that the days following the Ascension are a time of preparation for Pentecost. This orientation is expressed in the Mass orations for these days and in the recommendation that the vesper hymn during these days be Veni Creator Spiritus. There seems to be a contradiction here with par. 22 that sees the fifty days as a unitive festival.

The revision of the lectionary, sacramentary and the liturgy of the hours also makes of the fifty days a unitive celebration of the paschal mystery. Two books of the bible hold the privileged place in the lectionary of the Easter season: the gospel according to John and the Acts of the Apostles. The Acts of the Apostles is read as the first reading every Sunday and weekday of the season, and the gospel of John every weekday and every Sunday except the third in years A and B of the lectionary cycle, when the gospel of Luke is proclaimed. The second reading is taken from the first letter of Peter in year

A, the first letter of John in year B, and the book of Revelation in year C. The lectionary readings for the three Sunday cycles and weekdays have the unified message of proclaiming the resurrection of Christ and the meaning of Christian and ecclesial existence in the Spirit.

The sacramentary contains Mass formularies for each of the fifty days. These formularies are an addition to the former Roman Missal which had special Easter formularies only for the Sundays and for the octaves of Easter and Pentecost. The orientation of these formularies is specifically paschal in nature, attempting to maintain the theological focus of the season.

Among the significant additions in the Sacramentary are the five prefaces for the Easter season, each of which highlights a certain aspect of the mystery of Christ's resurrection. Preface I praises Christ as the true passover lamb whose death has destroyed death. Preface II proclaims that Christ is the new life in whose death we have become children of light. The third preface of Easter acknowledges the risen Christ as the great priest who makes intercession for us before the face of God. A cosmic image is hinted at in Preface IV. In it, Christ is portrayed as the founder of a new age in whom the world is renewed and humanity restored. Preface V declares Christ the priest, the altar and the lamb of sacrifice.

The sacramentary also includes two prefaces for the Ascension and one for Pentecost. Preface I for Ascension attempts to maintain the connection between the fifty days by concluding "The joy of the resurrection and ascension renews the whole world. . . ." Preface II for the Ascension does not include this connection. The preface for Pentecost does two things. First, it commemorates the outpouring of the Holy Spirit and the beginning of the church. Second, it seeks to unite the feast with the celebration of the resurrection by concluding: "The joy of the resurrection renews the whole world. . . ." This formula, used on Pentecost Sunday, is the conclusion of the five Easter prefaces. No mention of the Ascension is made.

The liturgy of the hours seeks to be consistent in maintaining the integrity of the fifty days. The hymns, responses and prayers of praise and intercession follow the orientation of a unitive feast. The readings chosen for the fifty days also maintain the integrity of the season. Of special note are the readings from the early church writings that are read at the office of readings. These forty-nine patristic texts focus on the meaning of the paschal mystery and its celebration during the Easter season. They include readings from fifteen authors who wrote in Greek or Syriac and eleven who wrote in Latin. Except for one text from the documents of Vatican II, and one that dates from the 12th century, the readings are from writings and sermons of the first nine centuries.

Although attempts have been made in the liturgical reforms to integrate the fifty days of Easter into a cohesive season, liturgists are quite aware of the inconsistencies that still remain in both the liturgical books and pastoral practice. It is not an uncommon observation of pastoral ministers that the celebration of the Easter season, in spite of the liturgical reforms, is a difficult season to keep alive for fifty days. Further studies need to be made as to the reasons, perhaps both cultural and theological, for the apparent difficulty in keeping the celebration of the fifty days as an extended Sunday festival.

R.C.I.A.: The Time of Mystagogy

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (R.C.I.A.), promulgated in 1972, was revised and expanded in an edition approved for use in the United States in 1988. (All references will be to the United States edition). The R.C.I.A. has given renewed meaning to the celebration of Lent and Easter, as well as renewed importance to the paschal triduum, especially the Easter vigil, for the life of the church. The rite perceives the Easter season as the fifty-day period of post-baptismal catechesis. Unlike the ancient practice of focusing mystagogia in the first week after Easter, which was the origin of the Easter octave and the initial breakup of the fifty-day celebration, the R.C.I.A. calls for a fifty-day period of catechesis, called mystagogy. The R.C.I.A. brings to a clearer focus the intention of the liturgical reform to maintain and deepen the appreciation of Easter as a fifty-day festival. The rite suggests that the Easter season is a time for the entire Christian community to join with the neophytes "to grow in deepening their grasp of the paschal mystery and in making it part of their lives through meditation on the gospel, sharing in the eucharist, and doing the works of charity" (R.C.I.A., 24). According to the R.C.I.A., the Easter season is the final phase of Christian initiation in which the neophytes are given a comprehensive appreciation of the sacramental life of the community. Mystagogical catechesis, not unlike the ancient sermons of earlier centuries, is brought forward "from the new, personal experience of the sacraments and of the community" (R.C.I.A., 247). In the revised ritual, the primary place of the mystagogia is considered to be the Sunday eucharistic celebrations of the Easter season. The period of post-baptismal catechesis is thus extended beyond the week of the Easter octave to the entire fifty days, punctuated by the Sunday gatherings.

The R.C.I.A. suggests that the main features of the catechesis are the gathering with the community, the symbolic activity of the eucharistic table, and the lectionary readings. The A cycle readings may be used for the post-baptismal gatherings of the neophytes, even when Christian initiation has been celebrated outside of

Within the Sunday celebration, the rite prescribes that the neophytes and their godparents are to be given special places within the assembly throughout the fifty days. The homilies should take into account their needs and the general intercessions should reflect the community's support in prayer for them (R.C.I.A., 248). The conclusion can be drawn that the neophytes themselves serve as a significant Easter symbol of the paschal mystery and become for the community a source of inspiration and hope. Their presence in the assembly during the Easter season is itself a sign of the unity of the Easter season.

In addition to the celebration of the Sunday eucharist, the rite suggests three other occasions of post-baptismal catechesis. First, in accord with the practice of keeping the fiftieth day as a noted festivity, par. 249 suggests that some sort of celebration should be held at the end of the Easter season near Pentecost Sunday. No further directive is given except to note that festivities that are in harmony with local custom may be integrated into the celebration.

Second, the rite asks that on the occasion of their baptismal anniversary, the neophytes "should be brought together in order to give thanks to God, to share with one another their spiritual experiences, and to renew their commitment" (R.C.I.A., 250). This directive has been expanded by the bishops of the United States. In par. 24 of the National Statutes for the Catechumenate, approved by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on 11 November 1986 and confirmed by the Congregation for Divine Worship on 26 June 1988, it is stated that while the period of immediate post-baptismal catechesis is the mystagogy of the Easter season, for pastoral reasons, the program of mystagogy "should extend until the anniversary of Christian initiation, with at least monthly assemblies of the neophytes for their deeper Christian formation and incorporation into the full life of the Christian community."

The role of the diocesan bishop in the process of mystagogy is the third feature of post-baptismal catechesis. The rite suggests that the bishop, if unable to preside at the sacraments of initiation, should meet with the neophytes for the celebration of the eucharist at least once within the year after baptism (R.C.I.A., 251). This gathering, done to express the bishop's pastoral role, would be an opportunity for the bishop to share insights into the sacramental life of the Christian as well as to be inspired by the faith and enthusiasm of the newly initiated.

The R.C.I.A. supports the unitive celebration of the Easter season in several ways. First, the R.C.I.A. gives focus to the Easter season by uniting the fifty days in a common orientation of the catechetical formation, support and encouragement of the newly baptized. In turn, this mystagogical process deepens the faith of the entire community during the Easter season. Second, the presence of the neophytes within the Sunday assemblies of the Easter season gives witness to the continuity of the season and to the baptismal meaning of Easter. The R.C.I.A., notes that homilists are to draw attention to the unfolding meaning of the paschal mystery by directing the homilies of the Easter season to include the neophytes. Third, the R.C.I.A., sees each of the Sundays of the Easter season as the significant gatherings of the assembly. It gives no special importance to the Easter octave or the fortieth day. The mention of a special celebration at the end of the season does focus somewhat on Pentecost. This focus, however, does not intend to make Pentecost a separate feast. It considers this celebration as a closing of the formal period of mystagogy.

What remains to be accomplished is the conversion of the Catholic imagination towards the understanding and celebration of the Easter season as a unitive festival of fifty days. The ground work has been put into place by both the reform of the liturgical calendar and the revised rites of the catechumenate. Pastoral planning and liturgical creativity are necessary for their implementation. The cultural and psychological difficulties of sustaining a laetissimum spatium, that is, of sustaining a period of celebration for seven weeks, remains to be explored. Such a study may also offer insights into the original cause of the dissolution of the fifty-day celebration of the Easter season in the first centuries of the church.

ECCLESIOLOGY AND LITURGY

"For the liturgy, 'making the work of our redemption a present actuality', most of all in the divine sacrifice of the eucharist, is the outstanding means whereby the faithful may express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true Church" (S.C., 2). This statement, placed at the very beginning of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, is an affirmation of the intimate relationship that exists between liturgy and the church. The principle appears throughout the document in a variety of contexts. Liturgical celebrations are identified as ecclesial actions which manifest and have effects on the church (26). Liturgy is described as "the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed" as well as "the fount from which all the Church's power flows" (10). The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church echoes these ideas when it indicates that the sacraments "give actual expression to the sacred, organically structured nature of the priestly community" (11), and states that "in the sacrament of the eucharistic bread, the unity of all believers who form one Body in Christ (1 Cor 10:17) is both expressed and brought about" (3).

The conviction that the liturgy is a significant event in which the identity and unity of the church is expressed and brought about is one which goes back to the church's origins. Paul criticized the church of Corinth for the conflicts, misuse of gifts, and lack of attention to the poor that characterized its assemblies, because such behavior contradicted the church's remembrance of the tradition regarding the Lord's Supper and its identity as the body of Christ (1 Cor 11-14). One of the words used by early Christians to describe themselves was ekklēsia, or assembly. Gathering regularly to hear the apostles teach, to share the common life, to break bread and to pray was central to the identity of early Christian communities (Acts 2:42). A prayer from the Didache (A.D. 110) compares the gathering of the church into God's Kingdom to the bread of the eucharist made by gathering many grains into one (9:4).

Liturgy, a form of ecclesial ritual action, discloses a church's way of ordering itself. Hervé Legrand has noted that the NT prescribes nothing about a sacerdotal office for the presidency of the eucharist, and he suggests that it is probable that those who presided over the church (apostles, prophets, and teachers) presided at the eucharist (415-416). He recognizes that this hypothesis cannot be generalized for the church as a whole in NT times. However, he finds plenty of evidence in the literature of the pre-Nicene church to support the claim that "those who preside over the life of the Church preside at the Eucharist" (427). The letters of St. Ignatius of Antioch from the beginning of the 2nd century provide one example. These letters, with the exception of the one to Rome, show that the churches he knew were presided over by a bishop who was assisted by presbyters and deacons. The bishop's authority over the liturgy is clear. In his letter to the church at Smyrna Ignatius advises them that they are not to baptize without authorization from the bishop and that the only eucharist which should be considered valid is one that is celebrated by the bishop himself or someone authorized by him (8).

The relationship between liturgy and the church's belief has also been recognized since the patristic period in the formula legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi, the principle that the law of worship establishes the law of belief. This often appears in the shortened form lex orandi, lex credendi. The formula is attributed to Prosper of Aquitaine in the mid-5th century but it was operative before that. For example, Augustine used the fact that the church practiced infant baptism as one of his arguments for original sin. Also, he and other bishops such as Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose of Milan, John Chrysostom, and Theodore of Mopsuestia regularly used the experience of the sacraments as a source for teaching Christian doctrine.

The relationship between the church's prayer and its belief has been a complex one. Although liturgy has often been used as a source for verifying or defending a particular belief, the church's beliefs have also influenced liturgical practice. For example, reaction to the Arian heresy made its appearance in the language and action of the church's baptismal and eucharistic liturgy. Also, at various points in history particular feasts have been introduced into the liturgy as a way of supporting certain beliefs. Numerous examples could be given to illustrate the fact that the church's beliefs are revealed and shaped in the liturgy. It is important to realize that any attempt to understand the relationship between the church's prayer and its belief should include questions about the ecclesiology operative at the time. What is the church's understanding of itself as a praying and believing assembly?

When the documents of Vatican II speak of the liturgy as the place where the church is manifested what do they mean by "the church"? The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy tells us that the pre-eminent manifestation of the church is to be found in the full, active participation of all God's holy people in liturgical celebrations, especially the eucharist, which are presided over by the bishop surrounded by his priests and ministers (S.C., 41). However, it goes on to recognize that the bishop has to establish other groups such as parishes where the pastor takes the place of the bishop. These are described as representing, in some manner, the visible church established throughout the world (42). The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church presents an even clearer affirmation that the church realizes itself in local churches. "This Church of Christ is really present in all legitimately organized local groups of the faithful, which, in so far as they are united with their pastors, are also quite appropriately called Churches in the NT In them the faithful are gathered together through the preaching of the gospel of Christ, and the mystery of the Lord's Supper is celebrated 'so that, by means of the flesh and blood of the Lord the whole brotherhood of the Body may be welded together.' In each altar community, under the sacred ministry of the bishop, a manifest symbol is to be seen of that charity and 'unity of the mystical body, without which there can be no salvation'. In these communities, though they may often be small and poor, or existing in the diaspora, Christ is present through whose power and influence the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church is constituted" (L.G., 26).

Underlying statements such as these is the ancient principle that the assembly, because of its union with Christ, is the subject of liturgical action. The church manifests and realizes itself in assemblies all over the world, in their liturgical prayer and action, through language, symbol, roles, relationships, art, music, and use of space. Supporting this realization are those statements in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy that allow for the possibility of adapting the liturgy to various local contexts (S.C., 37-40). This recognition of the need for adaptation is tempered by the insistence that regulation of the liturgy "depends solely on the authority of the Church, that is, on the Apostolic See and, accordingly as the law determines, on the bishop" (22:1). Some power to regulate the liturgy within certain defined limits is recognized for various territorial bodies of bishops (22:2).

Those who study ecclesiology, who engage in reflection on the church, have a wealth of sources from which to gather data. Although it is often neglected, liturgy should have a significant place among them because of the role it plays in the ongoing constitution of the church.

Liturgy, as a form of ecclesial ritual action, is one of the activities in which the church manifests and creates itself. By studying the liturgy scholars may uncover some of the beliefs, memories, hopes and commitments that make the church what it is.

Liturgical history provides a rich source of information but so does present liturgical practice, for the church is continually in the process of realizing itself. Much data disclosing the intimate relationship between liturgical praxis and ecclesial identity can be found by studying efforts which have been made since Vatican II in liturgical adaptation and inculturation. Other important sources are rituals associated with popular religion and with groups such as Women-Church. Such rituals may offer a critique of that which is manifested in the official liturgy. They disclose beliefs, memories, hopes and commitments that are present in the life of the church but are not visible in its official prayer. Sometimes this kind of information may also be available in the actual performance of approved liturgical rites since what is actually done in liturgy does not always correspond with what is set out in the liturgical books.

The point is that the church's prayer and its identity are woven together. Ecclesiology which does not use liturgy as a source misses an essential part of the picture. Likewise, any study of liturgy which does not include attention to the ecclesiological context is inadequate.

ECUMENISM AND THE LITURGY

"In worship we meet the problem, nay rather the sin of the disunion of the Church in its sharpest form." This sentence from the ecumenical report Ways of Worship (1951) summarizes one of the early encounters between the ecumenical and the liturgical movements. Just over a decade later, the Second Vatican Council would characterize both the liturgical and the ecumenical movements as movements of the Holy Spirit through the church (S.C., 43; U.R., 1, 4). The assessments of Ways of Worship and of the Second Vatican Council still stand. Each points to important aspects of the relationship between ecumenism and the liturgy: worship is both a locus of unity between the churches and a focus of their disunity. The theological roots for this doublefacedness of worship lie in the ecclesiological realm: if worship is truly the center of the church's life and an 'epiphany' of the very essence of the church, then worship does not only signify and effect the unity of the church, it will also be the place where the sinful divisions between the churches are most clearly and painfully manifested. The concurrently growing liturgical and ecumenical movements have brought this realization to the forefront.

The Liturgical Movement and the Ecumenical Movement

Historically, there are remarkable parallels between the growth of the two movements in the 20th century: the dates traditionally claimed as starting points (Mecheln 1909 for the Liturgical Movement, Edinburgh 1910 for the Ecumenical Movement) are very close; both movements draw on important, sometimes parallel, precursors in the 19th century; both profit, in the 20th century, from the same concurrent renewal movements (amongst others the Biblical Movement); both show a near parallel development of gaining ground in the churches in the 20th century; and both received unprecedented attention at the Second Vatican Council.

In light of these interconnections, it will not be surprising that the Ecumenical Movement already fairly early on devoted attention to the question of Ways of Worship—so the title of a 1951 report of the “Theological Commission on Worship” which had been appointed in 1937. The report was devoted to the study of patterns of worship characteristic of different churches; its methodology was primarily descriptive and comparative. This and other early documents of the Ecumenical Movement still see worship to a large extent as the focal point of existing divisions: “It is at this point that disunity becomes explicit and the sense of separation most acute.” Not until the fourth World Conference on Faith and Order held at Montreal in 1963 was a report produced with the title Worship and the Oneness of Christ’s Church which clearly indicated the ecumenical potential of the liturgy.

In the same year, the Second Vatican Council promulgated its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy which, although not intended as a primarily ecumenical document, had far-reaching ecumenical ramifications.

Sacrosanctum Concilium and Unitatis Redintegratio

Sacrosanctum concilium’s first paragraph already signals the ecumenical vision of the council, if not that of the constitution itself: “The sacred Council has set out . . . to foster whatever can promote union among all who believe in Christ” (S.C., 1). The constitution itself of course focuses on the intra-Catholic reality of the worship of the Latin church. (The practical norms only apply to the Roman rite, not the Eastern Catholic churches.) This does not mean, however, that there are not many statements of fundamental ecumenical importance to be found in the text. To name but the most important: the constitution acknowledges the need for and indeed lays the foundations for far-ranging liturgical reforms, thereby overcoming the “unchangeable” uniformity, rubricism and centralization which had characterized Roman Catholic worship after the liturgical reforms of the Council of Trent and set it apart from many other ecclesial communities’ worship patterns.

Another important ecumenical signal was the new theological emphasis on worship as a dialogue between God and God’s people, rather than as primarily a religious duty to be fulfilled by the faithful. This new emphasis proved especially encouraging in the ecumenical encounter with Protestant churches. These churches also found the christocentric emphasis of the constitution’s theology of worship helpful while the Orthodox churches were painfully aware of the lack of an equally strong pneumatological emphasis. Furthermore, there were a number of ecclesiological shifts which encouraged ecumenical convergence: the newly emerging emphasis on the local church, the recognized need to decentralize liturgical responsibilities, the stress on the actuosa participatio of the whole people of God, and the move from liturgical uniformity to a legitimate diversity.

The points mentioned here are not “by chance” ecumenically relevant and fruitful. Many of the new emphases are a result of a return to earlier and common patterns of worship. Other points of ecumenical significance in Sacrosanctum concilium’s reform program need to be mentioned here: the more prominent place given to the “table of the word,” the change of liturgical language from Latin to the vernacular, the clearer structure of the liturgical rites, the emphasis on an active participation of the laity, the celebratio versus populum, provisions for communion under both species, the clear preference for communal celebrations of the liturgy rather than private ones, the reintroduction of "prayers of the people," the suggestion of the creation of a liturgy for eucharistic concelebration (largely modelled on the praxis of the Eastern churches), and the willingness to consider an ecumenically viable reform of the liturgical calendar. The last point contains the only explicit reference in the constitution to the "brethren who are not in communion with the Apostolic See." The separated brothers and sisters are, however, the clear focus of the Decree on Ecumenism, a document which also broadens the liturgical perspective beyond that of Sacrosanctum concilium with its concentration on an intra-Roman Catholic liturgical reform.

The Decree on Ecumenism stresses the ecumenical importance and potential of our common baptism into the body of Christ as one of the foundations of the ecumenical vision: "all who have been justified by faith in baptism are incorporated into Christ; they therefore have a right to be called Christians, and with good reasons are accepted as brothers (and sisters) by the children of the Catholic Church" (U.R., 3). But Unitatis redintegratio goes well beyond the acknowledgement of a common baptism by characterizing the liturgical life of non-Roman Catholic churches as a Spirit-filled reality: "In ways that vary according to the condition of each Church or community, these liturgical actions most certainly can truly engender a life of grace and, one must say, can aptly give access to the communion of salvation" (U.R., 3). This does not distract from, but in a sense intensifies, the problems of a communicatio in sacris (particularly a eucharistic one). Unitatis redintegratio adopts a two-fold position in regard to this problem. Since worship signifies the unity of the community of faith, worship amongst divided churches is generally not to be recommended. Since, however, worship is also a sharing in the means of grace, a common sharing even of divided Christians can sometimes be a necessity. Indeed, as far as the Orthodox churches are concerned, the Decree on Ecumenism unilaterally encouraged "some worship in common" (U.R., 15), an ecumenical advance generally not welcomed by the Orthodox.

Ecumenical Convergence in Worship

To a certain extent, the ecumenical reflections on worship since the Second Vatican Council have been overtaken by a growing ecumenical convergence in worship patterns—a phenomenon which is doubtlessly one of the key features of the churches' struggle towards unity in our time. This ecumenical convergence in worship has largely taken place as a result of thoroughgoing liturgical reforms in almost all the divided churches. These liturgical reforms have brought about a much greater affinity between the worship patterns of the divided churches than previously existed. The Roman Catholic liturgical reforms, initiated by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, have played a key role here. Churches in the process of liturgical reform have increasingly taken into account the work done in other ecclesial communities, sometimes modelling their own work consciously on that of sister churches.

A number of examples for this ecumenical convergence in worship deserve particular mention. Over the last decades many churches have acknowledged the need for a weekly celebration of the holy eucharist as the central act of the church's worship. There is also a strong consensus on the fact that the eucharist is to be celebrated around the two foci of the "table of the word" and the "table of the bread." There is, moreover, growing agreement about the nature and the structure of the eucharistic prayer itself. Indeed, one particular eucharistic prayer from the new Roman Missal has, at least in North America, found entrance into a number of eucharistic rites of other churches. Since the prayer itself (Eucharistic Prayer IV) is modelled on Eastern sources, its reception history through the Roman Missal into the eucharistic liturgies of Protestant churches (for example the Episcopal church and the United Methodist church) is particularly remarkable. Another important ecumenical feature of liturgical life in North America is the creation of the Common Lectionary which has led to many churches sharing the same scripture passages every Sunday. The Common Lectionary, which is based largely on the Ordo Lectionum Missae, has found acceptance in Presbyterian, Episcopal, Lutheran, and United Methodist churches as well as with the Disciples of Christ and the United Church of Christ. In this way, the lectionary too has contributed to a greater convergence in worship patterns. It is remarkable that while fundamental theological problems remain, particularly as far as the eucharistic table-fellowship between the churches is concerned, the actual patterns of eucharistic celebration are becoming more and more close. The admonition of the instruction Eucharisticum Mysterium of 1967 nevertheless still stands: "It is above all in the celebration of the mystery of unity that all Christians should be filled with sorrow at the divisions which separate them" (8).

The growing ecumenical convergence in worship, of course, also affects parts of liturgical life other than the celebration of the eucharist. There is a growing consensus between the churches on the main features of the liturgical year (the Easter date still being an unresolved issue). With the Roman Catholic liturgical calendar regaining the primacy of the temporale, and substantially reducing the sanctorale, and with many Protestant churches regaining a sense of the importance of both the temporale and the sanctorale, there is an increasing convergence in the way the liturgical year is observed by the divided churches. Similar developments have taken place as far as the celebration of baptism, or the liturgy of the hours, or the observance of the Easter vigil are concerned, to name but three examples.

Ecumenical Liturgical Initiatives

Since prayer is "the soul of the whole ecumenical movement" (U.R., 8), ecumenical initiatives proper in the area of worship have not been lacking either.

Hymn-books have been an especially fruitful place for ecumenical convergence (and that by no means only in this century; already shortly after the Reformation, one can detect a "secret ecumenism" of borrowing from other ecclesial traditions' hymnody). The beginning ecumenical movement itself produced a hymn-book early on (Cantate Domino, 1924, revised by the World Council of Churches in 1980). Equally, if not more significant for an ecumenical convergence, have been the revisions of denominational hymn-books which are consciously enlarging the traditions they draw upon now to include hymns from throughout the churches, ages and places.

Important also for the worship of the divided churches has been the publication of an ecumenical calendar of intercessions (With all God's people) by the World Council of Churches. It encouraged the divided churches to pray for each other around the world on a weekly basis.

Ecumenical liturgical work on a more local level has also not been missing. To name but one example: The Consultation on Common Texts (which includes many of the major North American churches) has produced a number of common worship resources such as Prayers We Have in Common, A Liturgical Psalter for the Christian Year, Ecumenical Services of Prayer, the Common Lectionary, and A Christian Celebration of Marriage.

The divided churches have also come together for ecumenical worship services proper in an increasing way. Usually, these services follow one of two possible patterns: either one community invites others to come and join in its particular liturgical tradition, or the churches worshipping together create a worship service out of elements from the different ecclesial traditions represented. Favorite times for such services are the weeks of Lent, Thanksgiving Day, the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, and, as the earliest form of modern ecumenical worship, the (Women's) World Day of Prayer.

Of course, the Ecumenical Movement itself has not stood still either while all these liturgical reforms and initiatives have been creating an important convergence in worship patterns. Ecumenical theological progress has been made, particularly in relation to the sacraments, which in itself is stimulating a re-thinking of liturgical life in the divided churches. To name but two examples: On a world level, the convergence document of the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches, Baptism, Eucharist, Ministry, contains not only important ecumenical advances in theological reflection, it also makes very concrete proposals about the liturgical celebrations of baptism, eucharist, and ordination. The so-called Lima Liturgy written on the basis of this convergence document has meanwhile become the ecumenical eucharistic liturgy par excellence. The celebration of the Lima Liturgy was a high point of the Sixth General Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Vancouver in 1983.

On the more local level, ecumenical doctrinal work has also resulted in creative liturgical work. The Consultation on Church Union, for example, in 1985 produced "Liturgies for Covenanting" together with a theological consensus statement. The liturgies are designed for declaring covenant, reconciling ministries and celebrating the eucharist as the beginning of a "Church Uniting."

Liturgy, Unity, and Diversity

Liturgy has to be an expression of the unity of the church and an expression of its legitimate diversity; it has to be both at the same time. This raises the theological question of how to translate "unity and diversity" liturgically. This question has by no means received a satisfactory answer yet, but one basic conviction has gained ground: liturgical unity-in-diversity will not be based on the integration of every separate ecclesial tradition into a common whole. There are individual liturgical traditions which are clearly non-integratable (for example non-eucharistic Sundays, or worship without the proclamation of the word). The liturgical life of the one-church-to-be will therefore not simply be a mixture of all that is there in the churches now. However, while the churches still struggle to discern how to worship authentically as the one people of God, new problems are emerging, threatening once again the growing ecumenical convergence. (An example of this would be the fact that some communities are beginning to baptize with alternative trinitarian formulas.) It is by now obvious that striving for a liturgical life which is at the same time an authentic reflection of the unity of the church and of the legitimate diversity in a communion of churches will never be a task fully accomplished. But whatever the worship of the one-church-to-be will look like, one characteristic is unquestionable: it will be a liturgical reality symbolized most effectively in the eucharistic table-fellowship of all God's children.

EPICLESIS

This Greek term meaning "invocation" has been associated with the invocation of the Holy Spirit on the eucharistic bread and wine in the anaphora to petition the fruits of communion. Already in the anaphora of Hippolytus (ca. A.D. 215) the Holy Spirit is invoked on the bread and wine in a petition for the unity of those who partake. The 3rd century anaphora of Addai and Mari asks the Holy Spirit to "bless and sanctify" the offering, "that it may be to us for the remission of debts, forgiveness of sins, and the great hope of resurrection from the dead, and new life in the kingdom of heaven, with all who have been pleasing in your sight." The epiclesis developed in the Syro-Byzantine anaphoras to the point of asking the Holy Spirit to "make" the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ, "changing them by your Holy Spirit" (anaphora of St. John Chrysostom). Cyril of Jerusalem and Theodore of Mopsuestia looked to the epiclesis as the "moment of consecration," although John Chrysostom held to a more subtle relationship between the words of Christ and the invocation of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit in the eucharist is associated with such benefits as unity, forgiveness, eternal life, and the fullness of the kingdom of heaven.

The Holy Spirit is not always invoked. The Didache has no epiclesis, just as it lacks an institution narrative. It has been suggested that the invocation of the divine name constitutes an epiclesis (10:2). Odo Casel popularized the view that the whole eucharistic prayer is consecratory, and that the formal epiclesis within the prayer plays a complementary role by indicating the purpose of the invocation. The anaphora of Serapion in 4th century Egypt petitions the descent of the Logos or Word, rather than the Holy Spirit, on the bread and cup. Some Hispanic-Gallican anaphoras have invocations of the Holy Spirit; some do not. The Roman canon has no invocation at all: it prays for the acceptance of the gifts by the Father in heaven (Supra quae) and asks that they be taken to the heavenly altar (Supplices te). These two portions of the canon, located before and after the words of institution, have prompted liturgists to speak of a split-epiclesis, which is also characteristic of the Alexandrian anaphoras.

The issue of the epiclesis has been confused in the West by the development of the view that the words of institution constitute the moment of consecration. This view can be traced to Ambrose of Milan, Augustine of Hippo, and Thomas Aquinas. This consecration theology has bedeviled the composition of new eucharistic prayers for the Roman rite to be used alongside the revised Roman canon. It has been held that the ingenium Romanum calls for a double epiclesis, one on the gifts before the words of institution and one on the people after the Verba, petitioning the fruits of communion. This approach can only reinforce a "magical" notion of the Verba Christi and hinder the perception that the eucharistic prayer is an economic whole.

New Lutheran, Episcopal, Methodist, and Presbyterian eucharistic prayers have opted for the West Syrian pattern of placing a Spirit-epiclesis after the words of institution. These epicleses typically do not ask the Holy Spirit to change the bread and wine, but they do connect the Spirit working through the gifts of communion to effect unity, forgiveness, life and salvation along the lines of the most primitive anaphoras.

EPIPHANY, FEAST OF THE

In the East this feast celebrates the "manifestation" of the Lord to the world; it is called by those in the West the "Eastern Christmas." In the West it is an integral feast of the Christmas season, advancing the movement of the Lord's birth from its primary announcement to the Jews to its announcement to the Gentiles. In the East the Lord's birth, baptism and eschatological rule over the nations is captured in this celebration; the West separates these as the Nativity, the Epiphany and the Feast of the Lord's Presentation.

EUCHARIST

Completing baptism and confirmation, this third sacrament of initiation is the centerpiece of the sacramental system and the primary act by which Christians worship God. Called variously the Mass, the Lord's Supper, the Service of the Mysteries, the Divine Liturgy, among other names, this act of the church is both the sacramental enactment of Christ's own sacrifice and the promise of its eschatological fulfillment. It is also the primary locus of Christ's sacramental presence in and to the church. In addition to the entries on eucharist that follow, see also: Body of Christ; Agape; Anaphora; Covenant; Sacrifice; Anamnesis; Epiclesis; Communion service; Traditions, liturgical, . . .

EUCHARIST AND RECONCILIATION

God's unitive purpose for humankind is ritualized at the table of the Lord when the eucharist is celebrated. It is then that the community gathers to bless God for the salvific event of reconciliation effected centuries ago through the suffering, death and resurrection of Jesus and to participate again in the power of that event which holds the promise and even urgent necessity of reconciliation with our brothers and sisters in our world. "We who are many are one body, for we all partake of the one bread" (1 Cor 10:17).

Each eucharist is simultaneously a study in contrasts and a study in unity. A fragile, dismembered community comes together and is strengthened and reconstituted by the word and presence of God. Unfree people taste freedom. Strangers become friends. Sinners drink the cup of salvation.

That this should take place at a table seems particularly fitting since the table as a piece of furniture provides the opportunity for persons to look at each other, eye to eye, and to disclose themselves to one another. This happens most often in the context of a meal when food and drink provide the fuel for revelation and intimacy uncommon in other settings. At least temporarily, a bonding takes place among guests, nurtured by the host/hostess who planned, prepared and served the meal. No ordinary bonding, the eucharist effects a koinonia among persons flawed by sin, divided not only against each other but conflicted even within themselves (Rom 7:15-23).

Such was the setting of the Last Supper which is recalled at every subsequent eucharistic celebration. Prescinding from the discussion concerning whether the Last Supper coincided with the timing of the Jewish Passover, it was at table with his disciples that Jesus reinforced the unifying and reconciling themes at the heart of his ministry. Jesus took bread, blessed it and did the same for the wine, investing the elements with his presence and the promise of transformative efficacy (Lk 22:19-21; 1 Cor 11:25). Clearly, the surprise factor of the Last Supper was that Jesus was not only host and servant but the food as well. Bread broken and eaten; blood poured out and consumed; in the paschal act of total self-giving, the reconciliation between God and humankind was effected.

The story of God's profligate love was disclosed at the table of the Last Supper and is remembered at all sacramental celebrations since then. God's story reveals a passionate yearning to end our exile and loneliness. The commitment of Jesus to effect this reconciliation led to his death, his victory over sin, his glorification, and a new beginning for each of us as reconciled sinners. "If any one is in Christ, that person is a new creation" (2 Cor 5:17).

Each eucharist remembers those once-and-for-all paschal events and invites believers to participate in their power (1 Cor 10:16-17). The sign-act of the eucharist is vivid and dramatic. By eating the body of Christ and drinking of the cup, believers share in the dynamism of Jesus' self-gift and are nourished through that communion to extend reconciliation to their brothers and sisters. The eucharist also has an eschatological referrant as it points to the fullness of the messianic banquet where a just order will reign as the community of all women and men gather.

Yet participation in the power of the sacramental memorial is not automatic. It is possible initially because our appetites for community and wholeness were whetted at baptism. In fact, baptismal reconciliation is itself oriented to eucharistic reconciliation and is a foretaste of its fullness.

Participation is also possible because the eucharist effects the forgiveness of sins and releases us from the tyranny of guilt. Gathered at the table of the Lord, God takes the initiative in this regard and offers us unconditional pardon and restoration. Our response to this utterly gratuitous gift takes many forms—including rejection—but the eucharist compels us to consider conversion by confronting our culpability with a contrite heart, urging us to repair the damage we caused, and to accept our incompleteness and dependency on God.

The grace of the eucharist pierces, revivifies, and cleanses the old self. It calls for transformation so that we might put on Christ and become new persons. Only then can the reconciliation within our own dividedness take place. Only then can the eucharist effect the healing of our own hearts that prepares us for reconciliations in our relationships with others. Accepting God's forgiveness is the first step in the process that enables us to enfold the spirit of reconciliation that seeks, as a rule of life, to unite rather than to divide, to create bridges rather than chasms, to choose peace over the sword.

From this perspective, the eucharist emerges as the sacrament of reconciliation par excellence. The transparency of the eucharist to the signs it represents is uniquely profound. Yet it is also true that history has dimmed the original sign-value of the eucharist. And while a number of factors contributed to the obfuscation, the most notable include the development of a theology of the eucharist that shifted its concern from the transformation of a people to the transformation of food, a legalistic preoccupation with sin, a separation between those sins remitted through the eucharist and those requiring the separate forum of sacramental penance, and a concentration on extrinsic ritual rather than personal conversion.

But the history of reconciliation and the eucharist is not closed. The emerging awareness of the many reconciliations necessary in an individual's life (with one's psyche, body, parents, past, self, as well as with God and neighbor); the need for signs of depth to commemorate restored relationships; the yearning for peace in a culture familiar with close-range violence; the search for ways to be unburdened from the despair of one's separation from the earth; and the desire for koinonia all point to the need for eucharist. The eucharist points to the possibility of bonding in the middle of rubble; it promises presence and power in the middle of devastation and feebleness; and in the middle of this century's persistent hunger for meaning, it offers signs of connectedness that link people to other people and to all the living things in the universe.

EUCCHARIST IN SCRIPTURE

Preliminary Remarks

Eucharist, from the Greek eucharistia, from the verb "to give thanks," is properly a NT term. For, though it finds a material equivalent in "songs of thanksgiving" (Jer 30:19) and "sacrifice of thanksgiving" (Ps 116:17) in the OT, eucharistia has no formal equivalent in Hebrew (see Conzelmann, T.D.N.T. 9.409). Its intelligibility, nevertheless, remains contingent upon an understanding of such OT and contemporary Jewish institutions as the Passover, the prayer of thanksgiving (tôdâ) and sacrifice. Its ultimate intelligibility, however, whether in the OT or the NT, depends on grasping the essential fact that all gratitude is the child of memory, that eucharistia is inseparable from anamnêsis (remembrance), whether of the saving events of the Exodus or of the redemptive death of Christ on the cross "for us and for our sins."

The Pauline Data

From the middle of the 1st century we have from Paul, not only the earliest record of the institution of the Lord's Supper, but also its first interpretation. To commence the examination of the NT evidence with Paul is, therefore, to witness the interpretation of a tradition in the very act of its transmission. For, though less influential in shaping subsequent doctrinal developments than either John or the Synoptics, Paul's account in 1 Corinthians does set the pattern for all future interpretations of the tradition. Indeed, his approach to this tradition, to what he "received" and "delivered" (1 Cor 11:23), should spare both exegetes and theologians the culs de sac of interpreting beyond the sufferance of the text both the Johannine and the synoptic accounts.

Thus, the first statement in 1 Cor 11:23 that "I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you," not only puts the risen Lord at the source of the tradition as its author and the abiding guarantor of its authenticity, but also obviates the endless debates on the "historicity" of the institution accounts themselves. To create a dichotomy between the Jesus of Nazareth and the risen Lord would be to introduce an element alien to Paul's thought and inimical to Christian faith (cf. 1 Cor 7:10 with Mk 10:11 and par.). Therefore, to the catechetical question, "Who instituted the eucharist?" the response has to be unequivocally "the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor 11:23); and no "quest of the historical Jesus," old or new, can alter this fundamental datum.

Similarly, the "on the night when he was betrayed" (11:23b) is not a reference to the Passover but a linking of the institution to the Passion. Paul, of course, regards the Passover as one key to understanding the Passion ("Christ our paschal lamb has been sacrificed"—1 Cor 5:7); but nowhere does he link the feast itself to the Lord's Supper. This fact ought to alert us not to assume the existence of such a link elsewhere in the NT unless explicitly stated.

It is in Paul's account that Jesus' taking of the bread is followed by "when he had given thanks (eucharistēsas)."¹ Of course, this is the verb whence, as early as the Didache (9:1; 10:7) and Ignatius of Antioch (Philadelphians 4), the substantive eucharistia came to designate what had hitherto been referred to as "the Lord's Supper" (1 Cor 11:20).

"This is my body which is for you" refers to the redemptive death of Christ for us, as is evident from the "for you." This fact is made explicit in v. 26: "For as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes." Furthermore, the reference to the eating and drinking applies the formulae themselves, not to the bread and wine, but to their consumption, i.e., not to the elements as such, but to the action of eating and drinking (see v. 27).

The injunction "Do this in remembrance of me" (vv. 24 and 25) is—as has often been remarked (Benoit, "Récit," p. 195)—a rubric rather than a report. But what has not sufficiently been remarked is that the reference to the whole person of Christ, the "me," is in parallel to "my body." In the common biblical acceptance of the term, "body (sōma)" here refers to the whole person seen as the subject of relationships (see, e.g., "absent in body"—1 Cor 5:3). Thus "body" underlines further the "for us" aspect of the passion, even as the words over the "cup" stress the covenantal aspect of the new relationship that is now in force.

Paul, unlike Mark and Matthew, identifies the cup as "the new covenant in my blood" (v. 25). The fact that, here at least, the reference is not directly to "my blood of the covenant" (as it is in Mk 14:24 and Mt 26:28) should alert us to the multiplicity of possible interpretations of the Lord's Supper even within the NT itself.

The transmission of any truly living tradition is, of course, an act of interpretation, as for instance the words over the cup, or the injunction to "do this . . . in remembrance (anamnēsis) of me" (vv. 24, 25), which is far more than an exhortation to perpetuate the pious memory of a departing hero. It is rather the essential element in the believer's response to the proclamation of the good news of salvation in Christ Jesus, whether in baptism (see the "baptized into his death" in Rom 6:3) or in the eucharist.

The anamnēsis is what put the believer in contact with the abiding redemptive effect of the death of Christ. Thus, when Paul interprets the whole action, he describes, as it were, a full circle: the anamnēsis puts the believer in contact with the efficacy of the gospel proclaimed, even as the eating and drinking proclaim the saving event announced by the gospel. Paul, therefore, provides an interpretation, not just of the Lord's Supper itself, but also of the celebration of the rite within the community of believers down the ages.

In his interpretation of the Lord's Supper, Paul also provides the fundamental clue to this and to every other sacrament: "For as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor 11:26). Every sacrament is essentially the proclamation of the redemptive work of Christ; and the eucharist in particular is this proclamation par excellence. All sacraments derive their meaning and significance from the word they proclaim, even as each in its own way proclaims that same word. The sacraments are thus another mode of this proclamation, in their words no less than in their gestures and actions.

Elsewhere in the same letter to the Corinthians we find, not so much another version of the institution, as another interpretation of its content. In this instance, it is the interpretation that dictates the sequence in 1 Corinthians 10 of "the cup of blessing which we bless" preceding the "bread which we break" (10:16). Here "participation/communion" (koinōnia has both senses) is the key to the significance of the action. That the "cup of blessing which we bless" is a "koinōnia in the blood of Christ" makes explicit the function of the "remembrance" in "Do this in remembrance of me" (1 Cor 11:24, 25). It makes explicit, that is, the function of the celebration in putting the believer in contact with the redemptive death. But it stresses an aspect of this contact precisely as "koinōnia in the blood of Christ," i.e., in the death of Christ on the cross.

Moreover, in the following statement on the bread, it elaborates the notion further ("Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body, for we partake of the one bread"—10:17). It was this logical order of argument, and not some echo of a different tradition such as we find for instance in the Didache, that dictated the cup-bread order we have in 1 Cor 10:16-17.

By introducing the reference to the "body of Christ" in the sense of the community of the redeemed (Rom 12:5; 1 Cor 12:27), the interpretation of the "bread we break" as a koinōnia in "the body of Christ" underscores two aspects of the eucharist: it, like baptism (1 Cor 12:12-13; Rom 6:3-11), makes the believers beneficiaries of the redemptive act of Christ, at the same time that it incorporates them into this one body. The eucharist is the sacrament of the church in that it brings the church into being as the body of Christ; but it can take place only as an act of the church as the body of Christ. These two aspects are so inextricably linked that their converse is equally true. The absence of one makes the other impossible: "When you meet together, it is not the Lord's Supper that you eat" (1 Cor 11:20). Precisely as, and only in so far as, the community of believers assembles "as a church" (11:18) can it celebrate the eucharist and, celebrating it, become the body of Christ (1 Cor 10:17). "The Lord's Supper sets us in the Body of Christ, in the presence of the Exalted One who, having passed through death, now reigns: it therefore places us under the lordship of the Kyrios" (Käsemann, 132).

The Didache echoes this mode of understanding the eucharistic celebrations: "As this broken bread was scattered upon the mountains, but was brought together and became one, so let thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into thy kingdom . . ." (Didache 9.4).

Mark and Matthew

Both in their similarity to one another and in their concordant divergence from the accounts in Luke and in Paul, these two narratives of the institution can be treated simultaneously. The setting of the event in them is unmistakably the eating of the Passover (to pascha) (Mk 14:12-16; Mt 26:17-20). Therefore, whether or not the Last Supper itself was a Passover meal (see Jeremias, pp. 15-88; Taylor, pp. 664-667), there is reason for trying to interpret that action and the blessing pronounced (eulogēsas) in Passover categories. But this is not true of the altogether remarkable "this is my body . . . ; this is my blood." For "important though the Passover motif may otherwise be in the christological ideas of early Christianity, for the words of institution it contributes nothing" (Bornkamm, 134; and see Léon-Dufour, 189-194).

Jesus "took bread, and blessed, and broke it and gave it to them" in Mk 14:22 is made explicit in Mt 26:26 as "to the disciples." Mark's "take; this is my body" becomes "take, eat" in Matthew. This latter modification would have been a negligible redactional retouch, did it not affect the meaning of the formula. In general, commentators are content to regard the addition as merely stylistic, setting the bread formula in parallel with that of the cup. Nevertheless, a case can be made for taking the neuter touto (this) in "this is my body" as referring, in what is called an ad sensum construction, to the taking and eating rather than to "body" (sōma), which is masculine. Thus, while in Mark the reference is clearly the bread, in Matthew a case can be made for taking it to be the "take, eat." If this be so, then we have even here, not one, but two interpretations of the formula, where Mark's would lead itself more readily to later disputations on the "substance" than would Matthew's. While the formula over the bread itself, either in Mark or in Matthew, does not in any way link the "body" to the death of Jesus (Benoit-Boismard 11.384), the meaning of "body" in Mark is, and remains, more of a crux for interpreters than in Matthew.

The cup formula, however, evinces a marked difference between the two evangelists. In Mark it is pronounced by Jesus after "they all drank of it" (Mk 14:23). Thus here the question of the referent can and does arise: "this is my blood of the covenant" refers to the cup, since there is no mention of "wine" as there is of "bread" in v. 22. But it refers especially to the drinking, "And he took a cup . . . gave it to them . . . and they all drank of it" (Mk 14:23; see 1 Cor 11:26, where the reference to the eating and the drinking is unequivocal). In Matthew, however, the situation is slightly adjusted by the addition of the imperative "drink of it, all of you, for this is my blood . . ." (Mt 26:27b-28).

Any understanding of the eucharist inevitably hinges on determining what precisely the "this" (touto) refers to. In Mark and Matthew it is the cup formula which really interprets the action as a reference to the redemptive death: "which is poured out for many" (Mk 14:24) and, in Matthew, by "for the forgiveness of sins" (Mt 26:38). Thus in these two gospels, as in the other accounts of the institution in the NT, the narrative and its content are already theologically interpreted, and no amount of exegetical ingenuity can wholly separate the "fact" from that interpretation. Therefore, each account of the Last Supper in the NT is a distinct eucharistic theology.

Luke

Of all the accounts of institution, the one in the gospel of Luke is the most textually vexing. But, whether one adopts the shorter version (Lk 22:15-19a) or the longer (vv. 15-20), the order of cup-bread in the former or cup-bread-cup in the latter requires explanation. Descriptions of the Passover seder, of Jewish celebratory practices, and of their background in the OT, are all alike called upon to provide an explanation (see recent commentaries on Luke such as J.A. Fitzmyer, pp. 1385-1406; and I.H. Marshall, pp. 799-807). Nevertheless, the mere fact of the cup preceding the bread, if surprising, need not be inexplicable. As indicated above, in 1 Cor 10:16-17, the order of cup first is dictated by Paul's interpretation of the Lord's Supper in terms of the bread rather than of the cup. Though both "the cup of blessings which we bless" and "the bread which we break" are interpreted as koinōnia in the blood and the body of Christ respectively, it is the bread/body that provides Paul with the image he needs in order to proceed, "Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body, for we all partake of the one bread" (1 Cor 10:17). Moreover, since the reference to "blood" is clearly to the redemptive death, as it is elsewhere in Paul (e.g., Rom 3:25; 5:9), the cup-bread order in 1 Corinthians 10 is dictated by the logic of expository exigence as it is not in, for example, an almost equally ancient, extra-canonical work, the Didache: "And concerning the Eucharist [this is one of the earliest instances of the usage of this term], hold Eucharist thus: First, concerning the Cup, 'We give thanks to thee, our Father, for the Holy Vine of David thy child; to thee be glory for ever.' And concerning the broken Bread: 'We give thee thanks, our Father, for the life and knowledge which thou didst make known to us through Jesus thy child. To thee be glory forever'" (Didache 9.1-3).

Luke's text is usually regarded as closer to that of 1 Cor 11 than to Mark and Matthew. For, in addition to the "Do this is remembrance of me" (Lk 22:19b; cf. 1 Cor 11:24-25), it is prefaced by an explicit reference to the coming of the kingdom of God (22:16; cf. 1 Cor 11:26). Whether it be taken as integral to the account of the institution or regarded as prefatory to it, the reference indelibly marks the account and its understanding as eschatological, that is, as belonging to the "last times" inaugurated by the coming of the Lord. The eucharist is an act that proclaims the presence of the last times in our midst. No understanding of "the new covenant in my blood," in Luke or elsewhere, is possible without the realization that the covenant is both final and definitive (see Heb 7:27). Thus it is that the church in celebrating the eucharist has, with unfailing insight, coupled the Lord's Prayer and the words of the institution: "Thy kingdom come . . . give us our bread" find their true meaning in the "for you" of the bread formula and in "the covenant" of the cup formula.

The Fourth Gospel

It is not an unremarked fact that the fourth gospel has no narrative of the eucharistic institution. If at first baffling, such omission is not the least logical of the gospel's qualities. What the Prologue climax affirms, "The Word became flesh" (Jn 1:14), is elaborated throughout both the "Book of Signs" (Jn 1-12) and the "Book of Glory" (chaps. 13-21). To have inserted an institution account in the closing chapters would have been redundant. What the fourth gospel does, however, is more illuminating. It explains, in the discourse on the bread of life in chap. 6, the meaning of the eucharist in terms of the Prologue. This is why the "sacramental realism" of Jn 6:53-58 can best be understood in terms of the Word which "became flesh" for the "life of the world." Here alone do we have the properly biblical coupling of "flesh and blood" and not, as elsewhere in the institution accounts, "body and blood."

It is at this point that one can best understand how the eucharist is, above all else, the "mystery of faith," faith in the flesh which the Word became. If a proper understanding of Jn 6:52-59 is to be sought, then it is to be sought, not in the abstract theological terminology of later eucharistic debates, but in its collocation in the same chapter with two major themes: the banquet of wisdom and the meaning of discipleship. The proper significance of the mystery is given final expression in the Petrine confession, "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life; and we have believed, and have come to know, that you are the Holy One of God" (Jn 6:69).

EUCCHARIST, HISTORY OF, IN EARLY CHURCH

The history of the eucharist is inseparable from the history of the church. Our earliest evidence of Christianity is of communities (ekklesiai) whose life was centered in gatherings of the baptized for communal meals, normally held on the day after the Sabbath, the first day of the week, or "Lord's Day." Their writings, many but not all of which were later included in the NT, are replete with allusions to the receiving of the bread and wine over which blessings were offered as communion in the body and blood of Christ. While these allusions tell us less than we would now like to know about the eucharistic practices assumed by their readers, they provide us with the beginnings of the history of eucharistic celebration of the early church.

Background

Nothing has proved so important for the study of this evidence as recognition of Christian indebtedness to Jewish practices regarding the blessings offered over foods, and in particular the bread and wine at the family meals on the Sabbath and at the Passover (cf. Mishnah, Ber.). For Israel, these meals, together with the synagogue meetings, proclaimed and enacted the identity of Israel as the people of God. In them lie the roots of the Christian assumption that the eucharistic bread and wine are the sustenance of the new people called together through the death and resurrection of Christ. The Greek eucharistia (thanksgiving), the term destined to supplant "Lord's Supper" or "breaking of bread" as the common designation of the Christian meals as early as Ignatius of Antioch (see below), translates the Hebrew berakah, the term which denotes the blessing form of all Jewish prayers, including the prayers offered at meals.

Paul and the Gospels

The earliest evidence of eucharistic practice is found in Paul's instructions on the Lord's Supper in 1 Cor 11:17-34, his response to reports that groups of Corinthian Christians ate without waiting for all to gather for the blessings over the bread and wine. Here Paul appeals to the "tradition" he has already delivered (11:23ff) recounting the words and actions of Jesus at the Last Supper ("that the Lord Jesus, the night he was betrayed. . .") and the command that they be repeated as a "memorial," that is, done by the church to celebrate the redemptive work of Christ. This is, he says, a "showing forth of the Lord's death until he comes again" (11:26). The disunity evident in its neglect "profanes the body and blood of the Lord" and involves failure to "discern the body" (11:27-8). It is clear that Paul recognizes the Last Supper "tradition" as already implying that the death of Jesus is a new Passover sacrifice (cf. 5:7-8), and also that he, Paul, sees the "Lord's Supper" as he does baptism, as effecting the formation of the body of Christ through the Spirit. This is the subject of the extended discussion of the body and its members which follows (12:12-27).

The eucharistic practice which Paul enjoins plainly assumes the practice of Jewish meal blessings, but is specifically governed by the account of the blessings contained in the Last Supper "tradition." It is not clear, however, that these later so-called "words of institution" were for him liturgical formulas, and more likely that they simply constituted an explanation of the significance of the church's "memorial" of Christ's death. Nor is it clear that he assumes that the Lord's Supper is to be held on every Lord's Day (most probably on what we should call Saturday night, given Jewish reckoning of days from sunset), though this is the general deduction from his reference to a weekly gathering on the first day of the week (1 Cor 16:2).

The synoptic gospels incorporate the Last Supper "tradition" in a form or forms independent of Paul, both in their accounts of the miraculous feedings (Mk 6:41-2, 8:6-8; Mt 14:19-20, 15:36-7; Lk 9:16-17), which employ the technical terminology of "taking, blessing, breaking, and giving," and in the passion narrative. In the latter case, their locating of the last meal on the night of the slaughter of the passover lambs reflects the "tradition" in identifying the death of Jesus as a new passover sacrifice of which Christians partake. But Mk 14:22-5 and Mt 26:26-9 are less concerned with the actual relation of the blessings to the course of the meal than is Paul, while Lk 22:15-20, which seems to conflate Mark and 1 Corinthians, seems to some to suggest that the blessings over both bread and wine were conflated together at the end of the meal in the practice the author knew (cf. the eucharistic description of the resurrection appearance at Emmaus in Lk 24:30).

The gospel of John, exercises its "reserve" with respect to Christian practices by omitting reference to the Last Supper "tradition" from the passion narrative, substituting for it the account of the washing of the disciples' feet and the command that it be continued (Jn 13:1-11). However, the Johannine account of the miraculous feeding is the occasion for an extended eucharistic commentary (6:25-60), which counters the theme of the eucharistic bread as foreshadowed by the manna in the wilderness (cf. 1 Cor 10:1-4; Rev 2:17) with emphasis on Jesus' body itself as the true "bread from heaven." The theme of the vine and the branches, developed in the discourse at the last meal (Jn 15:1-8), also has eucharistic overtones. As is well known, John differs from the Synoptics in setting the last meal, rightly or wrongly, "before the feast of Passover" (15:1), so that the last meal is not a Passover seder and Jesus' death itself takes place on the day of the slaughter of the Passover lambs.

Critical efforts to recover the historical basis of the Last Supper "tradition" will continue. For us, it is important to see that 1 Corinthians and the gospels, even including John, reflect prior use of the "tradition" as an explanation of the eucharistic meals of the earliest communities.

Wider NT and Related Evidence

There are few actual references to eucharistic meals in the other writings later included in the NT. Mention of the primitive Jerusalem community as "day by day attending the temple and breaking bread in their homes" (Acts 2:46), if indeed it is eucharistic, is unusual. The account in Acts 20:7-12 of Paul's healing of Eutychus at Troas during an evening meeting on the "first day of the week . . . to break bread" probably provides evidence of the celebration of the eucharist on Saturday night, but is essentially a miracle story rather than evidence to that point.

But these writings contain recurrent allusions which, if less frequent than those to baptism, witness to the central place of the eucharist in the life of the communities for which they were written. In Heb 6:4-5, for instance, it is hard to miss the eucharistic, no less than the baptismal, reference to Christians as those who have been "enlightened, and tasted the heavenly gift, and have become partakers of the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the Word of God and the powers of the age to come." Moreover, it is in Heb 7:15-28 that we first encounter the motif of Jesus' sacrifice as foreshadowed in the account of the Melchizedek priest (Gen 14:18), a motif which elsewhere forms part of the interpretation of the eucharist as the pure sacrifice of bread and wine prophesied to be offered in the last days (cf. Justin, Dial. 41, 70, 117). In I Pet 2:5, the description of Christians as "a royal priesthood" called to make "spiritual sacrifices" may well refer to the church as eucharistic community. In Revelation, eucharistic and baptismal references are combined in the promise that the martyrs will be given "to eat of the heavenly manna . . . and . . . a new name" (2:17), and the final consummation is described as "the marriage feast of the Lamb" (19:7-9). But it has also been suggested that this apocalyptic vision, described as occurring on the Lord's Day (1:10), is more generally framed on the outline of a gathering to hear the scriptures and celebrate the eucharist. Indeed, all of these writings should be read, with due caution to be sure, as coming from communities whose life was focused in the eucharist.

The same is true of the contemporary writings not included in the NT. Among these, I Clement, a formal letter from the Roman church to the church of Corinth commonly dated after the Domitian persecution of A.D. 96, offers support to the authority of the Corinthian leadership by comparing the members of the Christian body (cf. I Cor 12:12-27) to the high priests, Levites, and people of Israel in their responsibilities for the offering of sacrifices (I Clement 40-41), with obvious eucharistic implications so far as the functions of those appointed by the apostles for this work (42-4). Moreover, the lyric blessing prayer or set of prayers for the unity of the church, with which the letter draws to an end (59.2-64.1), while not specifically eucharistic, follows the outline of Jewish blessing prayers which we may suppose had become habitual for the author from their eucharistic use.

Independent of Clement are the letters of Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, written to churches he would visit on his way to Rome for martyrdom sometime prior to the death of the Emperor Trajan in A.D. 117. Concerned with the menace of "docetic" or Gnostic teachers who deny the incarnation of Christ, and either gather disciples apart from the general body of the baptized or absent themselves from the eucharist, Ignatius recurrently stresses the importance of the one eucharistic community, gathered around the bishop, presbyters, and deacons, as expressing the faith that "there is only one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ and one cup to unite us in his blood" (Philad 4, cf. Eph 13.1, Smyrn 7.1, etc.). In contrast to the claims of his opponents, the eucharist is "the medicine of immortality, the antidote to death, giving life in Jesus Christ forever" (Eph 20:1-2).

Nor can we omit mention of the Martyrdom of Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna and one of Ignatius' correspondents (d. 256), which contains a prayer said to have been offered by Polycarp at the point of death. Cast in the form of a blessing of God that he has been "deemed worthy" to drink "the cup of Christ" and asking that he be received as an "acceptable sacrifice," this prayer may well be framed on Polycarp's habitual eucharistic blessing prayer. At the least it reflects, as does the prayer of I Clement, the Gentile Christian appropriation of the Jewish berakah form.

Didache

In a category by itself is the recently recovered Didache ("The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles"), a 2nd-century Greek compilation and edition of Aramaic liturgical materials probably of rural Syrian-Palestinian provenance from the later decades of the 1st century. In its 2nd century form, this work brings together material to form a pre-baptismal catechesis (the "Two Ways" document of I-VI), a description of paschal baptism and eucharist (VII-X), and an exhortation to observe the Sunday eucharist (XIV) set amidst directions for the treatment of visiting prophets and the necessity of establishing a regular ministry of bishops and deacons (XI-XV). As such, it follows a 2nd-century pattern of liturgical description found in Justin Martyr and the Apostolic Tradition (see below).

Attention here must focus on the eucharistic materials of IX-X. These include blessings to be said before the meal over an initial cup of wine for "the vine of David, your child (pais, the servant of Isaiah in LXX = Septuagint version of OT)", and over the broken bread (klasma) for "the life and knowledge revealed through Jesus, your child," with the prayer that, as grain scattered on the hillside is made into the loaf of bread, so the church may be gathered into the kingdom. After the meal, there follows a connected series of blessings for the name of God and the knowledge and faith revealed in the servant Jesus, for food and drink and for spiritual food and drink given through Jesus, for the gathering of the church, and for the coming of the Kingdom.

Since these blessings do not include reference to the Last Supper "tradition," and since reference is later made to the necessity of the Sunday eucharist, the suspicion continues that these are not eucharistic blessings. Attention to the pattern of liturgical description mentioned above, however, suggests that these are eucharistic blessings, which certainly have in view the saving death of Christ, and which are set out as part of the description of paschal baptism and eucharist. But as this may be, they are easily recognized as Christian adaptations of Jewish sabbath and festival meal blessings, the final series following the order of the Birkat ha-mazon offered over the "cup of blessing" at the end of such formal Jewish meals.

Whatever else may be said of it, the Didache has given us actual blessing forms of the sort we may assume were adapted from Jewish practice. It may also offer some support for the contention (cf. Lk 22:15-20; 24:30) that such extended blessings for food and drink connected with the "cup of blessing" at the end of the meal eventually provided the context for the unified blessing over the bread and wine of which we have evidence from the 2nd century onward when the observance of the eucharist at an actual meal ceased to be the norm.

Toward the 2nd Century

The evidence thus far tells us much, but also omits much that we should like to know in the light of later practice. For instance, it is not clear what forms of instruction accompanied the eucharistic meals, especially where attendance at the synagogue ceased to be possible. Paul speaks only generally of hymns, scripture readings, revelations, and speaking in tongues at the meals at Corinth (I Cor 14:26-33), and the report of his speaking at length before the "blessing of bread" at Troas (Acts 20:7) need not refer to common practice. The Lucan account of Jesus interpreting the scriptures referring to himself on the way to the supper at Emmaus (Lk 24:27) may suggest that the author is familiar with such interpretations of the Jewish scriptures before the eucharistic meal. But there is no evidence as yet of any Christian adaptation of the structures of scripture reading, instruction, and prayer, common to the synagogue.

Again, it is not clear how wide-spread was any Christian observance of the Jewish Passover. While Paul presumably continued such observance as a Jew, his reference to Christians observing the feast "in spirit and truth" (I Cor 5:5-7) is notoriously obscure. Our evidence of Christian ("Quartodeciman") observance of 14 Nisan, and of its eventual abandonment (as it is now commonly described) in favor of a Christian Passover on a succeeding Lord's Day, comes from accounts of the 2nd-century "Paschal controversy" (Eusebius, HE. IV. 14, no. 22-23).

And again, it is unclear when and in what circumstances it became customary to detach the eucharistic blessings from an actual meal, or to gather for the eucharist on the morning of the Lord's Day. It is perhaps not wrongly assumed that the Gentile custom of reckoning days from sunrise rather than sunset, and the onset of opposition which rendered regular gatherings for meals difficult, contributed to this result, as well as to the consequent conflation of the blessings over the bread and wine for which the Birkat ha-mazon may have provided the context. The evidence of Pliny the Younger, governor of Bithynia ca. 112 (Epp. X. 96), that Christians met early on a specified day to "bind themselves with an oath," and later held an inoffensive meal, has been taken to be evidence of this development, but is open to a variety of interpretations.

Finally, it is not clear who might have been expected to offer the eucharistic blessings, since Jewish customs regarding the host at family meals could hardly have provided a general rule. By the time of I Clement and Ignatius, the responsibility is assumed to be that of the elders or bishops, and this may also be the import of the direction of Did. that, while visiting prophets may give thanks, bishops and deacons should be chosen by the congregation. But little else can be said on the subject.

In fact, however, there is at least enough clarity with respect to the eucharistic practice of the earliest communities to allow these points of obscurity to be recognized.

The First Prescriptions: Justin Martyr and the Apostolic Tradition

From the mid 2nd and early 3rd century come two works which, for different reasons, provide descriptions of liturgical practices, including the eucharist. These are Justin Martyr, I Apology, and the Apostolic Tradition commonly attributed to Hippolytus of Rome. Both emanate from the Greek-speaking Roman community; each has peculiar problems of interpretation, and each sheds light on liturgical developments in the Gentile churches at large.

Justin's work, datable ca. 155, is a general explanation and defense of Christianity for pagan readership, and concludes with a description of Christian meetings for baptism and eucharist (chaps. 61-67), that is designed at least in part to allay suspicions of their orgiastic character. By turns very general and quite technical, for reasons only occasionally clear to us now, this description follows the outline already noticed in present Did. where paschal baptism and eucharist ("How we dedicate ourselves to God when we are made new through Christ" 61ff.) precedes a description of the weekly eucharist ("On the day called of the sun, there is a meeting in one place . . ." 67ff.). This outline, plainly not of Justin's making, reflects the liturgical practices of the Roman church, anchored on the annual paschal celebration, as they were defined by Bishop Anicetus on the occasion of the visit of the "Quartodeciman" Polycarp in 155 (Eusebius, HE. IV. 14). It may also be that it suggests the specific reason for the reorganization of earlier materials in our present Did.

Of the two descriptions of the eucharist required by this outline, the first commences where the newly baptized "join the brethren" for common prayers and the exchange of the kiss of peace (65). After this, bread and wine mixed with water (a detail several times repeated, presumably to show the sobriety of the occasion) are brought to "the one who presides" (doubtless a circumlocution for the bishop), who takes them, and then "sends up praise and glory to the Father of the universe through the name of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and offers thanks at some length that we have been deemed worthy to receive these things . . . , " after which the people "assent, saying Amen" (a word translated both here and in the second description). Deacons then give bread and wine and water to those present and absent.

Plainly, this eucharist takes place at an early morning hour following the vigil and baptism, and the action of "taking, blessing over, breaking (actually omitted in both descriptions) and giving" are done without an actual meal. Moreover, Justin says enough about the unified blessing prayer to suggest something of its form and contents, and here and elsewhere says that "the food eucharistized (his unusual term) by the word of prayer, by which our flesh and blood is nourished, is the body and blood of the incarnate Jesus," and explains the action as fulfilling the command of Jesus (apparent allusion to the 1 Corinthians form of the "tradition"), as a "memorial" of the incarnation, and as the prophesied pure sacrifice of the people of God (I Apol. 66, Dial. 41, 70, 117).

The subsequent description of the weekly eucharist on the first or Lord's Day, "on which God . . . made the universe, and Jesus Christ . . . rose from the dead" (I Apol. 67), merely refers to the action as taking place "as said before" and to the "one who presides" as praying "to the best of his ability." A single pattern of paschal and Sunday eucharist is here in view. New, however, is reference to readings from the Jewish scriptures and "the memoirs of the apostles" (obviously the gospels), followed by instruction from "the one who presides" before the common prayers and kiss of peace. Brief as it is, perhaps because unexceptionable, it is our first evidence of the regular use of these preliminaries, shaped on the synagogue meetings, which Tertullian would call the "administration of the word of God" (De cultu fem. II. 11; cf. Apol. XX).

In Justin, then, we have evidence of a pattern of eucharistic practice already established, shaped from earlier customs in the circumstances of the 2nd century, and scarcely unique in general outline to the Roman church.

Apostolic Tradition

The second description from this period is contained in the work now commonly regarded as the Apostolic Tradition mentioned among the writings of Hippolytus (d. 235), theologian, presbyter of the Roman church, critic of several episcopal contemporaries, and finally schismatic bishop. Now pieced together from various sources replete with inconsistencies, it nevertheless, if rightly identified, purports to describe proper practice for the Roman church at the turn of the 3rd century. It is thus intended for a different readership from Justin's, is narrow in scope and far greater in specific detail, as well as half a century later.

Apost. Trad. follows the now familiar outline of paschal and weekly observances only in part. In this case, a prefatory description of ordinations (2-14) contains an extensive account of the eucharist of a newly consecrated bishop (4), so that the paschal eucharist (21) is virtually an appendix to the account of the initiatory rites which precede it (15-22). Only brief reference is made, and only in some versions, to the eucharist celebrated on Saturdays and Sundays (23, 27), though a more widely attested concluding section on various matters includes references to the survival of communal meals (25-6) which the author cautions against regarding as eucharistic.

Apost. Trad.'s several accounts of the eucharist follow the form already seen in Justin. In that of the newly consecrated bishop (4), which follows the kiss of peace, the deacons bring the bread and wine to the bishop, who lays his hand upon them. The episcopal eucharistic prayer which follows begins with the sursum corda (habitual hereafter, but likely much earlier). Its opening account of the works of God stresses the separate existence of the Word incarnate from the Virgin and gives as his purpose to assemble a holy people by his suffering and death. The prayer explicitly but freely rehearses the Last Supper "tradition," and combines the offering of the "memorial" with prayer for the Spirit to come upon "the offering of your holy church" that it may be united in faith and gathered into the kingdom. It concludes with a doxology and the assenting "Amen."

In the brief account of the paschal eucharist (22), the bishop now breaks the bread, and distributes the bread and wine with the somewhat confused help of presbyters and deacons, these using specified words to which the people again assent "Amen." Here cups of water, milk and honey, appropriately baptismal and eschatological, are administered to the newly baptized.

Attention naturally centers on the unusual features of the eucharistic prayer of Apost. Trad., variously enjoined and offered as a model in different sources. Its stress on the independent existence of the Word suggests the influence of Hippolytus' differences with his Roman contemporaries on this subject. Its unified construction differs from the loosely constructed set of blessings found in the later Roman canon. And the prayer for the sending of the Spirit, while it does not ask for the transformation of the bread and wine in the manner of the later Eastern epiclesis, is in the position that such prayers occupy in such Eastern prayers as that of the later 4th-century Apostolic Constitutions (see below), which incorporates ordination materials from Apost. Trad.

But these peculiarities need not shake confidence in the Roman provenance of Apost. Trad. as a whole, or even of its eucharistic prayer. We know little of the limits of improvisation possible in the period, and much about the innovative theology of Hippolytus. If he left his own impress upon the eucharistic prayer, it has similarities with I Clement and the Martyrdom of Polycarp (see above) as well as with Apost. Const. In any case, it would be surprising if Apost. Trad. did not reflect traditions which its author thought consistent with Roman practice. As that may be, the work stands with Justin's as witness to the eucharistic developments in the formative period before the end of the persecutions and the "peace of the church."

Toward the "Peace of the Church"

Other evidence of the 2nd and 3rd centuries can be gleaned from the theological writings of the period, and from the recently recovered sources of the roots of the later rites of the churches of Egypt and Syria shortly to be discussed. Particularly important, however, is the increasing evidence of the physical settings in which Christians met for the eucharist in this period, since the eucharist is a physical as well as a verbal phenomenon. To be sure, even the Pauline letters contain references to Christian meetings in houses (Rom 16:5, Col 4:15, Phlm 2), presumably those of substantial members of congregations, and of the sort common to the domestic architecture of the ancient world, hidden from the street and constructed around one or more social rooms. From at least the 3rd century, however, we have evidence of such houses being made available for remodeling for liturgical use with space provided for baptism and eucharist, as in the small "house of Christians" discovered at Dura Europos on the Euphrates. Such a document as the early 3rd century north Syrian Didascalia, with its directions for the behavior of the various people gathered for the eucharist (chap. 12) may be read with such a physical setting in view.

Equally important is the physical evidence of the catacombs at Rome and elsewhere. Here the recurrence of pictures showing figures lying or seated at tables displaying bread or fish embodies the Last Supper "tradition," rather than what we may imagine to be the later practice of standing at a small table-altar of the sort shown in mosaics from the 4th century onward. Of this latter custom, however, the innumerable "praying figures" (orantes), which show those interred standing with arms extended in the attitude of prayer, is a visible witness.

The importance of this physical evidence extends well into the period of the peace of the church. Not only do such Christian "houses" multiply in this period, but the great building complexes now erected retain something of their "domestic" character. These baptistries and eucharistic halls, constructed so as to be hidden from the streets and approached through secluded atriums, were strikingly different from the public religious buildings with which the ancient world was familiar. While their erection in itself reflected the changed relation of the church to the Roman Empire, they stood, as did the rites celebrated in them, as witnesses to the life of the new people of God which participation in the eucharist proclaimed and enacted.

The 4th Century and Beyond: the East

Beginning with the 4th century "peace of the church," evidence of eucharistic practice becomes increasingly extensive. It includes evidence not only of the rites of the great episcopal sees which took shape in the period but also of such earlier rites as were preserved either because they contributed to or had been superseded by them. In the main, this evidence is clearer with respect to the eucharistic practices of the Eastern sees of Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem, and the new capital of Constantinople, than with respect to the Western churches and the Roman see. Whether Eastern or Western, however, this is evidence of the emergence of the eucharist as what now comes to be called the public liturgy (leitourgia) of the Christian Roman Empire.

Egypt

Among the pieces of Egyptian evidence lying in the background of the Alexandrian rite of St. Mark, the most extensive is the "prayer book" (euchologion) associated with Serapion, Bishop of Thmuis and correspondent of Athanasius, and doubtless reflecting the liturgical practices of his church. Not seen in documents encountered by us before this, but characteristic of the elaborations of the period, are prayers to be used at the reading of the scriptures, the homily, the dismissal of the catechumens, and the prayers of the people, as well as at the breaking of the bread and the receiving of communion. But the Serap. eucharistic prayer or anaphora seems to belong to an Egyptian type of which earlier fragmentary examples survive (cf. the Der Ba lizeh and Strasbourg frags.), in which prefatory material leads to the Sanctus borrowed from the synagogue, and a loosely connected series of blessings includes invocations over the bread and wine before and after the Last Supper "tradition," as well as prayers for the living and dead before the final doxology. Peculiar to Serap. is the invocation of the Word (Logos) rather than the Spirit upon the oblation, and the interruption of words of Jesus with a prayer not unlike that over the bread in Did. But the anaphora in general links the 4th-century Egyptian churches with earlier local forms otherwise largely lost to us.

Syria-Palestine

In contrast to that from Egypt, the eucharistic evidence from Syria and Palestine is far more extensive and diverse. From East Syria, on the border of the Roman Empire, come various forms of the Anaphora of Mari and Addai, names associated with the foundation of the church of Edessa, a eucharistic anaphora which preserves blessing prayers similar to those which underlie our present Did. By stages on which there is no general agreement, this prayer has acquired a Sanctus, a narrative of the institution, and a form of memorial and invocation of the sort common to the 4th century. But its retention of the ancient blessing prayers is of interest as showing their continued use in a eucharistic tradition independent of the later influence of Constantinople within the Empire.

Far more comprehensive, however, is the West Syrian eucharistic evidence contained in the Apost. Const., a compilation of liturgical materials from Antioch in the last decades of the 4th century. Perhaps intended as an editing of the diversity of practices in the region of the Syrian capital, this work includes (VII. 25-6) a reworking of the blessing prayers of Did. into a eucharistic anaphora before the communion, which installs the order of bread and wine, though without an institution narrative, and leaves what is left as a set of blessing prayers after the communion. A comparison with Mari and Addai suggests that this is another, rather different, effort to accommodate earlier Christian adaptations of Jewish blessings to the now conventional structure of a eucharistic anaphora.

Interest in Apost. Const., however, centers chiefly on the large body of material (VIII. 1-15) which follows the general outline of Hippolytus', Apost. Trad., in its section on ordinations, and incorporates its blessing prayer for an episcopal ordination before passing to its description of the eucharist on such an occasion. In the place of the latter, Apost. Const. embarks on its own elaborate description of a eucharistic celebration (5-15) commonly taken to be that of the church of Antioch itself. Here brief reference is even made to scripture readings from the law, prophets, apostle, and gospels, to a homily, and to the dismissal of the unbaptized by a deacon. There follow litanic prayers for the catechumens, for the baptized, and for the church and the world, led by a deacon to Kyrial responses ("Lord have mercy") and concluded by appropriate blessings by the bishop before the kiss of peace. Pictured here is a public assembly, attended by the unbaptized as well as catechumens, and large enough to require overseeing by the deacons.

Similarly elaborate is the eucharist itself. Here the oblation is brought to the altar by the deacons; the bishop is assisted at the anaphora by deacons and surrounded at the altar by the presbyters; the bread is broken and communion distributed by the bishop and the deacons; and a prayer of thanksgiving and an episcopal blessing is added before a diaconal dismissal. The anaphora itself is of great length and richness, with an underlying structure not unlike that noticed in Apost. Trad. (see above). Here Preface and Sanctus lead to a rehearsal of the works of God, the institution narrative, an oblation of the memorial and an invocation of the Spirit to make the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ. Litanic prayers for the living and the dead, led by a deacon and concluded with a blessing by the bishop, intervene before the final doxology and the assent "Amen."

Constantinople

Certain features of the anaphora and other prayers of Apost. Const., particularly their stress on the Father as the sole "uncreated" God and the Son as created "before the ages by his will and power," suggest that the compiler had Arian sympathies. But the wider significance of these sections of the work lies in its witness to a style of eucharistic celebration common in the region at this time. Moreover, it is now fairly widely agreed that the Antiochene eucharist, of which Apost. Const., is our principal source, eventually provided the basis for the rite of the church of Constantinople, which in turn exercised a profound influence on the rites of the Eastern churches in communion with that of the new imperial capital.

Later Constantinopolitan elements grafted on this rite are easily noted. These include the common use of the anaphora attributed to John Chrysostom, as well as the occasional use of those of Basil the Great and of the Jerusalem Liturgy of St. James, all of which exhibit orthodox trinitarian features which give equal significance to the persons of the Godhead, and elevate the invocation of the Spirit on the bread and wine to a new prominence. They include also the eventual addition of the Lord's Prayer before the breaking of the bread, as well as of the Nicene creed of A.D. 381 at the bringing in of the oblation. And they include the preparation of the oblation and the solemn entrance of the bishop and people before the beginning of the rite. But these additions, of which we have evidence at various stages in Maximus the Confessor, (Mystagogia), and in the 9th century euchologion (Barberini MS), would not be intelligible for the additions they are without Apost. Const.

Nor would we grasp the rationale for the space provided for the celebration of the rite, as that would issue classically in Justinian's 6th-century basilica of the Holy Wisdom, without clues provided by Apost. Const.. Such space, with its centralized bema for the reading of scriptures, and its altar set on the chord of the apse, separated from the nave by an open screen and backed by tiers of seats for the presbyters and the throne of the bishop, is also of Syrian provenance.

The Calendar: Christmas and Epiphany

The period we are discussing saw elaborations in the calendar of Christian observances which had a material effect on the occasions of eucharistic celebration, anchored heretofore on the paschal and Sunday cycles, except for the observance of the anniversaries of the deaths of local martyrs. One elaboration of this pattern, attributable to the church of Jerusalem, now beset by pilgrims eager to visit the holy sites, was the extension backwards of the paschal baptismal fast into a week of observances at the sites recorded in the synoptic tradition from Palm Sunday until Good Friday, and the extension forward of the paschal celebration until Pentecost. The Diary of Egeria bears witness to the popularity of these observances, and to the impulse which led to their being copied elsewhere for people who could not themselves visit Jerusalem.

A different sort of elaboration is the observance of two festivals of the birth of Christ, Christmas on December 25 and Epiphany of January 6. We cannot here discuss the complicated question of the origin of these observances in earlier calculations of Jesus' death and birth or the pagan festivals of the Sol Invictus at Rome and of the birth of Dionysius at Alexandria. Suffice it to say that these observances, appropriated in different ways in both the Eastern and Western churches, came to constitute, especially in the later West, a countervailing cycle to the basic paschal and Sunday structure of eucharistic celebration.

The Latin West

The scattered eucharistic evidence of the Latin-speaking churches of the West, whether of Latin Africa, Spain, Gaul, or even Italy and Rome itself, provides us with no such clear picture as does the evidence of the East. Certainly no such steps as marked the formation of the Constantinopolitan rite can be traced there. The eventual promotion of the Roman rite in the ecclesiastical unity of the new Frankish Empire of Pepin IV and Charlemagne, followed a period of political decentralization, social dislocation, and population shifts. In the intervening period, the earlier rites, of which we have relatively little evidence in any case, gave way to or resisted that of the Roman church in degrees that are hard to measure.

Latin Africa

With respect to Latin Africa, the situation is peculiarly surprising. Despite the wealth of liturgical allusion in the writings of Tertullian and Cyprian, details of the Latin eucharistic rites of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, presumably open to influence from both Asia Minor and Rome, are generally lacking. Nor do we know much about the rites of the 4th and 5th centuries, despite the catechetical and homiletic works of Augustine and other African writers. From Augustine, we can deduce a plain introductory rite of scripture reading and psalmody, homily, dismissal of the catechumens, and prayers of the faithful. But of the eucharist itself little is said. Augustine's reference to the opening dialogue of the eucharistic prayer and to the Lord's Prayer "after the sacrifice" (Serm. 227) leaves much unsaid. His incidental reference to the operation of the Spirit in the consecration of the bread (De trin. III.4) may suggest an invocation of the Spirit, when read together with clearer references in Optatus (De schismat. Donat. VI.1) and Fulgentius of Ruspe (Ad Monitum. II. 6, 10). But the reconquest of Latin Africa from the Vandals by Justinian in the 6th century, and the imposition of the rites of Constantinople, followed in turn by the Islamic invasion of the area, has left little more to go on.

Gallican Rites

By contrast with Latin Africa, a disconcerting profusion of evidence survives from the Gallo-Hispanic (Gallican) family of Latin eucharistic rites, in a schematic report of the elements of a eucharistic prayer from Isidore of Seville (De eccl. off. I.15), in such later sacramentaries as Missale Gothicum, the Bobbio Missal and the Stowe Missal, and in a wealth of prayers later preserved as collects, secrets, and other supplements to the Roman books produced in the Frankish Empire.

Interest in this evidence, which is itself difficult to reduce to any simple order, has been sustained partly from fascination with the differences between these rites and the Roman rite which supplanted them. Here attention is paid to the variability of elements of the eucharistic prayers, and to various similarities with contemporary Eastern rites, such as the litanic prayers led by deacons, the kiss of peace after the prayers of the faithful, and the initial preparation and subsequent procession of the oblation. But the search for direct Eastern influence can be overdone. These rites, the work of new peoples recently converted from Arian to Catholic Christianity, were indigenous to an area in constant contact with liturgically cosmopolitan north Italy but with no sense of separation from the contemporary Roman church.

North Italy and Rome

With regard to north Italy, and to Rome, the evidence is extensive, scattered, and difficult. The 4th-century replacement of Greek with Latin as the liturgical language of the area did not, as sometimes seems to be assumed, curtail Eastern influence. In the Roman eucharistic rite, it is attested by use of Kyrialitanies, later reduced to the use of the Kyries at the beginning of the rite, and the use of the Eastern office hymn, Gloria in excelsis, following them, at the solemn episcopal

Sunday eucharist celebrated week by week in the stationaril basilicas of the city. At the same time, however, such Roman borrowings are marked by a certain independence and restraint, while the introduction of brief collects before the scripture readings, classically associated with the name of Pope Leo I (d. A.D. 461) is a uniquely Roman phenomenon. In the eucharist itself, the same independence and restraint is seen in the lack of a solemn preparation and procession of the oblation, and the relative absence of prayers before and after the communion. Peculiar features of the eucharist, amounting to something of a reform, were later attributed to Pope Gregory I (d. A.D. 604), but are attested to by the earlier Gelasian sacramentary, wrongly attributed to Pope Gelasius I (d. A.D. 496). These include the placing of the kiss of peace before the communion, and the incorporation of the prayers of the faithful within the eucharistic prayer or canon. While the latter is not without Eastern precedent (cf. Serap.; Apost. Const.), the limitation of such prayers to this place in the rite must be counted a Roman peculiarity.

The provenance of the central prayers of the Roman canon continues to be a matter of debate. These prayers are plainly different from the prayer of Apost. Trad. with its unified structure, its peculiar stress on the independence of the Word before the institution narrative, and its subsequent pattern of oblation, memorial and invocation of the Spirit. By contrast, these prayers are a connected order of distinct prayers, invariable except for the preface before the Sanctus, and contain what may be a vestigial invocation before the institution narrative, but which is certainly a series of oblations of the memorial both before and after it. Indeed, it has been noticed that this canon has as many similarities with the Egyptian Serap. as does Apost. Trad. with the Antiochene Apost. Const. It has also been suggested that its distinctive style bespeaks a particular point of composition, perhaps connected with the introduction of Latin as the Roman liturgical language.

It is possible to become overly preoccupied with such largely conjectural matters. We have seen reasons for thinking that the anaphora of Apost. Trad. is very much Hippolytus' own, and may not need to seek further than Italy for parallels with the later Roman canon. For instance, Ambrose, in his De sacramentis gives an explanation of the eucharist to the newly baptized which contains similar turns of phrase which need not be thought simply to reflect Roman influence on the rite of Milan. In the end, we simply do not know what we would like to know about the Roman canon in view of its eventual use throughout the Western churches under Frankish auspices. The Roman rite, for all its special local features, is of absorbing interest because of its promotion and acceptance as a point of continuity with the Christian Roman past at a time when political and social upheavals necessitated it. Like the long-aisled basilicas of the Frankish period, their transepts and interior arrangements, frequently drawn from the Roman shrine basilicas of Peter and Paul, provided an identity for the Christian society of the West.

Conclusion

The history of the eucharist in this period reflects, to a remarkable degree, the persistence of very early forms and structures. The transformation of the church from a Jewish sect to a largely Gentile movement is marked by the continuation of the traditions of the meal blessings over bread and wine and the synagogue meetings which gave the movement its identity. Similarly, the eucharistic practices of the period of persecution continued to underlie the elaborate public rites which evolved in the changing circumstances in which Christianity ceased to be a religio illicita and became the official cultus of the newly Christian Roman Empire. At the point to which we have arrived, in both East and West, the eucharistic rite has become, in a new way, the identifying activity of the Christian society which has emerged from the breakdown of the ancient imperial unity, both in its pagan and Christian forms. It is at this point that consideration of the consequences of the formation of this society on eucharistic practice and thought must begin.

EUCCHARIST, HISTORY OF, IN THE EAST

In the post-Constantinian period, the eucharistic liturgy in the East underwent a process of standardization, the result of a complex dynamic of cultural, theological and political factors. With the consolidation of ecclesiastical power under the major urban centers of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Constantinople came the consolidation and further assimilation of local liturgical uses to those of the urban centers. As the various local uses either survived or died out, the major liturgical traditions were formed. These traditions in their turn then influenced the liturgical practices of other areas.

As regards the eucharistic liturgy, the developments of this period consisted of the filling-in of what have been termed the "soft points" of the eucharistic ordo: the places where in the early liturgies there was only unaccompanied action, e.g., the entrance of the clergy into the church, the kiss of peace and the transfer of the eucharistic gifts, and the fraction, communion, and dismissal rites. These points of unaccompanied action in the pre-Constantinian eucharistic rites were in this period covered over with liturgical chant and prayer. These liturgical units of action covered with chant and prayer eventually disintegrated, leaving behind the liturgical flotsam and jetsam found in today's Eastern eucharistic liturgies. In this process of growth of liturgical units, those elements of greatest antiquity often were eliminated in favor of more recent elements: for example, while the act of communion in the Byzantine rite seems at one time to have been covered by an antiphonal psalm, today only the antiphon of that psalm remains (the koinōnikon).

Unfortunately, much of the history of the eucharistic liturgies of each Eastern liturgical tradition remains unknown. Paucity of texts and, where texts are available, lack of reliable critical editions, make any satisfactory reconstruction of a general "history of the eucharist in the East" impossible. This article has more modest aims: 1. to outline the liturgical traditions of the East and some of the circumstances of their evolution; 2. to outline briefly some of the major factors in the development of the eucharist in the East; and 3. to give a thumbnail sketch of the major sources for and points in the history of the eucharistic liturgies of each Eastern liturgical tradition, as far as these factors are known.

I. The Liturgical Traditions

In 395 the Roman Empire was divided into Eastern and Western halves, the consolidation of a process begun in 293 with the partition of the empire into four prefectures. The Eastern half of the empire contained four cities which were to become the centers of the Eastern patriarchates: Antioch, center of the civil diocese of Orient; Alexandria, center of the civil diocese of Egypt; Constantinople and Jerusalem, raised to the level of patriarchal seat in 381 and 451, respectively. During the 4th and 5th centuries, the liturgical usages of the cities, towns and villages surrounding these ecclesiastical centers unified more and more around the usages of the patriarchates.

Some liturgical traditions, however, developed partially or entirely outside the jurisdiction of the Roman Empire. The Chaldean, or East Syrian eucharistic rite developed primarily within the Persian Empire, and the Armenian rite grew up against the backdrop of constant power struggles between the two "superpowers" of late antiquity, the Roman and Persian Empires.

The result of this process of liturgical unification is the group of four basic Eastern liturgical traditions known today: 1. Syrian (East Syrian, West Syrian, and Maronite); 2. Byzantine; 3. Armenian; and 4. Alexandrian (Coptic and Ethiopian).

The eucharistic liturgies of the East are today celebrated by both Orthodox and Catholic churches (with the sole exception of the Maronite rite, which is celebrated only by Eastern rite Catholics). These liturgies are celebrated in a wide variety of languages, both classical and modern:

from Greek, Syriac, Coptic, Slavonic, and Armenian to Arabic, various modern European languages, Chinese, Japanese, Malayalam, various Siberian and North American Indian languages, and English. While originally these rites were restricted to specific geographical locales, they are now found worldwide, the result both of missionary activity and of the Eastern Christian diaspora.

II. Influences Upon Development of the Traditions

One could list many influences upon the development of the liturgical traditions of the East and, hence, their eucharistic liturgies. We list six here. 1. The great dogmatic controversies of the early church, particularly the councils of Chalcedon (451) and Ephesus (431), the acceptance or rejection of whose decisions eventually determined the ecclesiastical divisions and practices of the various Eastern churches. 2. Monasticism in its many forms existing in Late Antiquity; liturgical practices often travelled via monks, who were always on the go, travelling the length and breadth of the inhabited world. 3. Pilgrimage to the holy city of Jerusalem; pilgrims often brought back to their native lands hagiopolite practices. 4. Geography, which either facilitated or hindered the spread of missionary activity and lines of commerce and communication. 5. The Roman and Persian empires, either against or for which many different churches acted and reacted. In addition, the influence of the Byzantine Empire eventually caused the abandonment of native eucharistic rites in favor of the Byzantine rite. 6. Individuals, whose work often helped along the evolution or establishment of liturgical practices: e.g., a Basil the Great, Išo'yabh III, or Gregory the Illuminator, to name three.

III. The Eucharistic Liturgies

We shall now turn to the individual rites themselves, in the following order:

A. Syrian: 1. East Syrian, 2. West Syrian, 3. Maronite; B. Byzantine; C. Armenian; D. Alexandrian: 1. Coptic, 2. Ethiopian. The treatment of the Syrian and Alexandrian traditions is preceded by a brief introduction.

A. The Syrian Tradition

Introduction. On the basis of investigations into the East Syrian (or Chaldean), West Syrian, and Maronite eucharistic and baptismal liturgies, the Jesuit liturgist William Macomber has posited the existence of three, possibly four, liturgical traditions in Greater Syria and Persia at the beginning of the 5th century, centered upon Antioch, Jerusalem, and Edessa, with a possible fourth tradition existing in the Persian church. Reaction to the councils of Ephesus in 431 and Chalcedon in 451 set in motion the process of liturgical isolation and fusion which led to the eucharistic liturgies of the East Syrian, West Syrian, and Maronite rites, as we shall see below.

1. East Syrian: The Chaldean rite of today, used by members of the church of the East (often erroneously called "Nestorians") and by Eastern rite Catholics in India, Iraq and the United States, is one development of the ancient rite of Edessa, a city located on the eastern frontier between the Roman and Persian empires. Edessa was the center of Syriac-speaking Christian culture and had been evangelized by the end of the 2nd century at the latest. The form of Christianity which developed in Edessa was of a truly Semitic idiom, and the eucharistic liturgy which emerged from Edessa likewise bore the marks of its Judeo-Christian ancestry.

The Chaldean eucharistic rite was the first to be standardized, a process which began in the 5th century and ended in the 7th or 8th century. The Council of Ephesus in 431 condemned the teaching of Patriarch Nestorius of Constantinople, and began the process of the Persian church's ecclesiastical separation, formalized at the Synod of Beth Lapat in 484. Thus, the eucharistic liturgy of the church of the East developed without substantial influence from outside liturgical practices.

The Chaldean tradition is rich in liturgical commentaries. The model for all Chaldean commentators is the liturgical commentary of Theodore of Mopsuestia. Although he did not comment upon the Chaldean eucharistic service, per se, his method of interpreting each liturgical action in terms of the events of Christ's life was to be paradigmatic for later Chaldean liturgical commentary. Some important figures are: 1. Narsai, 2. Gabriel bar Liphah Qatraya (615-616), and an anonymous commentator of the mid-to late-9th century. Later commentaries on the eucharistic service do not add anything new to these earlier works.

The first reference to the rite occurs in the canons of the first general synod of the church in Persia, held at Seleucia-Ctesiphon in 410. There, the bishops call for a standardization of the eucharistic rite to the "Western rite" used by bishops Marutha (of Martyropolis in the Roman Empire) and Isaac (of Seleucia). It is a strong possibility that this "Western rite" is that of Edessa.

In the 6th century, Catholicos Mar Aba I (540-552) added the anaphoras of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Nestorius to the eucharistic liturgy, translating them from the Greek. Catholicos Išo'yabh III (650-659) was largely responsible for the final standardization of the Chaldean rite through his editions of the Taksa (the euchology for priests), the Hudra (the antiphonary for Sundays), and his commentary on the ceremonies of the office, eucharistic liturgy, and other liturgical rites. Išo'yabh may have eliminated the institution narrative from the anaphora of Addai and Mari, which he is said to have shortened. He may also have eliminated other eucharistic prayers from the Taksa.

Missionaries of the church of the East spread through Central Asia to India and China by the 7th century. When the Portuguese arrived in South India in the 16th century, they found the Christians there using the Chaldean rite. The remainder of the 16th and 17th centuries saw the unification of these Malabar Christians with the see of Rome, their splintering into a variety of churches, some using the liturgical forms provided by the Portuguese, others placing themselves under the jurisdiction of the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch (and, hence, using the Liturgy of St. James, now known as the Malankara rite), and yet others returning to the Catholicos of the church of the East. Today, the majority of Malabar Christians are Eastern-rite Catholics, and their eucharistic liturgy has been "restored" following the Second Vatican Council. Chaldean-rite Catholics in Iraq and the United States have also had their rite revised, but more conservatively than the Malabar rite. Finally the Liturgy of Addai and Mari continues to be used by a very small remnant of the church of the East in Iraq, Iran, and the United States.

2. West Syrian. Reaction to the Council of Chalcedon cut across all three liturgical traditions of 5th-century Syria. For at least a century after the council, both Chalcedonians and non-Chalcedonians continued to celebrate the eucharist according to the rite of their region. Chalcedonians were found in the cities of southern Syria and maritime Syria, as well as Palestine. Eventually, these primarily Greek-speaking groups gave up the Liturgy of St. James for the Byzantine rite. These groups are termed "Melkites," from the Syriac maikā or Arabic malek, "king," for of course the Byzantine emperor adhered to the christological definition of Chalcedon, and attempted to require adherence to Chalcedon in all areas under Byzantine control or influence.

The non-Chalcedonians, or Monophysites, were found in the Aramaic-speaking population, from northern Syria to Mesopotamia. The liturgy celebrated by these non-Chalcedonian groups became what is today known as the "West Syrian" or Jacobite liturgy (from the name of the organizer of the Monophysite church, the Syrian monk Jacob Baradaï, who died in 578). The West Syrian tradition has a very large number of anaphoras (scholars count anywhere from seventy to one hundred), not all of which are in use today. The eucharistic liturgy is not entirely of West Syrian origin; it is a mixture of Greek elements from the eucharistic rites of Jerusalem (its anaphoral structure) and Antioch (the basic framework of the liturgy), soon translated into Syriac, and Edessa (metrical hymns). The Jacobites continued to borrow from Maronite and Byzantine sources in subsequent centuries.

The principal commentators upon the Jacobite eucharistic rite are: 1. Jacob of Edessa (640-708), in his letter to Thomas the Presbyter; 2. Moses bar Kepha (813-903); 3. George of the Arabs (724); and 4. Dionysius bar Salibi (d. 1171).

3. Maronite. It was once thought that the Maronite eucharistic rite was simply a branch of the West Syrian rite, because it shares much in common with the Liturgy of St. James. However, it is now believed that Aramaic-speaking Chalcedonians in Syria, especially in Lebanon and the Orontes Valley, were able to preserve a form of the ancient eucharistic rite of Edessa, as the features of the Maronite eucharistic liturgy which are most characteristically Maronite are not held in common with St. James, but rather with the Chaldean eucharistic rite. This ancient Edessene rite, however, has been overlaid through the centuries with borrowings from the Jacobite and Latin eucharistic rites. For example, the Maronite rite today includes anaphoras ascribed to some of the champions of the Monophysite cause, such as Philoxenus of Mabboug and Dionysius bar Salibi, to name two. Other Jacobite borrowings seem to be the sedro-form of prayer, and a preparatory part of the rite which seems to have been borrowed in the late 15th century or early 16th century, when a Maronite was elected Monophysite Patriarch of Antioch. Contact with the Crusaders produced union with the see of Rome in 1182, although firm union was not established until the 16th century. From the 12th century, Latinisms began to be introduced into the Maronite Mass, culminating in the Latinization under Patriarch Rizzi in the 17th century. Subsequent centuries have seen the restoration of the old form of the Maronite rite.

B. The Byzantine Tradition

The eucharistic liturgy of the Great Church of Constantinople is the most widespread Eastern rite in existence today. It is impossible to give any more than a cursory glance over the rich history of the eucharistic liturgies of this tradition: St. Basil, St. John Chrysostom and the Liturgy of the Presanctified. Thanks to the work of the Jesuit liturgists Juan Mateos and Robert Taft, the history of this rite is one of the most well known.

The first mention of a rite of Constantinople is during the period of Chrysostom's episcopate (397-404). It seems that the eucharistic liturgy at that time basically followed the liturgy of Antioch. It seems that the earliest liturgical influences upon the eucharistic rite of Constantinople were Antiochene and Cappadocian, since many of the city's early bishops came from those two areas.

The first commentary on the Byzantine eucharistic service is the Mystagogia of St. Maximus the Confessor, written ca. 628-630. The next two witnesses to the eucharistic liturgy are the Historia ecclesiastica of Patriarch St. Germanus of Constantinople (d. ca. 730), and the Barberini Codex gr 336, which dates from ca. 800. What these three sources show is that during the 7th to the 9th centuries the Byzantine eucharistic liturgy underwent considerable growth and evolution, precisely at the so-called "soft points" of the rite: the preparation of the gifts was removed from a point just before the "great entrance" to completely before the entire liturgy, and a service of three antiphons, derived from the stationary liturgy of the city, grew up immediately before the liturgy of the word. During that time, more ancient elements in the service were either eliminated or moved in favor of the newer elements: the OT reading vanished, as did the prayers over the penitents, and the psalmodic elements of the service.

The Byzantine eucharistic rite reached its definitive synthesis in the 10th century, as witnessed by the 10th-century Typicon of the Great Church. The service underwent subsequent monastic influence, most notably in the form of a beginning and end to the service, taken from the Palestinian monastic office in force in Constantinople from the fall of the city in 1204. By the 14th century, the eucharistic rite had received the form it has today.

C. The Armenian Tradition

Armenia was evangelized simultaneously from Caesarea in Cappadocia in the West, and Edessa in the South. While the East Syrian influence perdured primarily in the calendar, the Cappadocian eucharistic liturgy formed the basis for the nascent Armenian eucharistic liturgy.

At the beginning of the 5th century the anaphora of St. Basil the Great was translated into Armenian; this anaphora was later erroneously ascribed to Gregory the Illuminator, the apostle to Armenia, who had received his training in Cappadocia. Toward the end of the 5th century, four other Caesarean anaphoras were translated from Greek into Armenian: 1. Catholicos Sahak, 2.

Gregory of Nazianzus, 3. Cyril, and 4. Athanasius.

Further byzantinization of the Armenian eucharistic rite took place from the 7th century, in spite of Armenian attempts to prevent the encroachment of Byzantine influence. The reason for this continuing byzantinization can perhaps be attributed to the presence of strong groups within the Armenian hierarchy and monastic ranks whose theological views approximated those of the Byzantines.

Sometime after the 10th century, the Liturgy of St. Basil was translated again into Armenian. But with the 10th-century ascendancy of the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom over the Liturgy of St. Basil in Constantinople, the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom was adopted by the Armenians, as well as the Liturgy of the Presanctified. The time of the Crusades saw contact between Armenians and Latins, whom the Armenians welcomed. From the 12th to the 14th centuries some Latin features entered the Armenian service.

Both Chosroes the Great (ca. 950) and St. Nerses of Lambron (d. 1198) wrote commentaries on the Armenian eucharistic liturgy. The eucharistic service in use today is that of St. Athanasius.

D. The Alexandrian Tradition

Introduction. Two Egypts existed side by side in late antiquity: Lower Egypt, whose center was the great city of Alexandria, the center of Hellenic, philosophical Christianity; and Upper Egypt, the cradle of monasticism and the Coptic-speaking populace of the countryside, the center of a popular Christianity based upon wisdom sayings, asceticism and ritual. After the Council of Chalcedon (451), the city of Alexandria remained in Chalcedonian hands, while the center of non-Chalcedonian power shifted to the monasteries. One monastery in particular became a powerful center of Monophysite Coptic Christianity: the Monastery of St. Macarius in Wadi al-Natrun in Scetis near the Nile Delta in Lower Egypt. The patriarchal seat in Alexandria was occupied by both Chalcedonian and non-Chalcedonian patriarchs after Chalcedon.

1. Coptic. The Greek Liturgy of St. Mark appears to have been used by Melkites in Egypt until the 12th century when, under Byzantine influence, they adopted the Byzantine eucharistic service (as did Melkites in Syria and Palestine).

However, among Monophysites the Liturgy of St. Mark was translated into Coptic and underwent further influence from Coptic monastic practice and Syrian liturgical practice, which came via the Syrian Jacobite monks who made their homes in Egypt, as well as the general ecclesiastical intercourse between Syrian and Egyptian Jacobites.

The first Coptic dialect used by the Egyptian Christians was Sahidic, which attained its classical form at the White Monastery in Upper Egypt, during the reign of Abbot Shenoute (ca. 383-451). However, as the Monastery of St. Macarius gained more prominence as a fortress of non-Chalcedonian Christianity following Chalcedon, the Bohairic Coptic dialect used there began slowly to supplant the earlier Sahidic texts. Eventually, Bohairic became the only Coptic dialect used in worship.

Today's eucharistic rite is essentially that of Scetis. In the 12th century, Patriarch Gabriel II Ibn Turayk (1131-1145) decreed that all local versions of the eucharistic prayer be suppressed, and that only three anaphoras be used throughout the entire Coptic church: St. Mark (also known as St. Cyril), St. Basil, and St. Gregory. In the 15th century, Patriarch Gabriel V composed his Liturgical Order (1411), still in use today. This work, along with The Lamp of Darkness of Abu al-Barakat (14th century), are two of the most important commentaries on the Coptic eucharistic liturgy.

2. Ethiopian. The historic date of the Christianization of Ethiopia is 340. It appears that Coptic and Syrian missionaries penetrated into the country, and that by the 5th century monasticism had been established in Ethiopia. At the time of Chalcedon, the Ethiopians sided with the Monophysites. About the same time, the famous Nine Saints are said to have arrived in Ethiopia, beginning the work of translating Coptic, Greek, and Syriac literature into Ge'ez, the classical form of the Ethiopian tongue. The head of the Ethiopian church, the abuna, was a Coptic monk chosen and sent from Egypt. In 1948, this relationship with the Coptic church was changed when the Ethiopian church was allowed a native abuna, consecrated in 1959.

The history of the Ethiopian eucharistic service is almost completely unknown, as it is perhaps the least-studied eucharistic liturgy of any in the East. Scholars have identified at least twenty different Ethiopian anaphoras of Syrian, Alexandrian and Ethiopian origin, one of the most intriguing being the Anaphora of Our Lady.

Given the strong ties between the Coptic church and the Ethiopian church, one can posit a strong Coptic influence upon the structure and content of the Ethiopian eucharistic service. Observers have also noted in the practices of this church the presence of elements seeming to originate in Judaism. However, given the great gaps in our knowledge of Ethiopian history (especially from 650 to 1270), reconstruction of the history of any of the Ethiopian eucharistic liturgy will be difficult at best. Clearly, the Ethiopian eucharistic liturgy presents a fascinating field of study for future scholars of liturgy.

EUCCHARIST, HISTORY OF, IN THE WEST

While the origins of a specifically "Western" or Latin liturgical tradition are difficult to trace, it seems clear that at least from the 3rd century those trends which are later clearly identified with Western practice are beginning to be found. Both Tertullian (c. 160—c.220) and Cyprian of Carthage (d.258) seem to be speaking of a Latin liturgy when writing about the eucharist. But these early rites and practices display a great deal of diversity, even though the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c. 215), for example, argues for the primacy of Roman eucharistic traditions. For a long time it was supposed that all Western rites had a common source in Rome, and spread from there to outlying areas in a systematic way as pagan peoples were converted to Christianity. More recently, however, scholars have come to see that the lines of liturgical influence are more complex, and it is now clear that important ritual developments took place in other Christian centers and were subsequently returned to Rome to influence eucharistic practice there. In any case, neat distinctions between "West" and "East," "Roman and non-Roman," are difficult to make in this early period of liturgical development.

Eucharistic Documents

We can be slightly more certain about Western eucharistic practice in the 6th to 7th centuries, since some documentary sources for this period exist (see, liturgical sources). Early evidence for the beginnings of Western eucharistic practice is found in liturgical books containing the various prayers used by presiders. Several of these collections, known as "sacramentaries," survive, and generally their contents follow the course of the church year, providing texts for each celebration in the calendar. Although the earliest such manuscript (the so-called "Leonine Sacramentary") dates from the 7th century, at least some of its liturgical material may be of a much earlier date. Analysis of these collections reveals the existence of a number of different eucharological traditions, with Roman, Milanese, Spanish, Celtic, and Gallican books each expressing their own eucharistic personality.

Still later, but sometime before the 8th century, a group of liturgical documents called Ordines begins to appear, providing us with fuller information about how the eucharist was actually celebrated in Rome in the Early Middle Ages. The Ordines provide the practical, ceremonial details for all participants in the liturgy. When added to the prayers of the sacramentaries, the directions in the Ordines give us a picture of both eucharistic words and actions for various occasions. Often these books also contain important historical and political addenda.

Eucharistic Theology and Practice in the Early Middle Ages

Throughout this early period, despite the vigor of local varieties in celebration, there was a growing tendency toward standardization of the liturgy as authority came to be centered at Rome. At the same time, eucharistic theology emphasized the sacrificial aspects of the Mass, the localized presence of Christ in the bread and wine, and allegorical interpretations of the action at the altar. Because of these trends, a sense of awe and reverence surrounding the eucharist grew to dominate popular piety. The idea that ordinary communicants were unworthy to handle the body and blood of Christ in the form of bread and wine was fueled by an emphasis on penitence, resulting in the gradual decline of frequent communion of the laity. Gazing upon the eucharist at the moment of consecration was seen to be sufficient to produce a salvific effect. At the same time, the belief was strong that the eucharist was a representation of the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, and this in turn led to the expectation that it might be practically employed to bring about desired objectives.

The theological poles of medieval eucharistic debate can be clearly seen in the controversy between the 9th-century monks. In the first systematic treatise devoted solely to the eucharist, Pascasius Radbertus (c. 785-c. 860) describes the ways in which Christ is present in the elements of bread and wine in extremely realistic and physical terms. Ratramnus of Corbie (d.c. 868) was provoked to respond, and attacked the carnal view of the real presence in favor of a more symbolic and spiritualized interpretation. In the end, Ratramnus' view was condemned as failing adequately to safeguard the doctrine of the real presence. The next three centuries saw an increasing identification of the bread and wine with the physical body and blood of Christ, and abuses of eucharistic practice were not uncommon.

By the 11th century, the structure of the eucharistic rite had reached a certain stability in the West, and Roman control had asserted itself over provincial control of ecclesiastical matters. Because of this, the eucharist as it was celebrated in Rome (and particularly as it was celebrated by the bishop of Rome), came to be normative for the rest of the Christian West. But while in Rome large numbers of liturgical personnel were available, in outlying areas a single priest might be called upon to conduct the eucharistic rites alone and the variety of books for each participant caused certain difficulties. The dissemination of Roman Missals, which brought together the prayers, ceremonial directions, the sung parts of the Mass, and readings collected from a variety of liturgical books, not only made the celebration by a single person easier, but also further encouraged the uniformity of eucharistic rites and ceremonies according to Roman patterns.

Eucharistic Theology in the Late Middle Ages

Popular distortions of eucharistic theology, and particularly the grossly carnal interpretation of the elements of bread and wine, caused the 13th-century Scholastics to give it special consideration. In 1215, the Fourth Lateran Council used the term "transubstantiation" to describe the change of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, but it was not until Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274) applied Aristotelian philosophical categories to the eucharist that any systematic treatment of this change took place. Aquinas proposed that while what is perceptible (the "accidents" of bread and wine) remains unchanged, the essential reality (the "substance") is transformed into the body and blood of Jesus Christ. But even though transubstantiation was originally put forward to combat an overly realistic view of eucharistic presence, its philosophical nuances were difficult to translate into common terms, and in the centuries which followed it came to be itself increasingly associated with the carnal presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine.

By the time of the 16th-century Reformation, several trends in eucharistic theology and practice had crystallized. Because of the fear of defiling the body and blood of Christ, laypersons received communion infrequently, and since the 13th century the chalice had been withheld from them. But eucharistic piety was high, and such popular devotions as benediction and exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, perpetual adoration, and the Feast of Corpus Christi can trace their roots to the Late Middle Ages. Because the Mass was thought to make present the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, the number of Masses multiplied to ensure an abundance of saving grace. Many religious houses, as well as parish clergy, made their living from the "Mass stipends" paid by groups and individuals who wished the eucharist offered to bring about desired consequences, and especially the early release of souls from purgatory. Although Roman eucharistic practice tended to dominate, some local variety in rites, texts and lectionaries remained.

The Eucharist and the 16th-century Reformers

This combination of eucharistic piety and abuse set the stage for the radical re-evaluation of the eucharist by those in the 16th century who sought a reformation of the church. The Reformers' concern with the centrality of the word of God and their insistence on justification through faith alone and the priesthood of all the baptized put the eucharist at the center of Reformation debate. In An Open Letter to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation (1520), Martin Luther (1483-1546) argued that "the status of a priest among Christians is merely that of an office-holder." This redefinition of priesthood undercut the current theology of the sacraments, and particularly the sacrifice of the Mass, and laid the foundations for the eucharistic theology and practice of all of the Reformation churches.

In the Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520), Luther continued his attack on current eucharistic piety and practice by criticizing transubstantiation and the denial of the cup to the laity. The presence of Christ in the eucharist, according to Luther, was like the presence of fire in a heated bar of iron, in which "every part is both iron and fire": in the same way, Christ's body and blood are wholly present in the eucharistic bread and wine. With regard to communion under both kinds, Luther argued that since Christ gave both bread and cup to his original disciples at the Last Supper, his present-day disciples deserve nothing less. Luther's Formula Missae (1523) and Deutsche Messe (1525-6), although both quite conservative rites, shaped the eucharist according to his reformed principles.

But others of the period desired a more thoroughgoing reformation of the church, and thus of the Lord's Supper. Swiss Reformers Ulrich Zwingli (1484-1531), Martin Bucer (1401-1551) and John Oecolampadius (1482-1531) found that Luther's retention of the carnal presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine left too much opportunity for theological and practical abuse, and moved in the direction of a more symbolic and memorialistic view of the eucharist. At the Marburg Colloquy (1529), Luther, arguing the conservative side, and the more radical Swiss Reformers were unable to come to agreement on the matter of eucharistic presence, marking the fracture of the reformation into distinct theological camps. John Calvin (1509-1564), the reformer of the church at Geneva, attempted to moderate the Swiss and Lutheran views of eucharistic presence, arguing that Christ is truly, albeit spiritually, received by those who faithfully partake of the bread and wine.

The various Reformers could agree, however, on a number of practical matters regarding the Lord's Supper, and especially on the necessity of communion under both kinds, the reading and preaching of scripture at each celebration of the Lord's Supper, and that no eucharist be held without communicants present. Reformation eucharistic rites simplified greatly their medieval predecessors, and increased participation of the laity was facilitated by a vernacular liturgy and the addition of responses. Although the intention was to return to the practices of the primitive church, certain elements of pre-Reformation piety remained, such as the heavily penitential emphasis. The Reformers had hoped that a weekly service of the Lord's Supper might be instituted. But since most people were used to receiving communion infrequently (once a year was common), the celebration of the eucharist quarterly was all that generally could be achieved.

The Catholic Reformation and the Eucharist

At the same time, the Catholic Reformation (often called the Counter-Reformation) left its own mark on eucharistic practice and piety. An ecumenical council convened at Trent (1545-1563) sought to curb abuses and to settle matters which the success of Protestantism in Europe had thrown into question, and several of the council's sessions dealt directly with the eucharist. At the second meeting of the council (1551) the theology of the eucharist was more precisely defined, and both Lutheran and Zwinglian positions were specifically rejected. Later sessions reaffirmed the sacrificial character of the Mass. The issue of communion under both kinds was addressed at the third meeting of the council (1562), and it was determined that the cup was properly denied to the laity, with the understanding that the whole Christ was present in both bread and wine.

One important result of the council deliberations was the establishment of the Congregation of Sacred Rites. Aiming at the standardization of public worship according to the council's decrees, and with a uniform liturgy for all of Roman Catholicism as the ultimate goal, the congregation immediately undertook the reform of liturgical books, including the missal. In the end, the rites of the Tridentine Missal (1570) embodied what was current eucharistic practice in the city of Rome, and essentially ignored the diverse, local liturgical heritage of the church. Although some of these local rites (and especially those in France) continued to be used after Trent, the rites of the Tridentine Missal formed the official eucharistic liturgy of the Roman Catholic church until the Second Vatican Council undertook revision nearly four centuries later.

The Second Generation of Reformers

At the same time, a second generation of Reformers had established Protestant eucharistic practice in the British Isles and Scandinavia. Drawing from a variety of theological sources, Thomas Cranmer (1489-1556) embodied a reformed theology of the Lord's Supper in two successive editions of the Book of Common Prayer (1549 and 1552) for the Church of England. Symbolic of the thoroughness of English reform was the insertion at the end of the 1552 communion service of the famous "Black Rubric," which declared that kneeling at communion should not be interpreted as adoration of the eucharistic elements. Cranmer's counterpart in Scotland, John Knox (c.1505-1572), framed his own eucharistic rites according to strictly Calvinist principles, and these in turn had a significant impact on the communion service in English-speaking Presbyterianism.

During the 17th century, those desiring a more complete reformation of the church believed that the eucharist was still the occasion for much misunderstanding and abuse, and sought to remove those things which might lead to superstition. Any suggestion that the communion table was an altar, kneeling or adoration of the bread and wine, and the use of vestments, the sign of the cross, and the term "priest" were all points upon which these Puritans stood fast. The Society of Friends (Quakers) can be seen as the most extreme example of this puritanizing effort and, in their effort to make the sacraments wholly spiritual experiences, abolished the elements of bread and wine altogether. The Puritan view of the Lord's Supper was carried to the New World with the early settlers and came to shape much of American sacramental piety.

Enlightenment Influence on Eucharistic Piety and Practice

The Enlightenment of the 18th century made a profound impact on the eucharistic practice and piety of Protestants, but was also felt among Roman Catholics as well. The Enlightenment exaltation of reason led to the re-evaluation of eucharistic practice among Roman Catholics, and at the Synod of Pistoia (1786) several decrees were aimed at curbing abuses of the Mass. The synod encouraged local practices, forbade the placement of more than one altar in each church and the multiplication of Masses, and condemned the use of Latin. Although these decrees aroused both popular and official opposition, they stand as testimony to the impact of the Enlightenment on Roman Catholic eucharistic theology.

The suspicion of the supernatural, for which the Enlightenment is particularly noted, affected Protestant eucharistic theology as well. Preaching and informed study of scripture, as activities of the enlightened mind, came to dominate Protestant services of worship, and the sacraments were given a subordinate role. The Lord's Supper was viewed as a way of calling to mind the virtues of Christ, and was considered a duty for those who took seriously the Lord's command, "Do this for the remembrance of me." This practical and theological marginalization of the eucharist continues to this day in much of American Protestantism.

The Eucharist in the 19th Century

Nineteenth-century reaction to Enlightenment rationalism took two forms, and both of these had significant impact on eucharistic piety and practice. The first of these is generally termed "Romanticism," and sought to restore the more cohesive religious experience of an earlier day. Many figures in the Protestant Romantic Movement looked to the medieval period as the Golden Age of Christianity, and hoped to restore medieval eucharistic piety, even among those such as Lutherans and Anglicans who had so decisively rejected it in the 16th century. Frequency of communion increased dramatically among those groups touched by Romanticism, but concomitant with this was a tendency toward the privatization of religious experience and excessive sentimentality in eucharistic devotion. Roman Catholic romanticists sought a revival of the monasteries, whose numbers had seriously declined since the 18th century. But despite its emphasis on nostalgia, the search for the historic roots of Christian worship set the stage for modern liturgical scholarship, which would come to maturity as the Liturgical Movement of the 20th century.

The second major influence on Protestant eucharistic theology and practice in the 19th century was American revivalism. All across the frontier, camp-meetings were organized as a practical response to the religious needs of a largely unchurched, rural population, and established a pattern of worship which has persisted in many segments of American Protestantism. After several days of fervent prayer, preaching for conversion, and sentimental hymns, converts were baptized and the eucharist was celebrated. Although for most groups affected by revivalism the tendency toward infrequent communion prevailed, at least one revivalist group, the Christian church (Disciples of Christ), believed that scripture commanded a weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper presided over by a lay person. This practice continues to this day among Disciples.

At the same time, the Temperance Movement was also taking hold of the American religious imagination, and the imbibing of any form of fermented drink was seen as dangerously immoral. Increasing concern over eucharistic wine ensued, and by 1870 the scientific principles of Louis Pasteur had been applied to the pasturization of grape juice, which was then introduced as the normal eucharistic element among many American Protestants. On the other hand, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) found that the growing of grapes was impractical in Utah where they had settled, and instituted the use of water in place of eucharistic wine.

In the 20th century, a renewal of attention to the eucharist has taken place among many western Christians. In Roman Catholicism, historical studies uncovered the earlier variety in eucharistic practice and documented the accumulation of devotional adjuncts. The stripping away of extraneous liturgical material in the eucharistic rites, the simplification of rubrics, the recovery of ancient signs and symbols, the attempts at indigenization of eucharistic practice, and what the Second Vatican Council referred to as "full, conscious, active participation" of the faithful were all aimed at restoring the eucharist to the center of the Christian life. At the same time, eucharistic theology underwent a similar renewal, with such classic works as Edward Schillebeeckx' Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (1960) providing a systematic reflection on the Christocentric nature of sacramental grace. It is this more relational understanding of the eucharist which underlines the Second Vatican Council's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (December 4, 1963), as well as the new eucharistic prayers which began to appear in 1967.

In some of the Protestant churches too, the eucharist has been the subject of renewed interest in the late-20th century. Beginning in the 1960s, the Roman Catholic liturgical agenda began to affect the revisions of Protestant services of the Lord's Supper, and historical studies and ecumenical contacts have made for some interdenominational convergence in eucharistic theology and practice. Most American Lutherans and Episcopalians have sought to reintroduce the eucharist as the main Sunday service, and some Methodists and Presbyterians also view this as a desirable goal. But many American Protestants, especially those with strong ties to revivalist worship patterns and Enlightenment sacramental theology, have remained relatively untouched by these trends, and non-eucharistic worship remains the norm. Most of the ecclesiastical descendants of the Reformers, however, have begun to search for their eucharistic roots in the early church and in the Continental and English Reformations, and have found a balance between ecumenical convergence and authentic Protestant diversity.

EUCHARIST, MINISTERS OF

The term "ministers of the eucharist" can have many meanings. In the categories of classical sacramental theology, where one prime concern was the proper or ordinary minister of the sacraments, the term refers to bishop and presbyter who alone, by virtue of ordination, are authorized and empowered to offer the eucharistic sacrifice and to consecrate the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. In the categories preferred by Vatican II, where the eucharist is clearly named a liturgical act in which there are many ministers and many ministries, the term expands to include readers, acolytes, musicians, ministers of hospitality, deacons, concelebrating bishops or presbyters, and in a real sense the liturgical assembly itself; in other words, all those who are liturgically active when the liturgy of the eucharist is enacted by a local church assembly. In this wider sense, the guiding norm is that "each one, minister or layperson, who has an office to perform, should do all of, but only, those parts which pertain to that office by the nature of the rite and the principles of the liturgy" (S.C., 28; G.I.R.M., 58). A second guiding norm is that the liturgy in its ordered ministries and varied actions display and enact the mystery of Christ and the true nature of the church (S.C., 2; G.I.R.M., 74). A third meaning of the term "ministers of the eucharist" points to the ministry of those who distribute the eucharistic bread and wine either during the eucharist itself or outside of the eucharistic celebration to those who have been unable to attend. This would include ministers to the sick, those who take viaticum to the dying and those who preside at services of communion in the absence of a bishop or presbyter. It may also include those who lead various eucharistic devotions, even where distribution of the eucharistic food is not part of such devotional acts (e.g., benediction). This article will offer some brief reflections on each use of the term.

Bishop and Presbyter

While it remains uncertain whether or not there was any strict regulation of eucharistic presidency in the earliest domestic churches, e.g., as in Acts 2:42, it is clear that by the time of Irenaeus of Antioch (c. 110) the role of the bishop was considered central: "Let that be considered a valid Eucharist which is celebrated by the bishop, or by one whom he appoints" (Ad Smyrn., 8,2). By the 4th century, appointment of presbyters to the task had become normal practice. Since that time the priestly office, according to which one is authorized and empowered to offer the eucharistic sacrifice, has been seen to reside, by virtue of ordination, in both bishop and presbyter. As the ecclesial nature of both eucharist and ordination began to fade, the presidency of the eucharist lost its relationship to the eucharistic assembly; priest and bishop offered Mass "on behalf of" rather than "with" the assembly gathered.

Vatican II restored the ecclesial nature of the eucharist and thereby the sacramental role of the bishop/presbyter in relation to the eucharistic assembly. The eucharist, as indeed every liturgical celebration, is "an action of Christ the Priest and of his Body which is the Church" (S.C., 7). According to the ecclesial model endorsed by the council whereby the church is the people of God hierarchically gathered (L.G., 18), the distinctive iconic role of the bishop, and of the presbyters who are his helpers, is to represent the hiereus, i.e., Christ the priest, as the one who gathers the people of God into the unity of Christ's own body. This iconic role is the ministry of the eucharistic presider. It properly belongs in liturgical act to the one who fulfills it in ecclesial life.

Vatican II thus restored the bishop as the primary one to fulfill the ministry of eucharistic presidency: "In the local Church, first place should be given, because of its meaning, to the Mass at which the bishop presides surrounded by the college of presbyters and the ministers and in which the people take full and active part. For this Mass is the preeminent expression of the Church"

(G.I.R.M., 74). The presbyter "is another who possesses the power of orders to offer sacrifice in the person of Christ" (G.I.R.M., 60), but does so as the bishop's "helper" and "coworker" (see, rite of ordination for presbyters, instruction); presbyters are joined with the episcopal order, and share in the function of the apostles in their own degree (P.O., 2).

As minister of the eucharist, bishop and presbyter fill the presidential role, and thereby serve as sacramentum or icon of Christ (in persona Christi). The ministry is threefold: to gather the assembly into Christ's own prayer to Abba; to enact for the assembly by way of invocation and consecration Christ's own promise ("I will pray to the Father, and he will give you another Counselor, to be with you forever" [Jn 14:16]); and to speak to the assembly Christ's own gathering words ("No longer do I call you servants...; but I have called you friends" [Jn 15:15]).

Ministers of Eucharist to the Assembly

The primary enactor of the eucharist is the full assembly itself. Eucharistic presidency is a specific ministry within the eucharistic assembly; it is not, however, the only ministry that is required. The other ministries can be divided into two categories: those that contribute to the quality of the celebration and those that contribute to the sacramentality of the celebration. The former, which include liturgical planners, music ministers, ministers of hospitality and, possibly, liturgical dancers find their warrant and commission when the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy speaks of the relation between good celebration and sacramental effectiveness: "they (the sacraments) do indeed impart grace, but, in addition, the very act of celebrating them disposes the faithful most effectively to receive this grace in a fruitful manner" (S.C., 59). The latter, which include the readers, the deacon, those who present the gifts, those who distribute the gifts, and indeed the gathered assembly itself, find their warrant and commission in the four-fold presence of Christ in the eucharist: word, presiding minister, eucharistic food, assembly (S.C., 7). It is in the word proclaimed that Christ speaks. It is the assembly gathered that makes Christ present. It is in the person of those who present the gifts that the church presents itself; in the person who receives the gifts that Christ receives and welcomes the church; in the person who prays over the gifts that Christ consecrates both gifts and church; and, in the person who distributes the gifts that Christ personally presents himself.

Word and food are objects, impersonal, and in themselves incapable of communicating the personal presence of Christ. Those persons who proclaim the word and who handle the gifts serve as sacramentum or icon of the personal Christ whom word and food make present. In both the proclamation of the word and the handling of the food they add the human affections that are essential for both to become a personal symbol to present a personal Christ to the church.

Ministers of the Eucharistic Food

Ministers of the eucharist who distribute the eucharistic food include the presider, deacon, any priest concelebrants who may be present, those installed in the ministry of acolyte, those appointed as "auxiliary" ministers of the eucharist, and those assigned as ad hoc "extraordinary" ministers of the eucharist. In most cases the one who prays the eucharistic prayer should rightly return to the assembly the gifts he received from them. The deacon, who is traditionally the minister of the cup, and who usually assists the presider in receiving the gifts from the people and prepares the gifts for the presiding priest, likewise should assist in distributing the eucharistic food to the assembly. Beyond that it is assumed that auxiliary and extraordinary ministers will be drawn from the assembly only when there are not enough priests or deacons to distribute the food. The only thing that would seem to be precluded is employment of ministers who are not part of the eucharistic assembly, but who "show up," as it were, only at the time of communion. This is nowhere explicitly stated, but it would seem to follow from the integrity of the eucharistic action, from the fact that the language concerning the distribution of ministries assumes that those ministers are active participants in the liturgical act, and requires, moreover, that they carry out all and only what belongs to their office [i.e., priests should concelebrate, deacons should distribute among themselves the diaconal ministries, etc.] (S.C., 28), and by analogy from the principle which urges that "the faithful receive the Lord's body from hosts consecrated at the same Mass" (G.I.R.M., 56).

Whoever actually carries out this ministry of distribution, the ministry itself must be seen as more than a functional ministry. What the minister offers to Christ in that very act by which Christ gives of himself to his sisters and brothers, is persona, human embodiment, a personal presence. The ritual instruction at the installation of acolytes captures the fullness of this ministry and the proper faith and human affection that should attend it. "In performing your ministry, bear in mind that, as you share the one bread with your brothers and sisters, so you form one body with them. Show a sincere love for Christ's Mystical Body, God's holy people, and especially for the weak and the sick. Be obedient to the commandment which the Lord gave to his apostles at the Last Supper: 'Love one another as I also have loved you.'"

Ministers of Eucharist Beyond the Assembly

From its earliest days the church has been concerned to extend the eucharist beyond the assembly, to those who are sick, those who are dying, and those who might gather in partial assembly (e.g., to partake of communion) and thus continue in another time and place the church's eucharistic action. Such extension is communio in the full sense of the word: union with Christ and union with the ecclesia of Christ. It is an extension of presence, of prayer and of care. In addition, there has grown up in the church's liturgical life an appreciation of the eucharistic food as the enduring presence of Christ to the church, an appreciation which has engendered reverence, devotion, adoration. Ministers of eucharist beyond the eucharistic assembly are those who take communion to the sick and the dying, those who conduct and preside at communion services, and those who lead acts of reverence, devotion and adoration to the Christ who is permanently present in the eucharistic food. All such extensions beyond the assembly have their root in the eucharistic assembly itself, and all such extensions are directed toward the eucharistic assembly as well.

Ministers of the eucharist beyond the assembly need to be commissioned publicly within the assembly itself. This is particularly important for those who take the eucharist to the sick and the dying, so that those who are ministered to may know that they are supported by an "enfleshed" Christ, i.e., a whole community of the church at prayer. Those who conduct services of communion should do so in such a way that the connection between this communion service and the church's full eucharistic assembly is made clear. Communion services do not stand on their own; they are extensions of, not substitutes for, the eucharistic act of the church. Finally, those who conduct forms of eucharistic worship outside of Mass must also know the relation between these acts of worship and the eucharistic act of the church. These too do not substitute for the Mass. Their purpose is to deepen eucharistic faith, faith in Christ's presence and faith in Christ's sacrifice, in order to lead those who participate in them to a fuller and more active participation in the church's eucharist itself.

EUCHARIST, REFORMATION CONTROVERSIES ON

Among Protestants, from the beginning of the Reformation to the close of the Council of Trent, eucharistic doctrine was a matter of vigorous controversy and rich development.

The fundamental document for the Protestant position is Luther's Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520). The work as a whole calls for a new approach to Christian worship. While treating all seven sacraments of the medieval system, it is the eucharist which is Luther's chief concern. As Luther sees it, the eucharist should not be understood as a sacrifice offered to God, but rather as God's gracious gift of communion. It is beneficium rather than sacrificium. Luther was concerned that the theology of his day had lost sight of the Augustinian concept of grace. Late medieval Nominalism, as exemplified in the Mass commentary of Gabriel Biel, had moved quite far in the direction of Pelagianism, as Luther saw it, and it was to this that the central Protestant objection was aimed. In Luther's A Treatise on the New Testament that is the Mass (1520) he proposed that the Lord's Supper should be understood in biblical forms of covenant rather than in Scholastic terms of form and matter, substance and accidents. If the first objection was to the Pelagianism of the eucharistic theology of his day, the second objection was to its formulation in terms of Scholasticism.

In 1522 Andreas Carlstadt, reacting to Luther's call for a new approach to worship, put forward a spiritualist interpretation of the Lord's Supper developed from themes typical of late medieval Nominalism. Luther was not favorably impressed. Recognizing the incongruity of a spiritualist interpretation with the doctrine of the incarnation, Luther began to realize the importance of developing his own eucharistic doctrine more fully. While Luther was working to this end, there were others who tried their hand at the project.

By 1517 Christian Humanism had already challenged the Scholastic theological monopoly with some success. While Luther was primarily the product of Scholasticism, there were in South Germany a number of other theologians profoundly influenced by Christian Humanism and the new philological studies promoted by the Renaissance. Among these were Ulrich Zwingli, Martin Bucer, Wolfgang Capito, and John Oecolampadius. Having nothing to do with philosophical humanism, Christian Humanism advocated that theology return to the biblical and patristic sources of Christian thought. This concern for biblical philology made these Reformers more sensitive to the original meaning of scripture. While they were in complete agreement with Luther's objections to the doctrine of the eucharistic sacrifice, they had some objections of their own. Originally their objections to the Scholastic eucharistic doctrines were philological rather than philosophical. As Zwingli understood it, when the text of 1 Cor 10-11 is studied in the light of biblical grammar and rhetoric, one is led to interpret the words "This is my body" and "This is my blood" tropologically, and therefore the biblical text simply does not support the doctrine of the real presence as it had been developed during the Middle Ages. Oecolampadius had much the same objection. Being one of the leading patristic scholars of his generation, Oecolampadius looked into the origins of such terms as mysterion and sacramentum in both scripture and the usage of the ancient church, suggesting that a proper understanding of them would lead to a better sacramental theology. Both Johannes Bugenhagen, Luther's associate in Wittenberg, and Andreas Osiander, the Reformer of Nuremberg, wrote works objecting strongly to Zwingli's approach. Then Johann Brenz, a particularly capable supporter of Luther in South Germany, wrote his Syngramma Suevicum to refute Oecolampadius. Obviously the Sacramentarians, as Zwingli and Oecolampadius were popularly called, had not provided the new eucharistic doctrine Luther had envisioned, but they had gained some important insights.

Luther was horrified at Zwingli's attack on the doctrine of the real presence. Over the next few years Luther's position developed considerably. For him the basic concern was the meaning of the words of institution. Luther was just as concerned with the meaning of scripture as Zwingli, but for Luther it seemed quite impossible to take the eucharistic words tropologically. As he saw it, the words of institution are a summary of the gospel assuring the forgiveness of sin to those who believe. Luther insisted on a literal interpretation of "This is my body; this my blood," because only in such a way can the covenantal fellowship be actually established. The sacramental realism here is quite intentional and quite conscious. Luther's position, called consubstantiation, teaches not that the bread and wine are changed into the body and blood of Christ but rather that the communicant received the body and blood of Christ with the bread and wine. The emphasis is on what the communicant receives from Christ rather than on any miraculous transformation performed by the priest.

In 1529 the Marburg Colloquy was called by Philip of Hesse to try to bring the South German and North German Reformers into agreement. No agreement came about. Luther was very blunt; the words of Christ were, "This is my body," and no amount of philological analysis or reasoning about what God could or could not do was going to change his mind. For Zwingli the biblical evidence was clear; the ascension of Christ precluded a bodily presence, and Luther's doctrine of ubiquity compromised the true humanity of Christ. Unfortunately, Luther saw Zwingli as a rationalist. He completely missed the strong christological dimension of Zwingli's argument. While Luther and Zwingli parted with the conviction that their two positions were irreconcilable, Bucer suspected there was a way to affirm the real presence without ignoring the biblical exegesis of Zwingli. At the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, the great majority of German Protestants united together in the Augsburg Confession agreeing with Luther that Christ's body and blood are present in, with, and under the bread and wine. On the other hand, four cities of South Germany, led by Strasbourg's Reformer, Bucer, wanting to come up with a conciliatory statement of the South German position, adopted the Tetrapolitan Confession. In 1531 Zwingli and Oecolampadius died before coming up with a fully developed doctrine of the Lord's Supper. More and more Bucer gained support for his attempt at finding a middle ground and in 1536 a significant group of South Germans led by Bucer and Capito went to Wittenberg to assure Luther of their belief that, although the bread and wine were signs of Christ's presence, they were not empty signs. The Wittenburg Concord was thereby achieved.

It was only with the younger generation of Reformers that the Reformed doctrine of the eucharist came to full expression in the work of Henry Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigli, and John Calvin. Bullinger, Zwingli's successor in Zurich, developed an understanding of the sacraments based on covenantal theology. As Bullinger saw it, the sacraments should be understood as signs of the covenant. Bullinger was picking up on ideas, expressed, but not developed by Luther, Zwingli, and Oecolampadius. By a thorough study of the biblical concepts behind such basic terms as sign, covenant, and memorial, Bullinger deepened considerably the position of his predecessor. The approach which Bullinger championed was essentially philological.

Vermigli, a Florentine by birth, educated in Italian via antiqua Scholasticism, came to know the discussion of eucharistie doctrine which was going on north of the Alps during his days as prior of the Augustinian community in Naples. As Luther, Vermigli was concerned to recover an Augustinian emphasis on grace in eucharistie doctrine. He was thoroughly opposed to the doctrine of the eucharistic sacrifice and was fascinated by the possibility of finding a way of affirming Christ's presence in worship without recourse to the doctrine of transubstantiation. Vermigli made great use of OT types, the covenantal meals of the patriarchs, the Passover feast, and the story of feeding on the manna. Like Bullinger he was concerned to use biblical imagery in trying to understand the sacrament. He put an emphasis on the sacrament as eucharist, that is, as thanksgiving, and liked to explain sacramental doctrine by its analogy to Chalcedonian Christology. In 1548 Cranmer had Vermigli appointed regius professor of divinity at Oxford, and in 1549 he participated in the important Oxford Disputation which led to a wide dissemination of his ideas in England, where his influence was perpetuated by John Jewel, bishop of Salisbury.

Calvin, following Bucer, developed a strong doctrine of the work of the Holy Spirit in bringing about that which the sacrament signified. Christ is truly present, as Calvin understands it, through the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit works within the hearts of believers restoring the faithful in the image of Christ and uniting them in his body. For Calvin, not only is Christ present with us at the Lord's table, but we are present with him at the wedding feast of the Lamb. It is not a local presence which is at issue but rather a personal presence. Christ is present at the Supper that the faithful might enter into covenantal fellowship with him and be fed by him on the Word of Life. While this dimension of Calvin's eucharistic theology has often been called dynamistic, it is more properly understood as sapiential. It is the wisdom theology of the gospel of John, Calvin's interpretation of Augustine's verbum visibile.

Calvin, whose respect for Luther was enormous, did not want to part company with Luther, and being well read in the writings of the early Fathers he wanted to affirm Christ's presence at the Supper, even if he could not accept the standard Scholastic explanations of that presence. His Short Treatise on the Lord's Supper is an irenic statement of his position. At first Calvin's ideas were received in northern Germany, particularly by Melancthon, but apparently also by Luther. On the other hand, Calvin was in obvious agreement with Bullinger's attempt to explain the sacraments in terms of covenant theology, and in 1549 Calvin and Bullinger were able to reach the Consensus Tigurinus.

When the Consensus Tigurinus became known in northern Germany, it once more awakened fears of a spiritualist interpretation. Luther had died in 1546 and Joachim Westphal of Hamburg became the chief proponent of Lutheran orthodoxy in regard to eucharistic doctrine. The conversation was as brilliant as it was heated. Contrary to Calvin, Westphal believed, as Luther had before him, that the ubiquity of Christ's body allowed for the real presence of the ascended Christ in the eucharist. For Calvin this was inconsistent with Chalcedonian Christology. It confused the human nature of Christ with the divine nature of Christ. While Calvin wanted to affirm Christ's presence, he could not agree with Westphal to the point of saying that even the faithless received the body of Christ.

In England the discussion of eucharistic doctrine was late in developing. Although Henry VIII was one of the first to defend Catholic sacramental doctrine from Luther's Babylonian Captivity, he soon found it to his advantage to appoint Thomas Cranmer as his archbishop. Cranmer had gotten to know the eucharistic controversies firsthand while in Germany in 1532. Although he married the niece of Andreas Osiander, his ideas began to develop in the direction of the Reformed theologians of South Germany. With the death of Henry VIII in 1547, Cranmer was free to lead the Church of England in a clearly Protestant direction. He called Bucer to Cambridge and Vermigli to Oxford. Their teaching was received enthusiastically in many circles and when the Prayer Book of 1552 appeared it showed the clear influence of Reformed eucharistic theology. The new approach to the eucharist was above all championed by Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley. With the accession of Elizabeth I in 1558, the theological climate changed. The new queen, motivated by political concerns, favored ambiguity in eucharistic doctrine. The Thirty-nine Articles (1563), simply understood, supported the position of the younger Reformed theologians, but was capable of other interpretations. Elizabeth recognized the prevailingly Protestant sentiments of her subjects but wanted to offend no one who would recognize her authority over the church.

With the close of the Council of Trent in 1563 Protestant eucharistic theology entered a new phase.

EUCHARIST, RESERVATION OF THE

The food of eucharist is reserved after the eucharistic celebration primarily to extend the nourishment and the grace of Christ's table to those unable to participate in the liturgy itself, particularly the sick and the dying. This is clearly stated in the 1967 instruction Eucharisticum mysterium: "the primary and original purpose of the reserving of the sacred species in church outside Mass is the administration of the Viaticum" (E.M., III, I, A). Other reasons for its reservation are distribution of communion to the faithful at times other than Mass, and the adoration of Christ in this sacramental form which represents and presents his continued presence to the church. In some churches of the West the eucharist is also reserved from the liturgy of Holy Thursday for the reception of communion during the liturgy of Good Friday; in some churches of the East eucharistic reservation for a liturgy of the "pre-sanctified" occurs frequently, especially during Lent. The eucharistic food is usually reserved in the form of bread alone, though provision is made for the reservation of consecrated wine as well where it may be necessary to provide communion for the sick who are unable to receive the eucharistic bread (E.M., II, III, K).

Apart from the liturgical reservation of the sacrament on Holy Thursday, where the directives in the Roman sacramentary name the place of reservation or reposition as "a chapel suitably decorated for the occasion," the documents offer a variety of suggestions as to the place where the sacrament is to be reserved. They also reveal a shift in the understanding of eucharistic reservation that has grown with an evolved understanding of the eucharistic celebration itself. While the 1967 document does suggest a chapel distinct from the middle or central part of the church as a place suitable for private prayer and devotion, its main concern is to separate the place of reservation from a liturgical space where marriages and funerals are frequent, or where churches may receive a large number of tourist visitors. Otherwise E.M. suggests that "the Blessed Sacrament should be reserved in a solid, inviolable tabernacle in the middle of the main altar or on a side altar, but in a truly prominent place" (III, II, C). It also allows that "Mass may be celebrated facing the people even though there is a tabernacle on the altar, provided this is small yet adequate" (ibid.). In contrast, the U.S. bishops' document Environment and Art in Christian Worship (1978) gives priority of place to a special eucharistic chapel because the major space of a church should be designed for the eucharistic action, whereas the space for eucharistic reservation should be designed for individual devotion. "A room or chapel specifically designed and separate from the major space is important so that no confusion can take place between the celebration of the eucharist and reservation. Active and static aspects of the same reality cannot claim the same human attention at the same time" (E.A.W., 78). The document is clear to insist that this does not lower the importance of eucharistic reservation; rather, "a space carefully designed and appointed can give proper attention to the reserved sacrament" (ibid.).

There has thus been a growing recognition that the use and design of space that is appropriate to the eucharistic celebration cannot be at the same time appropriate to the private devotion that should attend eucharistic reservation. This recognition is missed in places where a eucharistic chapel is constructed as a miniature version of the main church, and used as well for the eucharistic celebration on weekdays, or when the assembly is small. It would seem to follow that if the main church space which is designed for the eucharistic action is inappropriate for the private devotion proper to eucharistic reservation, the converse would also be true: a proper eucharistic chapel, suitable for private devotion, would be equally inappropriate for the eucharistic celebration.

Separation of the place of reservation from the main space of eucharistic assembly does pose a symbolic problem which may require some form of ritual address. In the Catholic imagination, tabernacle and sanctuary lamp have traditionally spoken the presence of Christ in the reserved eucharistic food. Extinguish the lamp and leave the tabernacle door open, as in the time between Good Friday and the Easter vigil, and a powerful statement of Christ's nonpresence was also made and recognized. As the connection between eucharistic reservation and the full eucharistic assembly grows in importance, the imagination will have to be trained in this connection as well.

It has become important, for example, that the eucharistic food sent to the sick be publicly sent from the eucharistic assembly precisely so that those in the assembly, should they become sick and recipients of the eucharist from the assembly, will know with some symbolic richness whence that eucharist has come. Public ritual is required to make the connection clear. In like manner, if communion is to be properly distributed outside Mass for whatever reason, and if the connection between that distribution and the full eucharistic assembly is to be properly maintained, some ritual of placement of the eucharistic food from the eucharistic assembly into the chapel of reservation will be required. A clue to this may be found in the procession that accompanies the eucharistic food to the place of repose on Holy Thursday. Only those gathered on Good Friday who were participants in the Holy Thursday liturgy will really know the source of the food for Friday's communion, and the full symbolic richness which the link between Thursday and Friday (Supper and Cross) involves. For those who were not present on Thursday, the food may appear to come from nowhere. The symbolic link will be diminished or lost.

A final point to be made concerns the piety that should attend eucharistic reservation. Since the two major purposes of eucharistic reservation focus on Christ for the absent and Christ present to the church, these two points of focus identify the kind of prayer that is proper to eucharistic devotion. Christ is present to the church for the church, as the constant sign of God's constant fidelity to the human race. Eucharistia, thanksgiving, ought to dominate the prayer. Christ is not present in need of the church to comfort him; he is present because the church needs to be comforted by him; comforted and assured that the covenant of God, sealed by his death and resurrection, still holds. Humble reception of God's fidelity and trust in that fidelity ought also to shape prayer in the presence of the reserved sacrament. And finally, Christ is present for those who are absent, and for those not yet touched by his saving word and work. Prayer before Christ in the eucharist, far from drawing us in and away from the world of everyday life, should draw our attention outward in concern both for those with whom Christ has already set us in communion, and for those with whom Christ yearns to set us in communion. In that way, devotion to Christ outside of Mass will deepen faith, trust and the love that is communion, and enable those who pray outside of Mass to achieve a deeper and fuller level of participation when they gather again in assembly for the eucharistic celebration itself.

EUCCHARIST, THEOLOGY OF

The eucharist (Gk. eucharistia, thanksgiving) is the central act of Christian worship and indeed of the whole Christian life (Eucharisticum mysterium, 1967; G.I.R.M., chap. 1, 1). Composed of two essential parts, liturgy of the word and liturgy of the eucharist, it is nonetheless, because of the intimate union between the two, a single act of worship (G.I.R.M., chap. 1, 8). Vatican II gives a concise statement of the meaning of this act of the church: "At the Last Supper, on the night when he was betrayed, our Savior instituted the eucharistic sacrifice of his body and blood. He did this in order to perpetuate the sacrifice of the Cross throughout the centuries until he should come again, and so to entrust to his beloved spouse, the church, a memorial of his death and resurrection: a sacrament of love, a sign of unity, a bond of charity, a paschal banquet in which Christ is eaten, the mind is filled with grace, and a pledge of future glory is given to us" (S.C., 47).

More narrowly, eucharist refers to the bread and wine consecrated during the eucharistic liturgy (e.g., holy eucharist), received in communion and kept in reserve both for the sick and as a sign of Christ's enduring presence in and to the church. While it is still proper to use the term in this restricted sense, Vatican II restored its primary use for the whole liturgical action.

Eucharist is but one of many names for this liturgical act. In the NT it is also called "the breaking of the bread" (Lk 24:35; Acts 2:46); "the Lord's supper" (1 Cor 11:20); "the new paschal feast" (1 Cor 5:8); and "koinonia (participation, communion) in the body and blood of Christ" (1 Cor 10:16). Among the various churches it has been called, in addition to some of these NT terms, "Mass" (Latin Roman Catholic), the "Divine Liturgy" (Byzantine Orthodox and Catholic), the "Holy Communion" (Anglican), the "Mysteries" (West Syrian), and the "Sanctification or Oblation" (Coptic). Among the churches it is enacted according to a variety of complex ritual forms which differ among themselves in secondary structure and nuance (see, traditions, liturgical . . .). In all churches, however, the essential structure is the same: readings from scripture, prayers of intercession, and the meal of the bread and wine which are presented, blessed and distributed. All this is done in anamnesis (remembrance) of God's deeds made manifest in Jesus Christ (1 Cor 11:24-25; Lk 22:19).

Origins

Christian eucharist had its beginnings in the Jewish customs of faith and prayer which Jesus himself carried out with his disciples. The liturgy of the word derives from the synagogue where the scriptures were read and discussed, and where prayers of intercession were raised to God. The meal derives from the customs of the home where every meal was accompanied by berakoth (blessing prayers) that named the deeds of God and asked God's continued blessing and action. After the experience of Christ's resurrection, and while they still considered themselves and were considered to be Jews, the disciples continued their familiar practices, altering them where needed to bring into primary focus God's "new deed" who is Jesus, once dead and now risen. In the synagogue they continued to read and discuss the (Hebrew) scriptures, now seeking to understand Jesus in their light. In their homes they continued to bless God at their common meals, a blessing now surely made in terms of the risen Christ.

Two factors, however, urged evolution beyond these familiar Jewish patterns: the destruction of the Jerusalem temple (A.D. 70) and the expansion of Christianity to the Gentiles. The language of "newness" gained ascendancy: Christ the "new" temple, his sacrifice the "new" Passover, God's deed the "new" covenant. And the once familiar patterns of faith and prayer had to be translated for those Gentiles who did not know or understand their ways (as witnessed in 1 Cor 11: 17-34). In time, elements of synagogue and meal came together. In time, the full meal was replaced by a symbolic meal comprised of those elements over which the berakoth were prayed: bread and the cup

(of thanksgiving). Multiple blessing prayers (as in the Didache, c. A.D. 110) were joined into a single prayer (as in Apost. Trad. of Hippolytus, c. A.D. 215), and the essential structure of all later eucharistic prayers and rites was established. After the peace of Constantine (c. A.D. 312), more fixed formularies for its enactment began to take hold (see Bouley).

Understandings

From the beginning Christians tried to understand this "new deed" of God, the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and at the same time the meal of eucharist which is its anamnesis. The theology of eucharist embraces all forms of such attempts. Four forms of theological interpretation are considered here: (a) the biblical witness, (b) eucharistic anaphoras, (c) instructional writings of the early church, and (d) systematic reflection through the Middle Ages and beyond.

(a) Biblical Witness

The first, and foundational, form of eucharistic understanding is the biblical witness of the NT, where understanding is drawn primarily from OT imagery. Paul interprets Jesus and his remembrance in light of Passover: "Christ, our paschal lamb, has been sacrificed. Let us therefore celebrate the festival. . ." (1 Cor 5:8). John does the same in his passion narrative by having Jesus die at the same time the Passover lambs are slain (Jn 19:31). Paul also interprets eucharist in light of the exodus (1 Cor 10:1-5), and in his traditio of the "institution" twice identifies eucharist explicitly as anamnesis (remembrance) (1 Cor 11: 24-25). As remembrance, eucharist is the source of koinonia (participation, fellowship) with Christ (1 Cor 10: 16). John uses water rather than food to identify this participation in Christ, "If I do not wash you, you have no part in me" (Jn 13:8), and, though this is usually spoken of as baptismal rather than eucharistic imagery, John's gospel is probably too early to allow such a distinction. The synoptic accounts name eucharist in terms of Passover (Mk 14:12-16; Mt 26:19-20; Lk 22:15). Matthew adds the note of sacrifice (26:28) and both Luke and Paul the note of eschatological promise (Lk 22:16; 1 Cor 11:26). Finally, John 6 (esp. vv. 35-51) interprets the eucharistic food in terms of the desert manna of Exod 16, and identifies the "new" manna with Christ himself. In the NT the full scope of eucharistic faith is already firmly established.

(b) Eucharistic Anaphoras

The second form of eucharistic understanding is found in the tradition (evolution) of the anaphora or eucharistic prayer. These prayers were as much shaped by the christological and trinitarian controversies among the churches as by a growing understanding of the eucharist itself. Though both the structure and the content of these prayers give witness to a variety of understandings (e.g.: the thanksgiving narrative being christological or trinitarian; focused on redemption alone or on creation, redemption and the on-going work of the Spirit; the invocation of Word or of Spirit, or in the Roman canon, the angels; and the placement of intercessions as part of the narrative, the anamnesis [memorial], or the epiclesis [invocation of Spirit]), the prime indicator of eucharistic understanding is found in the "request formularies" that are most usually the epiclesis. There one finds three stages of evolution: the first request (e.g., in Didache, A.D. 110., and Apost. Trad. of Hippolytus, 3rd cent.) gives primary emphasis to the union of all in Christ; the second (e.g., in the Anaphora of Addai and Mari, early 4th cent.) gives primary emphasis to strengthening the faith of Christians, with a secondary focus on sanctifying the bread and wine; the third (e.g., in the Euchology of Serapion of Thmuis, 4th cent., and the anaphoras of St. John Chrysostom and Basil of Caesarea, both 4th cent.) gives primacy to the conversion of the food, with secondary focus on the food as a source of strength. The prayer for unity in this third stage becomes tertiary (St. Basil), incidental (Der Balyzeh fragment, c. 5th cent.) or simply absent (Chrysostom, St. Mark, Roman canon). These request formularies are a prime theological source because they reveal the purpose of the eucharist intended by the church and the hopes of those who enact it.

These eucharistic prayers likewise reveal, at the third stage, a diversity of views as to who is the agent in the conversion of food and in the effectiveness of the eucharistic prayer. In the Roman canon, where the influence of Ambrose (De myst., 43-54) is felt and where the Verba Jesu (institution narrative) are at the center, the agent is Christ's own words. In the prayer attributed to John Chrysostom (epiclesis: "...having changed them by the Holy Spirit"), the agent is clearly the Spirit, though this position is more securely that of Cyril of Jerusalem (Catechetical lectures, xix, 7; xxi, 3) since Chrysostom himself inclined towards the agency of Christ's words (De prod. Jud i. 6). In the Euchology of Serapion, where the Logos (Word) is invoked rather than the Spirit, it is again Christ who is agent, though the bread and wine are offered as figura (image) of the body and blood, and the Logos is invoked that the bread become the body of the Logos and the wine the blood of truth (see Bouyer, 204). Finally, the Syrian or Cilician Testamentum Domini (4th cent.) invokes the full Trinity for consecration.

(c) Instructional Writings

The third form of eucharistic understanding is contained in the various pre- and post-Nicene writings: apologetic (e.g., Justin Martyr, fl. c. 150), instructional

(e.g., Origen, d. 253), homiletic (e.g., Chrysostom, d. 407) and mystagogical catecheses (e.g., Ambrose, d. 397, Cyril of Jerusalem, fl. 347), where two eucharistic questions began to take shape, viz., the presence of Christ in the eucharistic food and the sacrificial nature of the eucharistic act. Both questions are constant concerns, though they are not yet developed in any systematic way.

The earliest concerns for articulating and reflecting on the presence of Christ in the eucharistic food were primarily christological. The fact of Christ's presence was taken for granted. It was used by Justin to prove the incarnation and by Irenaeus (c. 180) to prove the resurrection. Only later is the fact, or at least the nature of the fact, called into question.

D. Stone (A History of the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist, chaps. 2, 3) traces the gradual evolution of insight into the question of Christ's presence. In the pre-Nicene era, three different ways of speaking arose: (a) what is given in eucharist is a spiritual gift, the exact nature of which is not defined [e.g., "life and knowledge" (Didache), "medicine of immortality" (Ignatius of Antioch)]; (b) what is given in eucharist is a symbol [Gk. symbolon] (Clement of Alexandria) or figure [Lat. figura] (Tertullian) of the body and blood of Christ; (c) what is given in eucharist is the body and blood of Christ (Justin, Irenaeus). After Nicea these three views continue, with others as well: (a) there are general references to eucharist as a means of receiving the body and blood of Christ (e.g., "But now we, eating of the Word of the Father, and having the lintels of our hearts sealed with the blood of the new covenant, acknowledge the grace given us from the Savior" [Athanasius, Festal letters, v. 5]); (b) the elements are spoken of as figure, symbol, likeness and image of the body and blood of Christ (e.g., "the symbols of his body and his saving blood" [Eusebius of Caesarea, Demonstratio Evangelica,

I, x, 28]); (c) the elements are spoken of as having heightened efficacy (e.g., "As the bread of the Eucharist after the invocation of the Holy Ghost is no longer simple bread but the body of Christ, so also after the invocation this holy chrism is no longer . . . common but becomes Christ's gift of grace" [Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechetical lectures, xxi. 3]); (d) the elements are spoken of as the body and blood of Christ (e.g., "Since then He declared and spake of the bread, 'This is My body,' who will dare to doubt any longer? And since he affirmed and said, 'This is My blood,' who will ever hesitate so as to say it is not His blood?" [Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechetical letters, xxii. 1]). In addition, Christ's presence is said to be of a spiritual character, and the eucharist is connected with the church as body of Christ (esp. Augustine). There was little or no attempt to explain the intrinsic relationship between the presence of Christ and the elements. Two apparently opposed views vied for attention: one that drew the connection between incarnation and eucharist, emphasizing the abiding reality of the elements even after consecration (Nestorius, Theodoret, Pope Gelasius), and the other affirming a definite change in the elements themselves (Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nyssa).

The language of eucharistic sacrifice, while constant, is less developed. Stone traces this as well. In the pre-Nicene era, two convictions take hold: (a) the repudiation of all carnal sacrifices; (b) their place taken by Christian life, belief and worship which are spiritual sacrifices. Where the language of sacrifice is connected to the eucharist, it is drawn via the prophecy of Malachi (Mai 1:11, "From the rising of the sun . . ."). There is no explanation of the sense in which sacrifice is applied to eucharist. After Nicea the general sacrificial terminology continues, with the memorial connected at times with the passion and death of Christ, and at times not only his death but also his resurrection, ascension and heavenly life. The Christian's act in offering the sacrifice culminates in communion which brings union with Christ. True sacrifice (Augustine) is dedication of self to God.

(d) Systematic Reflection

The fourth form of eucharistic understanding is the mode of systematic reflection. Key figures in the East are Maximus the Confessor (7th cent.), John of Damascus (8th cent.), Nicholas Cabasilas (14th cent.) and Symeon of Thessalonica (15th cent.), with a key event being the iconoclast controversy (8th cent.) and its resolution at the Seventh Ecumenical Council (II Nicea, A.D. 787). Key figures in the West, prior to the Reformation, are Augustine, who formulated an early systematic theology of sacraments, Amalarius of Metz (9th cent.), who offered allegorical interpretations of the Mass, Radbertus and Ratramnus (9th cent.), who debated real vs. symbolic presence of Christ in the eucharistic food, Berengarius of Tours (11th cent.), Hugh of St. Victor (12th cent.) and the great scholastic theologians (13th cent.), Aquinas, Bonaventure, Scotus, et al. Key voices after the Reformation are Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, and the Catholic decrees of the Council of Trent.

The East began to secure for faith the transformation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ at the invocation of the Holy Spirit (epiclesis). The impact of the iconoclast controversy was to distinguish the bread and wine before the invocation (as an image of Christ) from the same after the invocation (as the actual body and blood of Christ). The eucharist was also secured as true sacrifice offered to God, with the entire trinitarian Godhead recipient of the sacrifice offered by Christ. The ecclesial nature of the eucharist was stressed, along with the relationship between the earthly offering (liturgy) and the heavenly liturgy. The eucharistic action was presented and developed allegorically as the unfolding of the mysteries of Christ's life, death and resurrection (esp. Maximus the Confessor and Nicholas Cabasilas).

In the West a sharp distinction occurred between eucharistic piety and eucharistic reflection. The action of the eucharist became the action of the priest alone, a sacred drama which the people attended. The key moment became the consecration (the words of Jesus at the Supper), which was regarded as an epiphany of the great King, royally enthroned upon the altar, and greeted with astonished eyes and adoring hearts. Mystagogy (the catechetics of doers) was replaced by allegory (the catechetics of watchers) and from Amalarius onward the parts of the Mass were exposed as symbolic re-enactments, first of all salvation history, and eventually (12th cent.) of the passion of Christ only. The Mass was offered by the priest (offertory prayer: "... which I your unworthy servant offer to you on behalf of ...") to win benefits for the living and the dead. At the heart of this shift in eucharistic piety was a christological image shift: Christ no longer in the midst of the assembly, but at the right hand of the Father in heaven (Jungmann, The Place of Christ in Liturgical Prayer, 1965).

Reflective attention was focussed first on the fact of Christ's presence, and later (13th cent. onward) on the mode or manner of Christ's presence. Controversies in the 9th cent. (Radbertus and Ratramnus) and the 11th cent. (Berengarius) examined the eucharistic elements as either symbolic pointers to Christ who was elsewhere (i.e., heaven) or transformed elements which presented the historical flesh and blood of Jesus. In spite of the fact that reason urged the former, while being repelled by the latter, the church opted for real over symbolic presence, leaving for a later time a systematic understanding of how this was so. That time came (13th cent.) with the re-discovery of Aristotelian categories which allowed a distinction that the earlier Platonic categories did not. At stake was the accessibility of Christ (real presence) and at the same time the divinity of Christ (irreducible to created matter). The substance-accident distinction of Aristotle, two principles of being contained within created matter, with one (accident) representing what the senses perceived (hence: size, shape, texture, place) and the other (substance) a universal principle not limited to any one of its manifestations, provided a way out of the intellectual stalemate. With these categories in hand, and though it in fact involved a theological twist of Aristotle's own use of the terms, it was possible to name a universal element within the bread and wine that was changed into Christ (substance) while allowing the senses their proper due (accidents unchanged). The term "transubstantiation" was brought forward from Tertullian to name this ontological change. With great subtlety they insisted that this change be such as (a) not to violate creation, and (b) to insure that creation itself is redeemed. For a time at least reason served faith and was not offended by it.

The subtlety of the scholastic solution, however, did not endure. It did not endure for Luther who, though the term "consubstantiation" is often attributed to him as counter-point to Catholic "transubstantiation," preferred to side with the biblical witness (thus real presence: "This is my body") and shun philosophical attempts at explanation. It did not endure for Calvin whose bias toward the exalted Christ (as opposed to the incarnate or crucified Christ) would allow that Christ only be really present now through his Advocate, the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit. Nor did it endure for Zwingli who alone among the Reformers opted for a symbolic rather than real presence (elements point to and remind one of Christ who is elsewhere). Whether or not its subtlety endured at Rome, the scholastic solution was claimed by the Council of Trent as "most apt" (aptissime) to secure its own faith confession that the words of Jesus bring about "the conversion of the whole substance of bread into the body and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, while the appearances of bread and wine nonetheless remain" (D.S., 1652).

In regard to the question of eucharistic sacrifice, there is little development in systematic reflection in the West between the end of the patristic era and the Reformation. The essential pieces had long been in place: the eucharist is the sacrifice which Christ offers to God together with his church; it is Christ who offers and Christ who is offered. The fruit of the sacrifice is the union of Christians with Christ as well as spiritual benefits that come from such union.

What did happen to pave the way for the Reformation controversies on eucharistic sacrifice was an increasing reification of the benefits of the sacrifice in categories of merit and satisfaction for sin. This, coupled with the loss of an ecclesiological dimension of the sacrifice (Christ and his church offered and offering) and the increased sacerdotalizing of the sacrifice (priest offers on behalf of the people), led in both praxis and popular piety to an "economic" model for understanding the sacrificial nature of the eucharist: quid pro quo. This inadequate framework for articulating the fruit of Christ's sacrifice as it is received by the living and the dead distorted faith and led to the abusive behavior ("Mass" priests; multiplicity of Masses without congregations) which triggered the Reformation.

The Reformers generally rejected the then current notion of eucharistic sacrifice as a human work capable of influencing God: Christ's sacrifice was once for all; people are saved by faith, not works; eucharist is praise and thanksgiving (and in that sense sacrifice); it is not propitiatory for the living and the dead. The Catholic response at Trent, while trying to clear up the abuses which the Reformers decried, held two seemingly contradictory confessions in tandem: Christ's sacrifice was indeed once for all; nonetheless, the eucharist is true sacrifice offered for the living and the dead (D.S., 1751). The church of the West splintered.

Subsequent reflection on the side of the Reformers developed word and fellowship, and continued to fend off any note of the eucharist as a propitiatory sacrifice with the sola fide cry. Subsequent reflection on the Catholic side continued to foster transubstantiation and eucharistic sacrifice. Unfortunately, Catholic teaching on real presence was jeopardized as the term substance moved, in the 17th cent., from being a metaphysical category to being a physical category (as in physical science); teaching on sacrifice remained jeopardized by the "economic model" which was somewhat modified to clear up abuses, but which nonetheless remained the framework for sacrifice discourse. Only in the 20th cent., with its recovery of biblical and patristic language, with the writings of Odo Casel, Pius XII, Bernard Leeming, Edward Schillebeeckx, et al., and, of course, with Vatican II, was this double jeopardy finally lifted.

These four forms of eucharistic understanding, biblical witness, eucharistic anaphora, early church writings and subsequent systematic reflection, represent the full traditio of the eucharist, and all are called into play by Vatican II as it not only instituted liturgical reforms for the eucharist and other liturgical acts of the church but also spoke its eucharistic and sacramental faith in fresh new ways.

Fundamental Concepts

Before turning to a consideration of eucharistic faith in the light of Vatican II, four key concepts at the heart of eucharistic theology need to be identified: (a) eucharist as sacrament; (b) eucharist as anamnesis (an act of remembrance); (c) eucharist as worship; and (d) eucharist as koinonia (communion or fellowship).

(a) Sacrament

The term sacrament (Gk. mysterion, Lat. sacramentum) has long been defined for English speaking Catholics as "an outward sign instituted by Christ to give grace." This terse definition was designed to carry the faith articulated at Trent that Christ, not the early church, instituted sacraments, and that sacraments both contained the grace they conferred and conferred the grace they contained. The model was of a "holy thing" given by the church and received by the faithful. In Catholic theology there were seven, no more, no less. This classic definition has been radically revitalized in the latter half of the 20th century.

E. Schillebeeckx (Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God, 1960) began to speak of Christ as sacrament, meaning by this that Christ is the visible and tangible presence, the human embodiment, of the mystery of God. K. Rahner (The Church and the Sacraments, 1963) spoke in much the same way of the church as sacrament of Christ, a usage formally adopted at Vatican II (L.G., 1; S.C., 5). It is in the context of this double usage of the term for Christ and for the church that the eucharist as sacrament of the church must be understood. The church comes together (ec-clesia) to enact the eucharistic liturgy. In both its assembling (church as sacrament) and its eucharistic action (eucharist as sacrament) it becomes the visible and tangible and active presence, the human embodiment, of the mystery of Jesus Christ (S.C., 2). Eucharist is no longer to be seen in the first instance as a "holy thing" given and received. It is first and foremost a holy action of a holy people gathered by Christ, joined to Christ, enacting with Christ his worship of God and his salvation of humanity (S.C., 7).

(b) Remembrance

When the church gathers to enact the eucharist it does so in remembrance (Heb. zikkaron, Gk. anamnesis, Lat. memoria) of Jesus Christ. The word itself has had many meanings. When translated into Latin it became an act of imitation (what Jesus did at the Last Supper) and obedience (his command, "Do this in remembrance of me"). In Greek it had more the meaning of "participation," the koinonia which Paul describes in 1 Cor 10:16. The Hebrew, from which both the Greek and the Latin are derived, is much richer in meaning (see Childs). Gen 9:8-17 gives its full scope: God makes a covenant; God establishes a sign of the covenant; the sign is presented to God so that God will remember and act once again according to the covenant.

The exact nature of the injunction, "Do this in remembrance of me," is disputed among biblical scholars. What is not disputed is that in the Pauline text at least the eucharistic gathering is named remembrance. Western theology in general, and Catholic theology in particular, has read this phrase as memoria, a command to imitate Jesus' own actions at the Supper. Eastern theology has not held exactly the same ties to the Supper, and has given more stress to anamnesis (= koinonia, participation) than to obedience and imitation. The recovery of the Hebrew understanding as more primitive and far richer than either anamnesis or memoria invites both East and West to recover the fullness of remembrance which the eucharist in fact is.

In Jesus Christ, especially in his resurrection from the dead and the sending of the Spirit, God makes covenant with all men and women ("... the new covenant in my blood" 1 Cor 11:25). Jesus himself is raised up to be the "sign" of the covenant. To do zikkaron-remembrance of Jesus is to raise to God the covenant sign, Jesus himself, that God will see, remember and act once again. Israel makes remembrance by reciting the deeds of God which constitute God's covenant in the concrete. Christians make remembrance in exactly the same way, by telling the story of Jesus, God's new deed, in a variety of ways. It is an act of memory (recalling what God has done) and hope (expecting God to act once again). It involves faith-filled proclamation and humble receptivity. In more classic terms, it involves Word and consecration.

(c) Worship

Most generally worship is an act of reverence and honor shown to God. God is acknowledged to be God and given what is due to God alone. Worship may be expressed in public ritual action, or it may simply manifest itself in ordinary human deeds that flow from this inner attitude of reverence and respect. Public worship that does not spring from and express this inner attitude is empty and vain.

Throughout the OT God claims worship from Israel. "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. You shall have no other gods before me" (Deut 5:6-7). God's claim is not for ritual deeds, but for love: "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord; and you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might" (Deut 6:5-5). The prophets decried religious ritual that lacked this inner love (e.g., Isa 1:12-17) and reminded Israel again and again that God's desire was to claim the human heart. "If you are willing and obedient, you shall eat the good of the land; but if you refuse and rebel, you shall be devoured" (Isa 1:19-20).

The NT names Jesus' stance before God as obedience (Phil 2:8; Heb 10:7), the giving over of his whole life to Abba's lead. It was obedience fulfilled in his death on the cross. This giving over of oneself to God, which Paul calls spiritual sacrifice (Rom 12:1-2), is likewise enjoined upon all Christians. Worship, sacrifice and obedience all signify the same human act, generous giving of oneself to the claims of God.

The eucharist is enacted in worship of God. "It is the culminating action whereby God sanctifies the world in Christ and men (sic) worship the Father as they adore him through Christ the Son of God" (G.I.R.M., chap. 1, 1). Eucharist is an action of the assembled church bringing to expression Christ's own stance before Abba (S.C., 2). It is a ritual act that is true worship only when those who enact it express in ritual form an inner movement of the heart. Christians make their own Christ's obedient offering of himself and bring this to expression in a variety of ways (creed, intercession and especially the presentation of gifts). This inner attitude of reverence, honor, willingness and obedient giving over of one's life to God is the true meaning of the classic term offering or offertory.

(d) Communion

Communion is relationship, a unity and harmony among people. Paul uses the word koinonia for the Lord's supper to signify a double relationship: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a participation in the body of Christ?" (1 Cor 10:16). The cup is the covenant; koinonia is harmony and relationship with the God who makes covenant. The bread is the body; koinonia is harmony and relationship with the body, i.e., with Christ who is head and with all who are members. The meal establishes relationship among those who eat and with him whose body is eaten. The meal berakoth establishes relationship with the God who is blessed and praised.

The communion of eucharist is established and brought about by God. It is God's rules that govern relationships in the body of Christ. In Christ "there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28). It is thus essential in the doing of eucharist that God's agenda first be proclaimed (word, memory) and that the human heart be given over to him who is proclaimed (offering, offertory). God will act upon that which is given over to transform it "according to the working of his great might which he accomplished in Christ when he raised him from the dead" (Eph 1:20) (consecration, hope), and when the heart is transformed love (koinonia, communion) is established. The classic movement of word, offertory, consecration and communion which is rooted in remembrance, worship and koinonia thus spells out the inner dynamic of the eucharistic action and allows a people to join with Christ in that act by which "God is perfectly glorified and men (sic) are sanctified" (S.C., 7).

Eucharistic Faith

We turn now to consider the major ingredients of eucharistic faith. We consider here five elements of this faith: (a) the ecclesial nature of the eucharist; (b) the institution of eucharist by Christ; (c) the presence of Christ in the eucharist; (d) the sacrificial nature of the eucharist; and (e) the eucharist as eschatological pledge.

(a) Ecclesial Nature of the Eucharist

Vatican II reversed the medieval shift that sacerdotalized the eucharist and made the priest its only human agent. As a liturgical act it is carried out by Christ the priest and his body which is the church (S.C., 7); it is an action of Christ and the people of God hierarchically ordered (G.I.R.M., chap. 1, 1). In this as in all liturgical acts the faithful express the mystery of Christ which is at the same time the true nature of the church (S.C., 2). Because the whole church assembled is its primary human agent, eucharist is able to build up the church and transform the people into a temple of the Lord (S.C., 2). People are affected by what they do. It is for this reason that the constitution enjoins that, in renewing the liturgy, "the full and active participation by all the people is the aim to be considered above all else" (S.C., 14).

This restoration of the eucharist as an act of the whole church is most noticeable in the prayers that accompany the preparation of gifts. Where once the priest said, "Accept . . . this spotless host which I . . . offer unto you," he now says, "Blessed are you . . . we have these gifts to offer." There is a corresponding shift in the ordination rite for presbyters. Where once the bishop said to the new priest, "Receive the power to offer sacrifice for the living and the dead," he now says, "Receive the gifts from the people to be offered to God." The presiding priest acts together with the people; he does not act in their stead.

(b) Institution of Eucharist by Christ

Vatican II affirmed again the age-old confession of faith that "at the Last Supper, on the night when he was betrayed, our Savior instituted the eucharistic sacrifice of his body and blood" (S.C., 47). For centuries this statement has been taken to be both a theological statement, naming Jesus himself as the source and origin of every Christian eucharist, and a historical statement, identifying the Supper itself as the originating moment when Jesus altered the familiar Passover meal ("This is my body; this is my blood") and commanded his disciples to imitate this in the future in remembrance of him. This is remembrance-memoria as described above.

The statement still stands as a theological statement. It can no longer stand, however, as a strictly historical statement for two reasons: (a) the challenge of biblical scholarship which has identified the Supper narratives as liturgical formularies and not historical chronologies, with some doubt cast whether the "command formularies" are original words of Jesus; and, (b) the challenge of liturgical scholarship which has recognized the gradual evolution of Christian eucharist from Jewish patterns of faith and prayer. The radical newness of the eucharist remains, as does its origin in Jesus Christ. But the origin cannot be explained by a literal historical reading of the Last Supper narratives. Since the eucharist is enacted in remembrance of Jesus, and not specifically of the Last Supper, what is needed is to draw first the connection between Jesus and the eucharist and only then the connection between eucharist and the Last Supper event.

The original sense of remembrance, whether or not the "command formularies" are traceable to Jesus, is zikkaron, not memoria. Eucharist as remembrance has to do with the covenant of God, with Jesus as sign of that covenant, and with the expectation that God will remember his covenant and include those who do eucharist in its saving grasp. To understand the link between Jesus and the eucharist it is necessary to understand the link between event and remembrance of the event.

The relationship between the exodus (event) and passover (remembrance) provides the needed insight. It is not in the first instance a relationship of ritual to ritual. It is rather a relationship based on an inner dynamic which the ritual expresses. The exodus story tells of the initiative of God (God's agenda) calling forth obedient response from the people (sacrifice, expressed in the slaughter of the lamb). It tells further of God's deliverance (blood on the doorposts, the "sign" of covenant) and the formation of a covenant people (eating of the lamb). Passover does not follow the ritual detail of the exodus event. It does, however, bring forward the same fourfold inner dynamic. The story is told (God's agenda), the lamb is slain (obedience of the people), the blood is poured out (sign of the covenant) and the people are included in the covenant (the Passover meal).

The death of Jesus was understood in terms of exodus-passover. Jesus is named the pasch, the lamb whose life, sealed by his death, is obedient sacrifice to God. For this God exalts him (deliverance) and makes him "first born," the head of a new people, the church. A new covenant is established; a new sign of covenant given; a new people of covenant formed. Jesus' life, death and resurrection becomes the new event which summons forth remembrance.

Eucharist is not designed to mimic Jesus' life, nor indeed any particular part of it. It is designed to express (within a range of proper expressions) the mystery of Christ (S.C., 2): his life, death, resurrection and exaltation. It is designed to express his role as the "first born," the head and founder of the new covenant people. It is designed to be zikkaron of the mystery of Christ. As in his life, so in eucharist, God's agenda is primary (proclamation of the word). As in his life, so in eucharist, the human heart is raised in obedient surrender (offertory). As in his life, so in eucharist, God remembers and acts to transform all that is placed with Christ (consecration). And as from his life, so from the eucharist, the new people who become Christ's body (communion) are formed. The full mystery of Christ, lived first in his own life and given expression again and again in the eucharist, is the event which eucharist remembers, the event which brings the eucharist into being.

The originating event of the first eucharist, and of every eucharist, is the paschal mystery itself. Jesus institutes the eucharist by passing through it, and by himself becoming the event that generates remembrance. One could say he instituted it at the Supper, for there he joined his life and impending death to the mystery of God's covenant which Passover proclaimed. One could also say he instituted it on the cross, or in the resurrection, or with the sending of the Spirit. All are equally true, for all are key moments in the one paschal mystery which Jesus himself became, the one paschal mystery which eucharist remembers. No single event provides the whole of it, and certainly no single event provides ritual detail for enacting the eucharist. Only the mystery as a whole, with its inner dynamic of obedient surrender (offertory) to God (Word) in a death that is transformed (consecration) into a life destined for and shared with all (communion), can provide the fullness of the eucharist, the fullness of remembrance.

(c) The Presence of Christ

Through most of its history, the question of Christ's presence in the eucharist has been focussed on the consecrated bread and wine. Vatican II broadened the focus to be first on the whole eucharistic action, and then within it, to include four distinct modes of Christ's presence: word, presiding priest, bread and wine, and assembly. It did not by this diminish attention to be given to the bread and wine as Christ's body and blood. Rather it provided the proper context for this particular mode of Christ's presence to be properly understood.

Vatican II advanced the question in one very significant way. It named the purpose of Christ's presence among us. His primary reason is not that he be adored or attended to. He is present pro nobis, on our behalf. His primary purpose is to associate the people of the church with himself "in this great work in which God is perfectly glorified and men are sanctified" (S.C., 7). His presence is an active presence, to gather us into his worship of Abba and to be for us the agent of our salvation. To carry out his purpose more than one mode of presence is required.

In each of the modes of Christ's presence his presence is real. The special notice that continues to be given to his presence under the form of bread and wine is not meant to imply otherwise. "This presence of Christ under the species is called (real) not in an exclusive sense, as if the other kinds of presence were not real, but par excellence" (Eucharisticum mysterium, chap. 1, E). There is only one Christ who is present in the eucharist. His presence is real. Each mode of his presence is ordered to serve his presence and his purpose in its own particular way.

The four modes of Christ's presence are related within the total dynamic of the eucharistic action, and in fact are related to the four inner movements that constitute the eucharist as zikkaron-remembrance. His presence in the word corresponds to the liturgy of the word: he is present in this form to speak to our hearts ("it is he himself who speaks when the holy scriptures are read"). His presence in the presiding minister is to be the primary agent in the sacramental act ("when anybody baptizes it is really Christ who baptizes"). His presence in the assembly ("where two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst of them") is to constitute this assembly as his body ("the head and his members"). And his presence in the eucharistic food is to be and do what food does: to nourish and to unite.

Each mode of Christ's presence involves a different human dynamic. Word involves listening; it is only by listening that Christ's presence will be recognized. The presider embodies the Christ who bids welcome, gathers together, and invites into his own prayer. It is only by following that lead, by being welcomed, by being gathered and by entering into Christ's prayer that Christ's presence will be recognized. The food most tangibly presents Christ as the agent of human transformation and as the source of Christian unity. It is only by reverencing this bit of creation transformed, by allowing it to announce the destiny of all human life and creation, and by eating and drinking in a common meal that Christ's presence in food will be recognized. And the assembly represents the continued incarnation of Christ whose mission remains to enter and transform human life, not to stand apart from it. Only as life is in fact transformed, and reverenced by each in each other, will Christ's presence be recognized. These four modes of Christ's presence cannot be reduced to or conflated into one; neither can the four modes of interaction with Christ be reduced, conflated or confused.

The term transubstantiation was called upon in Catholic theology to affirm an ontological change in the bread and wine, and not merely a change in its noetic structure. In the years immediately preceding Vatican II attempts were made to translate the term itself into categories of contemporary phenomenology. Words such as transignification (new meaning) and transfinalization (new purpose) were explored (see, Powers, chap. 4; Schillebeeckx, chap. II), though finally recognized as inadequate (Paul VI, Mysterium fidei, 1965). Both meaning and purpose would be vitiated if the reality itself were not radically transformed. As the focus of Christ's presence broadens to include word, priest and assembly, the ontological insight into the consecrated bread and wine needs to be directed to these as well. In fact, however, the theological tradition has long spoken of ontological transformation in regard to these others. With word it has spoken of "inspiration." With both baptism and orders it has employed the elusive term "character." These need to be woven into a eucharistic theology that proclaims word, priest and assembly as modes of Christ's real presence.

Reflection on the presence of Christ in the eucharist needs to go forward in three directions. The first will recognize that the presence of Christ is a personal presence, and that his primary appeal is to the human heart. The transformation he desires is conversion of heart. Reflection on Christ's presence must include the process of conversion as the primary noetic structure of this confession of faith. The second recognizes that each of the modes of Christ's real presence is nonetheless a symbol that mediates Christ. Christ is never experienced immediately. Reflection on Christ's presence must move beyond the opposition between "symbolic" and "real" and formulate a symbolic ontology where "symbolic depth," which constitutes a symbol to be symbol, is in some way transformed into Christ. The final direction, related to this second, concerns not so much the question, "how is Christ present," as "how do we know Christ present?" How do we engage the symbols that mediate him in order to meet him? This recognizes that the confession of Christ's presence in the eucharist is, finally, not a statement of a "fact" to be proven, but the announcement of a "person" who is to be met.

(d) Sacrificial Nature of the Eucharist

The major significance of Vatican II in regard to eucharistic sacrifice has been not so much to advance the question with new insight as to speak of it once again in biblical and patristic imagery. By so doing the council has reversed most if not all of the medieval shifts that severely restricted, and at times distorted, the meaning of this confession of faith. Gone is the view of eucharistic sacrifice as an objective "thing" whose effects can be measured in mechanistic terms of merit and satisfaction for sin. Gone too is the consignment of sacrificial offering to the priest alone acting as surrogate agent for the faithful. The primary image of the eucharistic sacrifice set forth in Sacro-sanctum concilium is of Christ the priest associating the church with himself both in his worship of the Father and in his saving act for the world (S.C., 7). And the primary language of eucharistic effectiveness is focused on the signs and symbols of the eucharist itself. "The liturgy, then, is rightly seen as an exercise of the priestly office of Jesus Christ. It involves the presentation of man's sanctification under the guise of signs perceptible by the senses and its accomplishment in ways appropriate to each of these signs" (ibid.).

The eucharistic sacrifice is an action of Jesus Christ. The once for all sacrifice of the cross is neither repeated nor augmented, as if it were insufficient in itself. The proper language is the language of zikkaron-remembrance: the action of Christ on the cross is remembered. By words, symbols, actions and interactions each new eucharistic assembly narrates the deed of God of which the cross is an essential constitutive element. The once-for-all gift of Christ to Abba for the salvation of the world is, by narrative, made present to God, that God will remember, and to the assembly, that men and women be drawn into it. The language of a "reified" sacrifice employed in the past inevitably gave rise to the Reformation dilemma where it seemed at least that multiple sacrifices (the cross of Christ plus the sacrifices of the church) were being offered. The language of the council avoids this. It speaks rather of the once-for-all sacrifice of the cross being continuously brought to expression in order that all may be included directly in its saving power.

Eucharistic sacrifice is first and foremost a function of Christ's presence. He is present in zikkaron-remembrance as God's deed, and therefore always actively related both to God in worship and to women and men as their source of salvation. The language of sacrifice gives specific nuance to his presence, with the purpose of his presence, as Vatican II names it, providing the link. As a specific nuance of the entire paschal mystery of Christ which names the process of human salvation and sanctification, the sacrifice of the eucharist presents Christ and his cross "under the guise of signs perceptible by the senses and its accomplishment in ways appropriate to each of these signs" (S.C., 7).

Vatican II sheds fresh light on the often misunderstood Catholic position that sacraments achieve their effect ex opere operato (by the action being carried out). In a more mechanistic framework, and in a liturgical environment where only the priest was agent and all else were passive recipients of grace, eucharistic sacrifice too easily appeared as a human work that put controls upon grace and "worked its salvation" automatically, almost magically. In fact, however, there is nothing automatic or magical about this. This classic position says little more than that people are affected by what they do, and when people faithfully enact the saving actions of Christ the effect it has on them is to bring about their salvation. The classic position required two things: that the priest do what the church intends (as guided and controlled by the Christ-mystery itself) and that people put no obstacle in the way (positively, that they be open to what is done). With the eucharist restored as an action of the entire assembly which brings Christ's full saving action to expression through word, offertory, consecration and communion, actions with their own dynamic and their own appropriate effect on those who carry them out, the automatic and the magical give way once again to the appeal of grace. The dynamic of the eucharistic signs, symbols, actions and interactions makes an appeal to freedom, and in freedom summons the believer to surrender to God's action in his/her life. Word calls forth the surrender of one's life to the deed of God that is proclaimed. Meal calls forth commitment to one's fellow that is reconciliation, the healing of division, the victory over sin. Word and meal together provide the dynamic by which eucharist is true sacrifice, the one sacrifice of Christ into which the assembly is called and to which the assembly is united.

An irony presents itself at this point. Though the language of Catholic teaching on eucharistic sacrifice, at least since the Council of Trent, insisted that the sacrifice was propitiatory for the living and the dead, popular piety and liturgical praxis both seemed to direct its effectiveness primarily to those who were not assembled rather than to those who were. Masses were offered for "intentions," most frequently for the dead. People requested that the Mass be offered, and accompanied their request with a financial offering (stipend), but since the people did not otherwise participate in the eucharistic act, the language was scarce as to how they themselves were saved by the sacrifice. The language restored by Vatican II reverses this. It is easier to name how those who do eucharist, the actual enacting assembly, are saved by the doing than to explain the effectiveness of the sacrifice for those not present.

What was lost in the Middle Ages, and needs to be re-captured in the contemporary church, is a strong sense of the prayer of intercession. The medieval shift in christological imagery removed Christ from the midst of the assembly and located him "at the right hand of the Father." In place of Christ, the church's primary intercessor before God, the saints in heaven and the priest on earth were given a mediatorial role, to intercede with God and Christ. Ordinary Christians, it came to be believed, had little or no power directly to approach God. They could do so only by asking the priest or by asking the saints to do so for them. Vatican II restored the christological image whereby Christ, in the midst of the assembly and associating the church with his own prayer, is once again primary intercessor. Yet it is the ecclesial Christ, the head with his members, that is envisioned. A strong sense of intercession does not involve Christians asking anyone to intercede for them, not priest, not saints, not even Christ himself. A strong sense of intercession implies that Christians need only name those for whom they pray in the midst of the eucharistic action, and their prayer, by the very fact that it is made within the eucharist, becomes Christ's own prayer to Abba. The effectiveness of the eucharist as propitiatory for both the living and the dead depends on this strong sense of intercession. To name someone in prayer in the eucharistic assembly is the highest priestly act of the church. When someone is thus named, even if they be physically absent from the assembly, they are nonetheless brought into its power as the sacrifice of Jesus Christ.

(e) Eucharist as Eschatological Pledge

The eschatological dimension of the eucharist is, for the Western churches at least, the most obscure and least understood dimension of eucharistic faith. Some of the Eastern churches (e.g., Chaldean, Maronite) have preserved it more forcefully. In the West it appears in the liturgies of Christian burial, in the time immediately before Advent and in Advent itself. It has been passed on in the religious imagination by way of the hymn attributed to Thomas Aquinas, O Sacrum Convivium, where eucharist is called a "pledge of future glory." Beyond that the eschatological dimension of the eucharist lingers in the popular imagination as a banquet somewhere in the distant future which will be the reward of all who have lived faithful Christian lives.

Vatican II brought this eschatological dimension into fresh focus both theologically and liturgically. Theologically it restored the understanding of the church on earth as a "pilgrim people" totally ordered to the Kingdom of God which will be fully established at the eschaton (L.G., 14). And it restored the eucharist as a sacrament of "journey," by recapturing it as the sacrament of ongoing Christian initiation (R.C.I.A.). Liturgically the conciliar reform restored the invocation for unity as a major and explicit hope (epiclesis), a hope that expresses as well yearning and longing for all to be gathered into one. The reform also restored the sense of "waiting" which is at the heart of eschatological prayer: "We wait in joyful hope for the coming of our savior Jesus Christ" (embolism of Lord's prayer). It offered explicit images of "looking forward": "Then, in your kingdom set free from the corruption of sin and death, we shall sing your glory with every creature" (E.P., III). And it gave sharp notice to the Holy Spirit as the agent of God's unfinished work by naming the Spirit as the one sent "to complete his work on earth and bring us the fullness of grace" (E.P., IV).

It is important to understand how eschatological imagery operates in Christian faith and prayer. These images do in fact invite a "forward look," but it is a forward look for the sake of the present. They do not present a future that will come about of its own accord provided we simply wait long enough. Rather they name the "incompleteness" of things in order to generate yearning and longing for completeness. These images properly serve Christian prayer by offering an image of the future toward which people may freely choose. The yearning and desire that emerges when the vision of completeness meets the experience of incompleteness provides the motive for the choice.

Properly understood the eucharist is an eschatological event. It contains within itself both a vision of completeness and an experience of incompleteness which ought to evoke restless yearning as well as simple thanksgiving. The meal itself celebrates and enacts a union of Christians with Christ and with each other already achieved. This is and must be the experiential base for both thanksgiving and hope. Yet this same union is likewise announced as the proper destiny desired by God of all humanity: "And I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself" (Jn 12:32). The union that is already achieved exposes as well the union not yet achieved, and invites and challenges all in the assembly to choose beyond what is into the "not yet," toward a greater and greater realization of that future which the eucharist holds out to them.

Something similar can be said about "transubstantiation" which is finally an eschatological term. The context for its intelligibility for faith is the transformation of all creation into Christ (Rom 8:18-25). The reason that the Scholastics were so intent on insuring, however else the term be understood, that creation not be violated in the consecration of bread and wine is that bread and wine, as bits of creation converted into Christ, announce the destiny of all creation, and serve as sacrament (sacramentum, seal) of that full transformation yet to be realized. Part of the reverence due to the eucharistic food must include yearning for the day, and choosing towards the day, when this transformation of all creation into Christ will be brought about.

Eschatological imagery, whether eucharistic or not, cannot be seen as prediction of the future. As creation cannot be violated by God's act, neither can human freedom. Images provide "vision" and vision obviates the need for hope. "Now hope that is seen is not hope . . . we hope for what we do not see" (Rom 8:24-25). The images do not provide a vision of the outcome, some "thing" that we might hope in. They carry instead the promise or pledge of God spoken in covenant when God raised Jesus from the dead. They provide some "one" in whom we hope. To speak of the eucharist as eschatological pledge finally has little or nothing to do with a banquet somewhere off in the distant future. It names the covenant of God and draws us to the God of covenant in whom alone with Christ we place our trust.

The eschatological dimension of eucharistic faith is not unrelated to the presence of Christ. In fact it is a function of Christ's presence. While the theology of presence insists that Christ's presence is real, eschatology reminds us that what is real is only partially realized in human life and human history. It sets the fullness of the mystery of Christ, all men and women united to him and all creation transformed into him, as the eschatological project. It invites and challenges people to choose toward its realization in history, provides yearning and desire to motivate the choice, and holds up the covenant of God and the God of covenant as the one who is both the source and the object of all Christian hope. The Christ who is present, and present with a purpose, himself yearns for the fulfillment in God's kingdom of his life, death and resurrection, of which eucharist is both remembrance and pledge. He is present in the eucharist to bring this about.

EUCCHARISTIC CHAPEL

The term eucharistic chapel is used by the Roman Catholic tradition to designate a place for Christian worship which reserves some of the eucharistic bread in a place of honor.

In the Christian tradition, chapels originated as special rooms or buildings set aside for prayer. Christian ecclesial and political leaders built these chapels. With the increasing reverence for the exemplary lives of the Christian martyrs, shrines/chapels were erected, and placed under the auspices of the local bishop by the 5th century councils. Yet it was not until the increasing popularity of devotion to Christ in the reserved sacrament, especially in the 12th and 13th centuries, that the eucharist was kept in special chapels for adoration.

While reserving some of the eucharistic bread dates back to the patristic period, the purpose for the reservation was broadened in the later centuries. Originally the purpose for reservation was to bring communion (viaticum) to dying Christians and to those who could not worship with the community. Another purpose for the reserved sacrament entered the Christian tradition at a time when the regular reception of communion declined for the laity. One of the distinctive characteristics of late medieval piety was a devotion to the reserved sacrament which expressed itself in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament both in private and in public worship.

By the 16th century, it became customary to place the tabernacle on the altar where the eucharistic action took place. The 1614 Roman Missal prescribed this practice. The Reformers disassociated themselves with the custom, finding this development a medieval accretion which was justified neither in the Bible nor patristic tradition.

In the contemporary liturgical reform stemming from the Second Vatican Council, the Catholic church chose to clarify the primary and original purpose of the reserved eucharist and reemphasize the intimate connection between the action of the eucharistic assembly and the reserved sacrament. Since an altar is a place for action and not reservation, the bishops of the United States have stated that the reserved eucharist be placed in a wall niche, on a pillar or a eucharistic tower rather than on an altar. When possible, the eucharistic chapel should be adjacent to the space for regular Sunday worship. It is hoped that only one altar would be visible to worshippers in order to signify the unity present in Jesus in the church, especially during the one eucharist.

The significance of adoration of the reserved sacrament was reaffirmed and promoted by the Second Vatican Council, though clearly distinguished as secondary and derivative of the primary action of the eucharistic assembly.

The design of the eucharistic chapel should be conducive for quiet prayer. The chapel should provide a contemplative atmosphere which focuses upon the tabernacle. If religious art is used in the eucharistic chapel, care should be exercised so as not to compete with the primary focus upon the tabernacle.

EUCCHARISTIC LITURGY, NAMES FOR THE

The eucharist has had a number of different names reflecting different theological emphases. Some of these names have been used concurrently in Christian history, so our approach here is to take them in alphabetical rather than chronological order. The names to be discussed are: breaking of bread, communion, eucharist, Lord's Supper, Mass, oblation, and sacrament of the altar.

Breaking of Bread. The "breaking of bread" (fractio panis) was the technical name for the eucharist in Acts 2:42, 46; 20:7, 11.

In Judaism the breaking of bread was the ritual tearing of the bread at the beginning of the meal. J. Jeremias argued that the fact that "breaking of bread" refers to the whole eucharistic rite indicates that the eucharist has already become a ritual meal separated from the actual meal (sometimes referred to as the agape). In the Lucan tradition the emphasis in the meal was on the bread. A controverted text in Lk 22:19-20 introduces a second cup in the institution narrative "after supper." The manuscript evidence suggests that this could have been an addition to Luke to bring this institution text into conformity with the other institution texts in the NT. If so, then the sequence of the Last Supper in Lk 22:17-18 is cup-bread, and the interpretative words of Jesus are spoken only over the bread. While this is not the normal eucharistic pattern that emerged in liturgical history, the same sequence can be found in 1 Cor 10:16-17, Didache, 9, and Acts of Thomas, 27. It would have been a standard practice in Jewish meals to use a cup of wine before the bread was broken. There is no reason why such a practice could not have prevailed in Semitic Christianity. This made the breaking and sharing of the bread a stabler and theologically more important part of the meal. As A. Vööbus suggested, the bread became the vehicle of the presence of Christ—"This is my body." After the resurrection, Jesus was recognized by the two disciples at Emmaus "in the breaking of bread" (Lk 24: 28-35).

This action has never been merely utilitarian. Already in 1 Cor 10:16 the action of breaking the bread received a symbolic interpretation: those who share in the broken bread become one body in Christ. Again, Didache 9:4 regarded the broken loaf as a sign of the gathering into one of the children of God. The breaking of bread (fraction) came to have a place in the actions of the developing eucharistic rite. In the Syro-Byzantine and Roman rites the fraction occurred after the Lord's Prayer and before the ministration of holy communion. However, it became the subject of allegorical interpretation during the Middle Ages. A favorite interpretation of the fraction was that it is symbolic of the death of Christ, and the pieces of bread were sometimes arranged in the form of a cross. The theme of the Passion is frequent in the prayers and songs which accompany the fraction in Eastern liturgies.

Because of these allegorical interpretations, the fraction received no place in the Lutheran Mass in the 16th century. In the Reformed celebration of the Lord's Supper, however, the fraction was included in imitation of the actions of Jesus at the Last Supper. A rubric in the 1662 Book of Common Prayer required the fraction to take place during the words of institution in the consecration prayer at the words, "he brake." It was perhaps in reaction to this that Gregory Dix emphasized the fraction as one of the four-fold actions of the eucharist: offertory, thanksgiving, fraction, communion. The popularity of Dix's scheme helped to achieve a place for the fraction in reformed contemporary liturgies.

Communion. The eucharist has been from the beginning a fellowship (koinonia, communio) among Christians and between Christians and their Lord. So important is this aspect of the eucharist that the name "holy communion" has been applied not only to the reception of the sacrament but also to the eucharistic service itself.

Paul develops the idea of communion/fellowship in 1 Cor 10:17: "we being many are one bread, one body; for we all partake of the one bread." There is a connection between the sacramental body and the ecclesial body. In Acts 2:42 the term koinonia occurs in connection with "the breaking of bread." J. Jeremias attempts to distinguish between the koinonia (communion) as the Lord's Supper and "the breaking of bread" as the agape meal, but in the 1st century a distinction between the ritual meal and the actual meal is not easy to maintain. The fellowship idea is also prominent in the Didache and in Justin Martyr. In Justin the eucharist not only includes and unites all the baptized, but those who are not able to be present at the celebration share in the eucharistic elements through the ministry of the deacons (Apology I, 67). The act of receiving communion was from the beginning the chief expression of Christian fellowship. Churches which could practice eucharistic hospitality with one another were in fellowship with one another.

Yngve Brilioth asserted that the idea of the eucharist as the expression of fellowship was weakened during the Middle Ages in the West, when the frequency of reception of holy communion also declined. The recovery of the fellowship aspect of the eucharist, and the emphasis on the frequent reception of holy communion, was one of the most positive and constructive aspects of the Reformation eucharist. The name "holy communion" was applied to the eucharistic liturgy especially in the Anglican and Lutheran traditions. The Council of Trent also urged a more frequent reception of communion, but in post-Tridentine Catholicism this often occurred after Mass. The reforms of the Second Vatican Council again emphasized the reception of communion as a high point of the Mass and underscored the fellowship aspect of the eucharistic celebration.

Eucharist. From about the beginning of the 2nd century the preferred name for the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the Greek writers was eucharistia, or thanksgiving.

The term "eucharist" was applied to the meal liturgy of Christians in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch (Ephesians 3; Philadelphians 4; Smyrnaeans 7, 8); in the Didache 9, 10; and by Justin Martyr (Apology 1, 66). From the 3rd century on it was applied more to the eucharistic prayer than to the eucharistic liturgy. Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine applied the term "eucharist" to the consecrated elements. After Augustine this name dropped out of use in this sense until it was revived by the medieval theologians. In the 20th century the name "eucharist" has again been used to designate the eucharistic liturgy as a whole.

Lord's Supper. In the NT and early Christian literature the term "Lord's Supper" is associated with the eschatological dimension of the eucharistic meal.

Throughout most of Christian history there has been a connection between eucharist and Sunday, between Lord's Supper and Lord's Day. It is the risen Christ who is present at the supper. Paul connects this eucharistic presence with the judgment of Christ (1 Cor 11:17-34). Only those should eat and drink the meal who can withstand eschatological judgment. The selfish behavior of the Corinthians at the supper is turning the Lord's Supper into their own supper; to eat and drink the sacramental elements without discerning the body (i.e. the church) is to become guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. There is a relationship between the ecclesial body and the sacramental body.

As the eschatological dimension of the meal receded, the Lord's Supper became more narrowly identified with the historical Last Supper of Jesus. From the 4th century on, this identification was emphasized by the commemoration of the institution of the Lord's Supper on Maundy Thursday.

The 16th-century Reformers favored the term "Lord's Supper" (Herrenmahl) because of its Pauline association. It became the common name for the eucharist in the Reformed tradition.

Mass. "Mass" became the name of the eucharistic liturgy in the Western church. In the Middle Ages the terms "Mass" and "Lord's Supper" were interchangeable. Thus the eucharistic liturgy in the 1549 Book of Common Prayer is entitled, "The Supper of the Lord and Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass." The name "Mass" was retained in German and Scandinavian Lutheranism as well as in Roman Catholic use.

The name missa derives from the words of dismissal in the Roman rite: Ite missa est. This almost untranslatable phrase is probably as old as the Latin rite itself. It was used to conclude every eucharistic liturgy and finally gave its name to the liturgy as a whole. The name "Mass" can serve to remind us of the mission dimension of the eucharist. The eucharist strengthens Christians for service in the world. Revised contemporary eucharistic liturgies have tended to move as directly as possible from the ministration of communion to the dismissal in order to underscore the relationship between the eucharistic celebration and the mission of God in the world.

Oblation. From the Latin oblatio, a synonym for "offering." This name focuses on the material elements of the bread and wine.

In the first two centuries there was little emphasis on the material gifts. They received greater emphasis in reaction to Gnostic spiritualism. From the 3rd century on, the bread and wine were actually offered in the offertory procession of the faithful. The oblation was expressed in connection with the anamnesis (memores ... offerimus, "remembering ... we offer") already in the Anaphora of Hippolytus (ca. A.D. 215). If "eucharist" was the preferred name for the celebration of the meal in the first two centuries, the terms oblatio or sacrificium were preferred beginning in the 3rd century. This name became more important in the West with the development of the concept of the votive Mass, the eucharist offered for special intentions.

Luther attacked the concept of oblation as a blasphemous reversal of the purpose of the sacrament in The Babylonian Captivity: it changes the direction of the sacrament from God to his people to from the people to God, and thereby obscures the gift of communion. Zwingli more than Luther objected that the oblationary character of the Mass denigrated the uniqueness of Christ's sacrifice. Some Reformers, however, were willing to apply the concept of offering to the disposition of the worshippers. No other issue has divided Western Christianity since the 16th century as much as the concept of eucharistic oblation. This affects the language of eucharistic prayer. The recent translation of the Anaphora of Hippolytus in the Lutheran Book of Worship had to render "we offer to you the bread and the cup" as "we lift this bread and cup before you."

Sacrament of the Altar. This name of the eucharist was used in the Middle Ages and in Luther's catechisms. It draws attention to the meal-character of the eucharist by focusing on the table.

The Latin altare means the place where the sacrifice is offered. This need not imply a stone structure. Indeed, the early Christians used wooden tables. The custom of having stone altars is associated with the celebration of the eucharist on the tombs of the saints, thus linking the concepts of altar and tomb. From the 4th century on, altars were built over the tombs of martyrs or confessors, or else relics of the saints were encapsulated in a cavity in the altar mensa.

At the time of the Reformation many stone altars were destroyed and replaced by wooden tables, especially in the Reformed churches. Lutherans, on the other hand, retained altars and referred to the "sacrament of the altar" to emphasize its meal character. Comparative religious studies in the 20th century have rediscovered the origins of sacrifice in the sacred meal. Sacrifice is an act of thanksgiving, and not just an act of propitiation.

EUCCHARISTIC PRAYERS

The eucharistic prayer is the Christian assembly's Great Thanksgiving over the bread and the cup at the eucharistic liturgy. As such, it is, together with the holy communion, the high point of the Christian sacramental act par excellence, the eucharistic celebration. In its more developed forms, God is praised and thanked, the accomplishments of Jesus Christ are remembered, and God is asked to send the Holy Spirit upon the gifts of bread and wine and upon those who will share them. It is both a table prayer in view of consuming the bread and the wine in community and a liturgical action that expresses and nourishes Christian faith and discipleship.

Theology of the Eucharistic Prayer

Liturgical theological reflection since the early 1970s has attempted to uncover the significance of this prayer as it functions in the Christian assembly. Thus, as a prayer of thanksgiving, the eucharistic prayer underlines God's graciousness toward creation. God is "philanthropos," lover of the human race, who has acted in creation and in history on behalf of people. Most of all in Jesus Christ God has brought salvation to humankind. The assembly therefore acknowledges in praise and thanksgiving what God has accomplished for it.

At the same time, the eucharistic prayer is a prayer of remembrance, of anamnesis. In it God's work in Jesus Christ is recalled. Theologically this recall is understood to manifest the continuing present efficacy of the past acts of Jesus Christ. Thus when the assembly, in obedience to Jesus' command to do the supper in remembrance of him, recalls his death, resurrection, ascension and coming again, the effects of the past acts are made present in the assembly in a context of eschatological anticipation.

As its Greek designation indicates, the eucharistic prayer is also a prayer of offering, an anaphora. In it the assembly recalls the once-for-all offering of Jesus Christ and joins to it in acknowledgment an offering of praise and thanksgiving over the bread and the wine. Like all nourishment, these are gifts from God's creation; yet in this act they become for the assembly the body and blood of Jesus Christ, whose own words at the Last Supper are recalled in the prayer. It is in this way that the community often explicitly expresses its own awareness of being joined to the once-for-all offering of Jesus Christ.

Besides being a prayer of thanksgiving the eucharistic prayer is also a prayer of supplication, in particular that the Holy Spirit might come upon the gifts and upon those who will share in them. From this perspective the thanksgiving and the supplication are intimately joined to one another in view of the eating and drinking of this bread and this wine. Thus, like a home meal grace, the prayer acknowledges that God is the source of all life and holiness, but it also prays that these particular gifts of bread and wine be linked to the bread and the wine over which Jesus spoke his own interpretative words the night before he died. Thus, the supplication is placed in the context of the memorial thanksgiving and the two become complementary components of the eucharistic prayer.

Recalling as it does the reconciliation willed by God and won by Jesus Christ, the prayer has an underlying theme of reconciliation because the assembly is the gathering of those who have been baptized "for the forgiveness of sins." This reconciliation reaches its highest expression in the holy communion, to which the table prayer is intimately bound. The assembly's sharing of the bread and the cup, the signs of Jesus Christ's body broken and his blood poured out for the forgiveness of sins, manifests that the church is a community of reconciliation because it has accepted the reconciliation won for it in Jesus Christ.

Finally, while the acts of thanksgiving and praise, remembrance and offering, and supplication, flow from the trinitarian structure of the prayer, and reconciliation is a consequence of the prayer, the whole prayer is seen to function as a prayer of sanctification or consecration. By it the priestly people finds itself renewed in its baptismal commitment, and the gifts of bread and wine become for the assembly the body and blood of Jesus Christ, whose consumption unites the communicants more deeply in the body of Christ, the church. This consecration is intensely manifested in the recitation of the Lord's words and in the petition that God send the Holy Spirit upon the gifts and upon those who receive them.

In the various eucharistic prayers, one theme may receive more emphasis than another. Thus, before the reform of the Second Vatican Council, the particular eucharistic prayer called "the Roman canon" was experienced by Roman Catholics especially as a prayer in which the consecration took place and the sacrifice was made. It is no exaggeration to say that, in the churches of the West, the perception of the richness of the eucharistic prayer was severely restricted. In general there was only the Roman canon, vernacular eucharistic prayers in some Protestant churches that had "corrected" the canon, but themselves needing correction, or the reading from the NT of the account of the institution with or without surrounding prayers. For collections of eucharistic prayers in English, see Jasper and Cuming for early and reformed eucharistic prayers, and Thurian and Wainwright for contemporary eucharistic prayer texts in addition to a selection of ancient ones.

Reform of the Eucharistic Prayer

Although the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy had not spoken of the reform of the eucharistic prayer, members of Coetus X of the Consilium (the Congregation of Rites) met to discuss the possibility of reworking the Roman canon. This quickly led to a discussion and proposals for creating new eucharistic prayers by returning to the sources. On May 23, 1968, the Consilium announced Paul VI's approval of three new eucharistic prayers together with eight new prefaces for the Roman rite. On November 1, 1974, the Congregation for Worship presented on an experimental basis two prayers for Masses of reconciliation and three prayers for Masses with children. Meanwhile the corpus of prefaces in the Roman Missal had increased to more than eighty. Thus the Roman church enriched its eucharistic euchology by adopting the practice of the Eastern churches of having a number of eucharistic prayers rather than a single one and by adding considerably to its own practice of having variable prefaces for the Roman canon and for Eucharistic Prayers II and III. On all this, see Bugnini for the Consilium background and Mazza for the history and theology of the prayers.

The creation of the new Roman eucharistic prayers was greatly influenced by the anaphoras found in the liturgies of the Eastern churches. In the Byzantine rite since the 6th century, the eucharistic prayer was called simply the anaphora. The anaphoras in the Eastern churches are divided into three large families: the Antiochene or Greek West Syrian, the Alexandrian or Egyptian, and the Syriac East Syrian or Chaldean. The division into families results from the placement of the component parts in the anaphora.

In the collection of Hänggi and Pahl, the place assigned to the intercessions in the anaphora is the distinguishing criterion in this system. In the Antiochene family, the intercessions are found after the single epiclesis toward the end of the prayer; in the Alexandrian family they occur at the beginning of the prayer before the sanctus; and in the East Syrian family they come before the epiclesis at the end of the prayer. Thus the arrangement of the component parts of the classically developed anaphoras for the Antiochene family are: dialogue, praise and thanksgiving, introduction to the sanctus, sanctus, post-sanctus prayer, institution narrative, anamnesis, epiclesis, intercessions and doxology. In the Alexandrian family, they run: dialogue, praise and thanksgiving, intercessions, introduction to the sanctus, sanctus, post-sanctus epicletic prayer, institution narrative, anamnesis, a second epiclesis and doxology. In the East Syrian family, the arrangement is: dialogue, praise and thanksgiving, introduction to the sanctus, sanctus, post-sanctus prayer, institution narrative (may be lacking in the Anaphora of Addai and Mari), anamnesis, intercessions, epiclesis and doxology.

The Roman canon, sui generis, shows affinities with the Alexandrian structure. The new eucharistic prayers of the Roman rite, however, follow the Antiochene structure, since they group the intercessions just before the doxology. At the same time they retain an Alexandrian structure by the presence of two epicleses, one before and one after the institution narrative. The principal model for the new Roman prayers was the Egyptian anaphora of Basil or Alexandrian Basil, which follows the Antiochene structure. An adaptation of the spirit and structure of this prayer became Roman Eucharistic Prayer IV. It is meant to illustrate a fully developed eucharistic prayer and is recommended for use on especially solemn occasions. It is particularly noteworthy for its preface which praises God for creation and for its long post-sanctus prayer that relates the history of salvation. For a discussion of the principal Byzantine anaphoras of Basil and John Chrysostom, see Schulz.

For its Eucharistic Prayer II, the Roman rite adapted the eucharistic prayer of Hippolytus from the Apostolic Tradition (c. 215) to its modified Antiochene structure. This meant that to Hippolytus' original prayer was added a sanctus, a post-sanctus transition to an epiclesis on the gifts, and intercessions. At the same time some of the original wording of Hippolytus was also changed. Coetus X thought that simply to adopt the prayer of Hippolytus would be an act of archaism; however, in 1983, I.C.E.L.'s subcommittee on eucharistic prayers, noting the prayer's inclusion in the revised service books of several churches, prepared a translation of it for possible eventual adoption by its members.

Eucharistic Prayer III appears to be modelled on the Roman canon, insofar as it has no preface of its own, but it is also adapted to the Antiochene structure with explicit epicleses in the Alexandrian places. At the same time, its creators were conscious of operating with the freedom of Gallican and Mozarabic models, from which certain ideas and phrases were woven into the new prayer. This extraordinary explanation of the origins of Eucharistic Prayer III is perhaps an extreme case of adaptation, but it is illustrative of much contemporary adaptation of eucharistic prayers, and even that of the early church, in a period of renewal, creativity and liturgical borrowing.

This recovery of the eucharistic prayer was part of the liturgical agenda of many of the Western churches. The phenomenon of intense liturgical creativity outside parish settings, in small groups, in homes or in colleges and universities led to an explosion of unofficial eucharistic prayers that were filling the gap while waiting for official eucharistic prayers, and even rivaling them when they finally appeared. Thus in the 1960s there was a whole climate of creativity and renewal, some of whose results have been studied by the present author.

In the non-Roman Western churches, liturgical committees were assembled to create eucharistic prayers. Many of these churches were heirs to the 16th century abolition of the Roman canon in favor of a communion service marked by exhortations, admonitions, and doctrinal explanation. In those cases where there was a eucharistic prayer in place, revision committees expressed some dissatisfaction with it either in terms of its language, its theological stresses or omissions, or its structure.

In the United States, the reforms of the Episcopal, Lutheran, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches each have their own story to tell. But it is a story that is repeated in Canada, in the worldwide Anglican communion, and in the Reformed churches on the European continent. While many options taken by these churches are similar to the Roman ones, others are quite different. For example, many favor the pure Antiochene structure over the Alexandrian modified structure of the Roman rite, or they have prayers with various structures. The Episcopal church's eucharistic prayers, Forms 1 and 2 for use on certain occasions, allow for some freedom of improvisation unusual in churches that favor fixed texts. In many Protestant churches, alongside new eucharistic prayers are options that permit the communion service structure of the Reformation liturgies. In some churches this remains the preferred form. But where eucharistic prayers have been revised or introduced, traditional prayers are found alongside those that attempt to achieve a more contemporary idiom with emphasis on contemporary theological themes expressed in inclusive language. In the official committees, battles have been fought over the inclusions of an offering or offering language in the prayer, of an epiclesis and intercessions, of certain traditional formulas and even of single words. For the texts of the eucharistic prayers of the worldwide Anglican communion, see Buchanan. For a study of the composition of American eucharistic prayers, see Senn.

Parts of the Eucharistic Prayer

In his Apostolic Constitution introducing the Roman missal, Paul VI had called the addition of new eucharistic prayers to the Roman rite the chief innovation of its reform and urged their explanation to the faithful. On June 7, 1968, the Consilium issued statements on the structure and elements that make up the eucharistic prayer, and section 55 of the General Instruction to the Roman Missal listed the constitutive parts of the prayer. These parts, taken in the Antiochene order, may be briefly described.

The eucharistic prayer begins with an opening dialogue that serves to unite presider and assembly in offering its Great Thanksgiving with their hearts lifted up. Thus at the outset the prayer is seen as the assembly's prayer and not simply that of the presider, who proclaims it in the assembly's name. The acclamations throughout the prayer, here in the dialogue, at the sanctus, at the anamnesis, either before or after it, and at the "Amen" at the end of the prayer, all show that the prayer belongs to the entire assembly. In fact, a characteristic of many new eucharistic prayers is to increase the congregational participation by means of acclamations. This development is seen in some of the new eucharistic prayers of nearly all churches. In the Roman rite it is found particularly in children's Eucharistic Prayer II.

In continuation of the assembly's response to the presider's invitation to give thanks, the preface follows with motives for giving thanks. In the invariable prefaces of the anaphoras, the focus is principally on God and what God has accomplished on behalf of humankind in creation and redemption. In the variable other Western churches, some aspect of the mystery of faith is generally singled out. Its content is influenced by the liturgical season, feast day, or particular ritual celebration. When the children's eucharistic prayers are used, motives for thanksgiving may be invited from the children before beginning the dialogue.

It has become traditional in the eucharistic prayer to link the praise of God by the assembly to that of the heavenly liturgy so that with one voice all creation praises God. The Sanctus, adapted from Isaiah 6, and its introduction, which in some ancient prayers was heavily influenced by Ezek 10, Dan 7:10, and Rev 4:8-10, form a liturgical unit. To the Sanctus was added an acclamation from Mt 21:9, a psalmic adaptation to Jesus Christ, "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord."

After this Sanctus/Benedictus, the prayer traditionally develops, however briefly, some image from it such as the holiness of God or the idea of fullness. In many contemporary prayers this leads into a remembrance of the role of God and Jesus Christ in the history of salvation. In Eucharistic Prayers II and III, it serves principally as a transition to the first epiclesis upon the gifts of bread and wine that they might become the body and blood of Christ.

The institution narrative follows and is thereby made part of the prayer. In the liturgical tradition this narrative is often worded differently from any one of its forms in the NT. By its very structure, length and content, which recalls not only what Jesus did at the Last Supper but what the assembly is doing right now, it draws attention to itself and is often accompanied by ritual gestures and, as in some of the anaphoras, with acclamations of Amen.

In many liturgies a memorial acclamation follows the institution narrative, but it also takes place after the anamnesis, where it may make a transition to the intercessions. The acclamation in the Roman prayers is addressed to Christ, whereas in the tradition, with some exceptions, the entire eucharistic prayer is addressed to the Father.

The anamnesis or memorial prayer recapitulates what Jesus has accomplished for us. It is made as a response to the command of Jesus that the meal be done in remembrance of him. The assembly makes explicit this remembrance by referring, among other events, to Jesus' life, death, resurrection, ascension and promise to come again. In addition to the heightened eschatological sense that may be developed at this point, many eucharistic prayers join an offering to the remembrance. This makes explicit the assembly's sense of being united to the redemptive act of Christ. Thus, the assembly in this context of dynamic relationships offers its gifts of bread and wine, the symbols of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, to God.

In typical Antiochene anaphoras this leads to the petition that the Holy Spirit come upon the gifts and upon those who will communicate in them. Since the Roman prayers have already petitioned the descent of the Spirit upon the gifts earlier in the prayer, they limit themselves here to a petition for unity among the worshippers who will participate in the gifts.

For most churches the intercessions follow. In certain anaphoras these are quite developed, whereas in some contemporary Protestant eucharistic prayers they are omitted since they are seen as duplicating the prayer of the faithful. In the new Roman prayers, as in the Roman canon, there are not only intercessions for the living and the dead but expressions of ecclesial communion across time and space. The Roman canon had intercessions both before and after the institution narrative.

The eucharistic prayer closes with a doxology, a brief prayer of praise, which in the Roman prayers is worded so as to emphasize the mediatorial role of Jesus Christ within the trinitarian framework, whereas in other anaphoras it is worded to present Father, Son and Holy Spirit in the traditional order. The whole prayer thus returns to the praise of God and brings into focus its very trinitarian structure. The congregation ratifies the prayer with its Amen, often called the "Great Amen" since it follows the Great Thanksgiving.

This Antiochene outline has been fleshed out by the creators of contemporary eucharistic prayers, who by their theological choices modify the language of the component parts to give expression to their faith. At present, however, it is this structure and its component parts that have led to a remarkable convergence in the reform of eucharistic prayers throughout the world.

Scholarly Research

Research into the history and variety of eucharistic prayers has played and continues to play a remarkable role in the recovery of the eucharistic prayer in the contemporary period. In recent times researchers have studied the Jewish blessing or berakah as the ancestor of the Christian eucharistic prayer while others have concentrated on Jewish verb forms related to thanksgiving. The Jewish table grace or birkat ha-mazon has been proposed as the probable place of origin of the Christian table prayer. The structure of this Jewish prayer, of which we have no extant fixed form before the destruction of the temple, has been reconstructed into a blessing of God, followed by a thanksgiving and a supplication. Scholars have compared this reconstructed prayer with later Christian prayers, most notably those of the Didache (c. 100, but may be earlier). This has led to a consideration of bi-partite and tri-partite structures of table prayers, the former divided into thanksgiving and supplication and the latter into praise, thanksgiving and supplication. For all this see, Heinemann, Ledogar, and Talley. Since the earliest prayers were improvised, that is, were not written fixed prayers, but enjoyed variation according to circumstances and the oratorical gifts of the speaker, while no doubt following a known outline and a certain traditional vocabulary, there is very little evidence on which to base firm conclusions about the form and content of the early eucharistic prayers. Bouley has studied extensively the movement from oral improvisation to written texts.

Other research has attempted to discover how the institution narrative entered the prayer. In the prayer of Hippolytus it is in the thanksgiving part, whereas in the Roman canon it is in the supplicatory part. In other cases it is suggested it may have stood outside the prayer or it may not have been present at all except by some reference to the Last Supper. It may have entered alone or together with the anamnesis. In any event, when and where it entered a particular prayer, it generally had effects on the theological emphasis of the prayer and could reshape some of the elements preceding it.

Other lines of research have explored the possibility that the Christian eucharistic prayer was influenced by the Jewish thanksgiving offering called the todah. They trace the development of some very early eucharistic prayers out of the bread blessing at the beginning of the Jewish meal, and illustrate certain resemblances among the prayers that may constitute a supposed genealogy of the eucharistic prayer.

All these hypotheses have attempted to deal (1) with the relationship of Christian eucharistic prayers to Jewish prayer forms, both domestic and synagogal, (2) with the variety of structures exhibited by the eucharistic prayer within the great tradition and outside it (3) with the variety of emphases found in the eucharistic prayer itself, and (4) with when and with what effect various component parts entered into an original dominant pattern. They do this without understanding this to be some sort of ur-anaphora or even an ur-pattern.

Most recently attention has been drawn to a suggestion that has attempted to move back beyond the Jewish berakoth into the or for the distant roots of the Christian anaphora. The thesis of Giraudo points to a literary genre called the todah, exemplified in Neh 9:6-37. This todah would be a confession, in the sense of a creed, an admission of failure or a complaint, composed of a celebratory commemorative part (an anamnesis) and a petitionary part (an epiclesis). God's great acts on behalf of God's people are recalled, and this people now asks that God accomplish for them a specific request. Inserted into one of the two parts is a pertinent scriptural passage, an embolism, that has to do with God's promise. In the Christian anaphora, this embolism would be the institution narrative and depending on whether it is inserted into the anamnestic part or the supplicatory part gives a principle of classification for the anaphora. The Jewish berakah would also have its roots in this todah genre.

What is interesting about this thesis is how it takes up so much of the previous research already mentioned and attempts to put it in a larger, coherent framework. Other scholars have objected, however, that the thesis' literary genre, the todah, is not sufficiently grounded, and that when it is applied to later Christian anaphoras it forces them in their variety into a procrustean bed. However, serious study of all the implications of this thesis has hardly been done in English, and it is only on the verge of being incorporated into the research.

Final Assessment

The recovery of the eucharistic prayer within the Western churches has played its part in an ecumenical convergence that has been massive. Many Catholic, Episcopal, and Protestant congregations are praying at the eucharistic assembly in prayer forms that are very similar. Not too long ago this was hardly conceivable. The very theology of the eucharistic prayer as one addressed to the Father, having a trinitarian structure, in which God is praised for creation, Jesus Christ's entire paschal mystery is remembered, and the Holy Spirit is invoked in an eschatological context, means that Christians separated into confessional churches are beginning more and more to worship like one another and are being formed liturgically in a similar way. They come to regard the eucharistic prayer as the Great Thanksgiving and as their prayer precisely as an assembly.

With the publication and use by the World Council of Churches of the eucharistic prayer of the Lima liturgy, a stage in the development of the worldwide recovery of the eucharistic prayer was reached. Recently with the approval by Roman authorities in 1988 of the liturgy of the Mass for the dioceses of Zaire, which have adapted for native African congregations the Roman eucharistic rite, a new impetus has been given toward the inculturation of the eucharistic prayer in the Catholic church. This joins the efforts of other churches as we enter more and more into the phase of inculturation of liturgical prayer.

At the same time, the continuing study of early eucharistic prayers is leading to suggestions of various models of eucharistic prayers for different occasions. Musicians are increasingly turning their efforts to sung eucharistic prayers and exploring various settings so that the impression given of a eucharistic prayer with some sung parts yields to the idea of a sung eucharistic prayer capable of uniting presider and congregation ever more closely.

For the English speaking Catholic church in North America and abroad I.C.E.L. has shown leadership in the development of new eucharistic prayers. Not only has it prepared a study edition of the eucharistic prayer of Hippolytus in 1983 and one of the anaphora of Basil in 1985, but, after many years of consultation, it also issued in 1984 and revised in 1986 Eucharistic Prayer A, which has been approved by several bishops' conferences and now awaits Roman approval. This indicates some of the movement in the Roman Catholic church, but there is also creative movement in the Protestant churches, and it would appear that the reforms referred to throughout this article may be only a preparation for another stage of the ongoing liturgical reform even while interiorization of the spirituality of the eucharistic prayer and its catechesis remain a present concern.

EUCCHARISTIC WORSHIP OUTSIDE MASS

Thirty years ago an article on eucharistic devotion and worship outside of Mass would have begun something like this: "Popular eucharistic devotions such as we know them today began in the late Middle Ages." Such a statement would have expressed the continuous popularity and substantial uniformity of eucharistic worship outside Mass from the 13th to the mid-20th century. With the implementation of the post-conciliar eucharistic reforms there has been a shift in the expression of eucharistic devotion and piety. The present article describes briefly the long period of continuity and its relationship to the eucharistic practice of the church of the first millennium, explains the shifts in post-conciliar eucharistic worship outside Mass, identifies doctrinal themes proposed in post-conciliar teaching concerning the eucharist which help us understand the shift, and finally, considers the relevance of eucharistic worship outside Mass for ongoing liturgical renewal.

Eucharistic Worship Outside Mass Before Vatican II

Public forms of eucharistic devotions outside Mass before Vatican Council II consisted in the annual celebration of Forty Hours Devotion, regular celebrations of benediction either with or without other popular devotions, holy hours of adoration, and perpetual adoration carried on by pious groups or by religious communities. The most common private form of eucharistic devotions were visits to churches and chapels to pray before the reserved sacrament.

Even the frequent reception of holy communion during Mass had much in common with the devotional spirit of eucharistic worship outside Mass. Those who received holy communion daily or frequently were quite conscious that the practice expressed their concern for their personal holiness and their individual moral reform. Frequent communion was a kind of index of the intensity of this concern and of devotional fervor.

It is obvious that holy communion and worship of the eucharist outside Mass is based on the church's faith in Christ's enduring presence in the eucharistic species. In the sacrifice of the Mass Christ the Lord begins to be sacramentally present under the appearance of bread and wine and remains present as long as the eucharist is reserved in our churches and oratories. "Day and night he is in our midst; full of grace and truth, he dwells among us" (see S.C.R. Deer. EuchSac, n.2).

This faith that Christ remains under the appearance of bread and wine in the reserved eucharist is implicit in the eucharistic practice of the 2nd century. Justin Martyr, describing a Sunday celebration of the eucharist about 150, reports that the deacons carried the food over which thanks had been offered to those not present (see First Apology, nos. 66, 67).

St. Augustine witnesses to the early church's faith in the real presence of Christ in the eucharistic species when he speaks of the adoration which is expressed in the inclinations before receiving the sacrament: "No one eats this flesh unless he has first adored . . . not only do we not sin by adoring, but we would sin by not adoring" (Ennar. in ps. 98, 9, P.L. 37, 1264c).

The first significant evidence of worship of the reserved sacrament outside the liturgical functions is linked to the eucharistic controversies of the 9th century. These controversies along with those of the 11th century focused both theology and devotion more and more upon the real presence of Christ in the eucharistic species. This enriched eucharistic devotion by showing the fittingness of adoring and worshipping Christ in the eucharist outside Mass. However this development had the negative effect of isolating this worship from the celebration of Mass itself.

The great development however in eucharistic worship and devotion outside Mass came in the 13th century. During that century worship of the reserved sacrament became an object of universal concern in the Latin rite church of the West. The establishment of the Feast of Corpus Christi as a great feast of the liturgical year in the 14th century gave this popular devotion official approval.

Because of the controversies concerning the real presence of Christ in the eucharist at the time of the Council of Trent, the doctrine of the real presence was proclaimed with new clarity and insistence. We have architectural evidence of the enthusiasm with which devotion to the Blessed Sacrament was promoted during the 17th and early 18th centuries. Numerous baroque and rococo high altars are designed as shrines for enthroning the elaborately designed monstrances. Impressive too were the elaborately designed settings for the reservations of the Blessed Sacrament from Holy Thursday until Holy Saturday.

In the European religious revival of the 19th century, devotion to the Blessed Sacrament played an important part. Many of the religious congregations begun during that period gave an important place to the devotion in their religious practice. One might say that much of the contemplative spirit of that period was focused upon worship of the reserved eucharist. Devotion to the eucharist was also closely linked to devotion to the Sacred Heart in this century.

The 19th century and the beginning decades of the 20th brought with them the beginnings of the Liturgical Movement. Pope Pius XII made clear in his encyclical on the liturgy, Mediator Dei (1947), that the progress of the Liturgical Movement was not to allow the adoration of the reserved sacrament and visits to the Lord in the tabernacle to be neglected. In his allocution to the participants of the International Congress on Pastoral Liturgy (September 22, 1956), the pope in his own way prepared for the post-conciliar emphasis upon the unity of the celebration of Mass and the worship of the eucharist outside Mass. He said that awareness of the unity of the worship or adoration of the eucharist and the act of sacrifice was more important than a realization of their differences: "It is one and the same Lord who is immolated on the altar and honored in the tabernacle" (see Papal Teachings, n. 816).

Shift in Eucharistic Devotion and Piety

During the first decade of post-conciliar liturgical reform, attention was focused on implementing the changes in the celebration of Mass. Communities learned how to participate in the celebration actively and fully. As a consequence, attention was more upon the eucharistic mystery as actualized in the celebration of Mass and less upon the worship of the eucharist outside Mass. During this same period the annual celebration of Forty Hours Devotion and regular celebrations of benedictions, which were once popular expressions of worship of the eucharist outside Mass, all but disappeared in an impressive number of churches and chapels. Their disappearance is an external sign of a shift in eucharistic devotion and piety.

A second external sign of a shift is that the number of those receiving holy communion has increased dramatically since the implementation of the liturgical reforms. Almost everyone present in a church or chapel for the celebration of Mass participates sacramentally in the eucharistic banquet.

We need to reflect upon the interiority underlying these changes. It is simpler to begin with the increased number of those receiving holy communion. Frequent communion, as promoted and experienced in the first four decades of this century, was motivated by a concern for one's personal spiritual growth and union with Christ. That almost all those who come to church for Sunday Mass at the present time receive holy communion is an index of the success of the efforts to achieve full and active participation. Receiving holy communion is the normal, expected way of participating fully and actively in the eucharistic celebration. One would call attention to oneself by not coming to the table of Christ's body and blood.

When we reflect upon the decline in popularity of Forty Hours Devotion and benediction, we sense a discontinuity in faith awareness between participation in the celebration of Mass and worship of the eucharist outside Mass in the post-conciliar church. The difference is experienced in the dynamic of prayer of praise and adoration. The celebration of the eucharist is the culmination of our worship of God, of our prayer of praise, thanksgiving and adoration. In the doxology of the eucharistic prayer we lift up the eucharistic elements, not to praise Christ present in them, but rather through him, with him, in him, in the unity of the Holy Spirit to offer the Father all glory and honor. In a word we are alive in faith to the dynamic of Christ's presence among us, which is to lift us up with himself to the Father in praise.

Up to this point at least we have yet to find a prayer of adoration of the eucharist outside Mass which deepens the same dynamic which we find in the celebration itself. We have yet to find a unity of the two movements of eucharistic worship which will help us enter into the fullness of the eucharistic mystery.

Doctrinal Themes Emphasized in Post-conciliar Teaching on the Eucharist

An important source of the church's official post-conciliar teaching on worship of the eucharist outside Mass is the ritual book, Holy Communion and the Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass, promulgated by the Sacred Congregation for Divine Worship with the decree, Eucharistiae sacramentum (21 June 1973). This ritual book in turn draws heavily upon an earlier instruction of the Congregation of Rites, Eucharisticum mysterium (1967), on worship of the eucharist.

The first doctrinal theme explaining the shift in eucharistic devotion since Vatican II is that of the centrality of the celebration of Mass in the church's life. The opening sentence of the ritual book referred to above states this centrality for both the universal church and its local congregations. The actual celebration of Mass is "... truly the origin and the purpose of the worship that is shown to the eucharist outside Mass" (see S.C.R. Instr. EuchSac, no. 2). The primary concern of this new ritual is to promote eucharistic devotion and worship outside Mass by integrating it both doctrinally and liturgically with the celebration of the eucharist. As is clear from the previous section, we seem sufficiently focused upon the celebration of Mass. It remains to attend to and promote the worship of the eucharist outside Mass in order to consider the eucharistic mystery in all its fullness (see S.C.R. EuchSac, no. 5).

A second doctrinal theme emphasized in post-conciliar documents is the multiple presence of Christ gradually unfolded in the eucharistic celebration. Christ's real presence in the eucharistic elements is considered the culmination of this unfolding. Faith awareness of this multiple presence of Christ unfolded in the eucharistic celebration is surely one of the strongest supports for prayerful interiority at each moment in the celebration of Mass. It is significant that it finds one of its most compelling formulations in the ritual book on worship of the eucharist outside Mass. The truth of the multiple presence of Christ unfolded in the celebration of Mass is an important doctrinal theme for promoting worship of the eucharist outside Mass.

Significance of Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass for the Ongoing Liturgical Renewal

The eucharist is mysterium fidei, the mystery of the death and resurrection of the Lord made present to be his church's sacrifice and the spiritual food and drink for her pilgrimage. Only the Spirit can open our eyes to recognize the Lord in our midst. The most likely time for this to transpire is in a prayer-filled breaking of the bread.

It is the purpose of the worship of the eucharist outside Mass to rehearse for such a prayer-filled breaking of the bread. A most stimulating support for such a prayerful rehearsal is found in the paragraphs of the ritual book, Holy Communion and the Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass, describing prayer before the reserved sacrament (see S.C.R., EuchSac, nos. 8-81). Such prayer before Christ the Lord sacramentally present in the reserved eucharist cannot but deepen the interiority of active participation in the celebration of Mass.

A sign that such prayer is considered important is the architectural efforts being made to provide more intimate prayer space in churches before the tabernacle. Satisfying one's individual longing for personal union with Christ was an important motive in the past for attracting individuals to pray before the Blessed Sacrament. Such longing exists today. It needs direction.

The private prayer of individuals itself needs direction. It needs to be formed and practiced in the forms of ritual worship of the eucharist outside Mass. We have been given a ritual book with these forms. These forms provide the Lord with opportunities for more leisurely walks with his pilgrim disciples whose minds and hearts are filled with meaningless events. His spirit will give them light and warmth, and they will want to stay on with him. From well-celebrated rites of exposition and benediction their hunger and their thirst for him will grow. There will be a deeper recognition of him in the next breaking of the bread. The pilgrim church will be satisfied with the bread of life in communion and find deeper union with him and through him with the Father and each other. He will send his refreshed and renewed ecclesial body forth to feed a spiritually hungry world.

EUCHOLOGY

Refers to a collection of prayers or a prayer book, from the Greek Euchologion, as in the Euchology of Serapion of Thmuis, which is sometimes called a prayer book or a sacramentary. The term appears more frequently in French, Euchologe, less frequently in English.

EVANGELISTS, FEASTS OF

Evangelists, those who recorded the good new of Jesus Christ for the good of the Christian community and the whole world, are honored by four feasts: St. Mark (Apr. 25); St. Matthew (Sept. 21); St. Luke (Oct. 18); and St. John (Dec. 27).

History

Commemoration of John, the Beloved Disciple and the revealer of the mystery of the Word, is a most ancient celebration, found already in the Veronese (Leonine) sacramentary (ca. 550; actually a compendium of texts rather than a true sacramentary) for the days after Christmas, though no exact date is given. This saint has been particularly associated with the mystery of the incarnation at Christmas: the prologue of his gospel has been read on Christmas day since the 5th century (see the sermons of Leo the Great [d. 461]). He became the object of great popular piety in the Middle Ages, including the story of his emerging unscathed from a cauldron of boiling oil at Rome's Latin Gate; hence the Feast of St. John at the Latin Gate (May 6; abolished in 1960).

Mark was the associate of Peter and Paul and was venerated early on in Alexandria, where he was said to have been bishop. His relics were transferred to Venice in the 6th century. His feast entered the Roman calendar in the 10th and 11th centuries.

According to tradition, the tax collector Matthew preached in Ethiopia. It was from there that his relics supposedly were transferred to Salerno in the 10th century, and a basilica in his honor erected there and dedicated by Gregory VII in 1084.

Luke the physician (Col 4:4) accompanied Paul on his missionary journeys and is said to have preached in Greece and was subsequently buried in Thebes. His relics were brought to Constantinople in 357 and placed in the Church of the Apostles. He has been in the Roman calendar since the 9th century.

Theology of the Celebrations

For the celebration of the eucharist, the readings attempt to capture the character and the fundamental message of each evangelist. Mark is characterized by steadfastness, his association with Peter and the call to proclaim the gospel to the whole world (1 Pet 5:5-14; Mk 16:15-20, ironically, part of the much controverted longer conclusion). Matthew's call and the need of apostles and evangelists to build up the church are the foci of the Matthean readings (Eph 4:1-7, 11-13; Mt 9:9-13). Steadfastness and the spread of the gospel are the concerns of the readings for Luke (2 Tim 4:9-17; Lk 10:1-9). The readings for John are interesting in the light of the Christmas context; the word of life and the light of the world are contrasted with the disciple who sees the empty tomb and believes (1 Jn 1:1-4; Jn 20:2-8).

The prayers give ample food for thought about the role and purpose of the evangelists: the variety of the evangelists proclaims the breadth of the gospel message. First and foremost they are servants of the mystery of the word (John, Mark), a living gospel (preface of apostles 11, used for the feasts of evangelists). This word is spoken on behalf of our salvation (John) and we too are called to go out and preach it (Mark). This gospel demands our fidelity and calls us to live the life of Christ (Mark, Matthew). The gospel reveals that we can welcome Christ with joy into our lives, even though we are sinners (Matthew). The gospel is for all peoples, especially the poor and sick (Luke).

The celebration of the liturgy of the hours is a more extended exploration of these same themes. Matthew is the one who particularly stresses that the gospel is even for sinners, that God is a God of mercy. The offices for John reveal the great devotion to this saint, particularly his reverence for the word, his virginity and care for the Virgin Mary, and his great profession of faith at the tomb. Mark and Luke share many of the same texts and focus on the spread of the gospel to the nations.

Celebrating the evangelists is a way of specifying the celebration of the apostles: they have a particular mission of preaching and witnessing to the incarnate and risen Lord and call each one to share that mission.

MICHAEL WITCZAK

EVANGELIZATION

Evangelization is the process of proclaiming the good news (gospel, Greek: euangelion; Latin: evangelium) and enabling the good news to be accepted more readily by those people disposed by grace to receive it.

The term evangelization has only recently been used in the Roman Catholic church. Appearing in the late 1950s, the term was incorporated into several of the documents of the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s; since then, the term has been widely used.

Most references to the term in Roman Catholic circles rely on the encyclical of Pope Paul VI, Evangelii Nuntiandi (Evangelization in the Modern World), promulgated in December 1975, as a way of reporting and furthering the discussion and conclusions of the Fourth Synod of Bishops which met in Rome from September 27 to October 26, 1974. That encyclical specified evangelization as a process of conversion of people individually and of society culturally (E.M.W., 18).

While the term is borrowed from Protestant and Evangelical usage, it does not connote for Roman Catholics the implicit theology that it sometimes connotes in Protestant and Evangelical circles, namely, the confession of Jesus as personal savior (to the exclusion of "good works" or sacraments). Rather to the contrary, evangelization, as understood by Roman Catholics, extends through all Christian life, from the earliest "pre-evangelization" contact between believer and non-believer to the ongoing growth of the whole church as it realizes the impact of the good news of Jesus in its life and in the world. In this way, Pope Paul VI named as "beneficiaries" of evangelization all the baptized, their children, those who have ceased practicing their faith, peoples of non-Christian religions and atheists (E.M.W., chap. 5).

In its programmatic sense, evangelization covers all those activities that seek the renewal of the Christian community and its connection with those who are not members or are not active members. Its methods could include preaching as well as mass publicity.

Evangelization, then, cannot simply be equivalent to "mission" which is the "outward" movement of believers toward non-believers; it also has an "inward" dimension of renewal and re-conversion for the believers themselves. Evangelization must then be viewed in both its outward and inward dimensions.

(a) Outward dimension

In its strictest sense, evangelization takes place prior to any liturgical setting. In as much as the first liturgical act is enrollment in the catechumenate, as indicated in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, evangelization takes place prior to the celebration of that rite (R.C.I.A., Intro., 9).

It begins with contact between believers and non-believers in the pre-evangelization or evangelization phase. The initial contact leads to a period of inquiry. While no rites have been composed by the universal church to mark either the beginning or end of this period, various episcopal conferences are free to develop instruments to help people inquire about the church and to welcome them (R.C.I.A., Intro., 12).

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults is the liturgical and sacramental process of incorporation into the church after conversion. Incorporation and membership begins with the celebration of the Rite of Catechumens (R.C.I.A., Intro., 14); it reaches its climax with the reception of baptism, confirmation and eucharist, the sacraments toward which the Rite of Initiation of Adults is ordered, preferably celebrated at the Easter vigil (R.C.I.A., Intro., 8). It concludes with the post-initiation period of "mystagogia."

It is appropriate here to note that the term "conversion" pertains only to those unbaptized who, upon evangelization, experience conversion and incorporation into the church. It does not pertain to people properly baptized in another Christian tradition who subsequently seek membership in the Roman Catholic church.

The responsibility for evangelization belongs to everyone in the church; in a special way, however, lay people who, through their daily secular lives come in contact with those who do not have belief, share in that responsibility through the many opportunities they have for such contact.

(b) Inward dimension

As an "inward" dimension of the church, the purpose of evangelization is not simply conversion in the strict sense, but continued renewal and re-conversion through the Holy Spirit. In this dimension, the liturgy both effects continued evangelization in believers and is itself an act of evangelization for all.

Effecting Evangelization. The sacrament of baptism, as the first sacrament of initiation, celebrates membership in the Christian community, the reception of grace and mercy, the Christian identity with the Lord, and the outpouring celebrates the good news of salvation both in the individual and the community, is completed with the sacrament of confirmation whose anointing in the Holy Spirit empowers the individual and the community to bear witness to the grace of God both in the church and in the world.

The sacrament of the eucharist, in which the faithful gather to be fed by the word of God and the Lord's Supper, reaffirms the bond between God and the faithful, as well as the bonds among the faithful themselves. Sustained and refreshed, believers find strength in their own faith and strength to reach out to others.

The sacrament of reconciliation likewise effects continued evangelization in the faithful, reaffirming the grace of baptismal conversion in the celebration of renewal and mercy. When celebrated along with the sacrament of the sick, it calls in a special way for people in crisis to recognize and acknowledge God's mercy and renewing power.

The sacrament of marriage celebrates that bond through which God's love is manifested and a family unit created. Through the family unit the world is touched on a daily basis and new members are born into the family of faith.

The sacrament of holy orders charges each ordained person to proclaim the word of God and to live in accord with that word in service to the church and the world.

Evangelizing Acts. In addition to effecting evangelization in the members of the church, the sacraments themselves serve as instruments of evangelization.

The eucharistic assembly, in all its communal and liturgical roles, invites people to be part of the community of Jesus. Ushers and greeters welcome all into the assembly; commentators provide the context of the worship; lectors proclaim the word of God; the homilist assembly; acolytes, deacons and the presider model the diversity of ministry which the assembly upholds.

The sacraments of reconciliation and healing are, in themselves, movements of outreach toward the spiritually and physically afflicted. As the mercy and healing of Jesus were, in his day, signs of the presence of God's Kingdom, so these sacraments announce the presence of the Kingdom in our day. This good news is proclaimed, in the first instance, to those who recognize their need for mercy and healing.

The communal expressions of the rite of reconciliation can be dramatic invitations to personal renewal and reconversion (Rite of Penance, Intro., 36). Many programs that seek to reach the formerly active believer are, in reality, extensions of the spirit of the sacrament of reconciliation; some of these programs are actively modeled on the process of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

The sacrament of marriage, gathering as it does many of the associates of the marrying couple, proclaims the love and grace of God to people who often have no exposure to such proclamation.

The sacrament of holy orders invites all the faithful to consider the common ministry that each baptized person has as well as the responsibility of each person for the sanctification of the world. Although the ministry of the ordained differs from that of the non-ordained, it is a ministry of the universal church and it underscores the fact that each baptized person has received a calling to serve.

Likewise those who have been initiated, especially those recently converted, because of the freshness of their experience and the enthusiasm of their conversion, have a particularly powerful role in attracting others to become catechumens and to continue with the process of initiation in the Rite of Initiation of Adults. The rite, through its recognition of sponsors and godparents, specifically charges people to support the process of evangelization and conversion. The Easter vigil, at which catechumens complete their initiation, can be viewed as a powerful liturgical call for the conversion of the friends and families of the initiated and for the re-conversion of all believers.

Although evangelization, as a term, is recent, the dynamics of mission and conversion have always been part of the church's life. The word, however, serves the added purpose of calling the faithful to reveal the force of their faith in their daily lives, especially to non-believers and to those who have abandoned the practice of the faith. Likewise, it underscores the importance of continued conversion and re-awakening for the baptized believer.

Evangelization integrates the good news with every aspect of Christian life and with every person, whether believer or not, whether active or not, through liturgical celebration and spiritual growth, as a call to realize the good news of the Lord in its fullness. It gathers people, through their diverse relationships and ministries, around the table of the Lord, that the world may be served and all people united. As a process, it anticipates the Kingdom which it proclaims.

EXORCISM IN BAPTISMAL RITE

Exorcism is prayer for deliverance from the power of evil. Because of overdramatization in the popular culture it conjures up bizarre images of demonic possession. However, in the baptismal rites it takes the form of ritual prayer for the unbaptized.

A prayer of exorcism accompanies the Rite of Baptism for Children and occurs several times in the more extended Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

When a child is baptized the prayer of exorcism accompanies the pre-baptismal anointing. Since the Rite of Baptism for Children is a radically condensed and adapted version of the rites for adults, the child is anointed at this time with the oil of catechumens.

There are two versions of the prayer. They acknowledge the power of Jesus, sent to the world "to cast out the power of Satan" and "to rescue us from the slavery of sin." The intention of the prayer is that God will set the children "free from original sin" and to bring them "out of the power of darkness." In short, the anamnestic formulae acknowledge the power of Christ over the power of evil, and the petitionary formulae seek freedom from the power of evil.

In the abbreviated version of the rite celebrated by a catechist, the exorcism and anointing with the oil of catechumens is omitted.

In the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults exorcisms are celebrated several times: in the rite of acceptance into the Order of Catechumens, the minor exorcisms during the period of the catechumenate, the anointing of the catechumens, and the scrutinies.

In the rite of acceptance the exorcism is optional. In regions where false worship is widespread this first exorcism may accompany the renunciation of false worship.

During the period of the catechumenate, minor exorcisms may be part of the celebration of the word of God. The exorcisms are prayers addressed to God to help the catechumens in their struggle to be faithful to the Christian way of life. The presider may be a priest, deacon, or qualified catechist appointed by the bishop. These prayers may be used throughout the period of the catechumenate.

During similar celebrations the catechumens may also be anointed with the oil of catechumens. In these cases, when the oil has already been blessed by the bishop, the celebrating priest or deacon offers a prayer of exorcism before making the anointing. When oil has not been blessed, he says a prayer to bless the oil, a prayer in which the exorcism is inchoate.

Finally, exorcism forms the heart of the three scrutinies immediately preceding baptism. The formula is more elaborate. After intercessory prayer the celebrant begs God's deliverance and imposes hands on the elect; finally, he prays for the coming of the Holy Spirit to replace the spirit of evil.

In baptismal rites, then, exorcisms are prayers that God will free the unbaptized from that power of evil which formerly governed their lives, and fill them with the power of the Holy Spirit who will incorporate them into the people of God.

FASTING

Fasting is a physical process of restricting one's level of use of such things as food, drink, play, etc., ordinarily for some religious rationale. It may be to acknowledge that the things one ordinarily uses come from God, and one "fasts" to praise God for the gifts. It may be a penitential act, fasting in atonement for sins. It may be a ritual act, in preparation for a festivity; one fasts to heighten the enjoyment of the feast. It may be an act of communion, fasting in solidarity with those who live in want.

The liturgical cycle frequently employs "days of fast" and even "seasons of fast." Lent is the church's major season of fast, where fasting is primarily in preparation for the Easter feast, and secondarily, where a reconciliation process is observed, a penitential act. Traditional days of fast are vigils before feasts and days of harvest (rogation days) to mark God's providence over the crops and the seasons. Contemporary times of fasting include days of solidarity with the poor such as the Oxfam fast or fasts to raise funds for victims of war. In the tradition of fasting, the contemporary phenomenon of the "march" or the "walk" may serve the same religious purpose: e.g., the "walk" for hunger, the "march" for life, the "walk" against AIDS, etc.

As with all restrictive activities, the religious danger is to focus on the negative, "giving up" rather than "giving for."

Such focus on the negative distorts the value of fasting as a religious act. The paradigm for Christians of any embrace of the negative is, of course, Christ on the cross. His endurance of suffering and death, however, was an act of love pro nobis and an act of worship, surrender, to God. Fasting gains its true Christian meaning from Christ, and from Christ's command that we love one another as he himself loved us.

FEMINISM AND THE LITURGY

Liturgy, although defined through its etymology as the "work of the people," has been confined for most of Christian and Jewish liturgical history to the "work of men," and further restricted in most situations to the work of male clergy. Women's leadership and the expression of women's experiences have been excluded from its symbols and rituals. Thus in this corporate activity where God and human beings encounter one another, a narrow authorship has denied both women and men aspects of divine and human revelation. Feminism, a movement based on a vision of equality between women and men of all cultures and races, critiques this male domination and suggests as a counterbalancing factor transformative contributions from women's experiences. Feminism addresses the form, content and meaning of liturgical practice.

Rationale

The study of feminism from the perspective of many disciplines, especially feminist theology and feminist social theory, has provided systematic understandings of the androcentric and misogynist bias that plagues human history. It is no surprise that in societies in which "the male" has been considered the norm and the "female," a sub-species whose primary value is to serve the norm, appraisals of human worth have been seriously distorted. Both women and men are affected. Women are demeaned and rendered invisible. Men are inappropriately inflated with the result that men perceive power as their right and domain. The developing public awareness of pervasive domestic violence, in which women and children are the primary victims, is a vivid example of the violent implications of this power imbalance. Feminism, through a system of thought and action, addresses the long-distorted relationships between women and men.

Though scholars can trace some small fragmentary evidence of the integration of women and women's experiences within liturgical celebrations throughout religious history, in general the liturgies of church and synagogue reflect a similar androcentric bias. In the last twenty years the consciousness-raising brought about by the women's and civil rights' movements has introduced important concerns that affect liturgical practice. Women from a variety of cultural and religious backgrounds, among them feminists, womanists (feminists of color), mujeristas (Hispanic feminists) as well as lesbian feminists have identified the particularities of sexist-prejudice within worship traditions. The male bias, as normative for everyone, pervades every aspect of liturgy: graphic images, metaphors, choices and interpretations of texts, music, leadership and forms.

Images and Metaphors

Christian and Jewish teaching assures us that God cannot be fully known or named and that any attempt to describe God simply encompasses a mere part of the mystery. No word, color, gesture, or sound can convey the entirety of God's nature. Liturgical communities depend on symbols, both representational images and metaphors, to express qualities of divine/human encounters.

The sources of our description emerge from human experience, conveyed through tradition, both written and oral, past and present. Scripture, doctrinal formulations and liturgical usage are our basic resources.

Since the writing of scripture occurred during a patriarchal time (as has most of the rest of history), it is no surprise to discover that the predominant divine images within it (verbal and visual) are male, primarily, Father, King, Lord, Prince. Feminist biblical scholars respond to this situation in two ways. First, they acknowledge the limitations of the patriarchal-historical context. Images are historically-rooted. As such they cannot be considered "objectively" true or appropriate for all time. They require constant scrutiny for continuing suitability. This examination leads feminists not only to identify the problem but also to suggest some solutions. One correction consists in alternative words for exclusively male images. Examples include Sovereign for Lord, Ruler for King, Mother and Father or Parent for Father, The Human One for Son of Man (Inclusive Language Lectionary). Another is to uncover new metaphors that express contemporary experiences of God such as Spinner, Weaver, Liberator, Sustainer and Lover.

Second, feminist scholars point to female images from the biblical tradition that break into this dominant androcentric pattern (womb of God, God writhing in labor pains, God as a mother nursing her young, woman in search of a lost coin), that have been all but lost in the patriarchal emphasis of the Christian tradition. Honest liturgical practice requires a rediscovery and appropriation of existing female images as metaphors for the activity of God among us.

Similarly, theologians understand the influence of historical contexts on the study of doctrine. This analysis, along with the reflections of those who participate regularly in liturgy, offers a critical contribution for liturgical change. Feminists point to the predominant use of gender-specific terms to express the nature of God in prayers, hymns, and visual representations. God is known primarily as Father, referred to by the pronoun "he," and understood "most perfectly" in the trinitarian formula (Father, Son and Holy Ghost). Feminists suggest that these historically rooted metaphors are some, but not all, (and not necessarily the best) of many imaginable expressions of God, each one with its own limitations and assets. The insistence that any one is essential and irreplaceable in the celebration of the sacraments is idolatrous because it claims to exhaust the mystery suggesting that God can be contained in one formula. Varied images for God rather than a few are more consistent with honest liturgical practice. Other metaphors which include distinctly female experiences (Sister, Mother, Nurturer, Life-sustainer) as well as gender-indefinite terms (Giver, Gift, Holy Spirit: see Richard Norris) are equally valuable in expressing relationships about and within God.

In addition to words and images for God there is the problem of the male-identified Christ. Clearly glorification of the male and a license for domination has resulted from a distorted Christology which highlights Christ's maleness rather than Christ's humanity. The feminist challenge is to open up the christological reality beyond its maleness to testify more fully to the redemptive suffering and the resurrected expression of all peoples. Christian communities will discover new dimensions of embodied divinity through a crucifix with a female corpus. It will press identification with and acknowledgment of the women throughout history who have been and continue to be undeniable witnesses to the tradition of suffering servants.

Names for God express only half of the equation in liturgical assemblies. Human experience shapes an important aspect as well, that is, how we name or refer to ourselves. This area demands careful attention. To call Israel a whore and ourselves children of Israel connects primary sinfulness with women's sexuality, an all too common feature of religious tradition. Similarly, to describe women saints as virgins, wives and mothers relegates their importance to their sexual functioning and relationship or non-relationship to men. Women live and contribute much beyond these categories.

Biblical Narratives

Not only do individual images and metaphors discredit and disregard the worth of women but also the choice and interpretation of biblical narratives in Christian worship reinforce the same message. Too often they depict women as perpetrators of sin (Eve), as whores (Mary Magdalen), as passive, asexual, innocent recipients of God's activity (Mary). Feminists offer reinterpretations of these texts (Eve as mother of all humanity, Mary Magdalen as first witness to the resurrection, Mary as liberator of the poor and suffering). They demand also that biblical texts which portray women as brutalized for the sake of men, such as in the story of the unnamed concubine and the rape of Tamar, be read and understood as witnessing to the contemporary experience of many women. As to appropriate texts for liturgy, feminists raise questions about the sole use of canonical texts written in patriarchal eras. They suggest adding other equally challenging literature that conveys God's continuing activity among all of humankind.

Not unrelated to the primacy of scripture is a similar preference in current liturgical practice for verbal rather than embodied or visual texts. If we take seriously the well-taught doctrine that all human creatures are embodied images of God, and the importance of bodily gestures and positions which have become an integral part of our liturgies, then limiting our experience to verbal texts again denies access to aspects of both divine and human revelation. Feminists are particularly concerned about embodiment because women, whose bodies are essential for the perpetuation of human life, nevertheless have borne the scourge of ridicule, disparagement, even the accusation of being temptations to sin, because of their bodies. Feminists claim the body as good, as a testimony to the realities of compassion, life, honesty, struggle. Acknowledging the importance of the revelation about God and about others that emerges concretely and directly from our bodies, feminists insist on correcting the tradition which undergirds the evil of women's bodies, and on adding the use of our bodies as an important contribution to contemporary liturgical practice. Such determination runs the gamut: from resistance to such unexamined practices as bowing our head for a blessing often prayed by men (a gesture with inherent dominance, men over women, clergy over laity, inconsistent with the feminist principle of mutuality) to experimenting with different forms of movement and touch. Sensuality, sexuality and spirituality are closely interlinked for feminists.

Leadership

Since the primary medium for our understanding of God is through other human beings, both male and female, male-centered liturgical leadership poses theological inconsistencies and serious liturgical problems. First, it makes too easy the consequent connection between male humanity and God, a connection both inaccurate and idolatrous, as discussed above. Second, it affects the participation of the assembly. The presumption that only men have a special charism given by God for the most important liturgical tasks, i.e., to preside over the celebration of moments of divine/human encounters and to interpret scripture, reinforces a demeaning image of women. In hearing that the sacraments are not valid without male clerical presence, women and men conclude that women are not as significant as men for the "work of the people." No attempt to salvage the situation by claiming that women and men have different roles is adequate when the roles themselves are so suggestive of the ordering of "God's preference." Some women respond by accepting their inferior role as part of God's plan; others accept the situation as inevitable, not knowing anything could be different. Some insist that it is enough to be part of the secondary leadership roles, when possible. Others (both women and men) are justifiably angry, making it impossible to be fully engaged in the experience. In each situation, the exclusiveness of male leadership limits the full and active engagement of many members of any worshipping community.

Form

Feminist critiques of liturgical forms encompass a variety of perspectives. They include an institutional persistence to reform the aspects of the liturgy as mentioned above by adding women's names and stories from the tradition. Primarily, this attempt addresses the content of the form. However, another viewpoint maintains that all liturgical forms shaped by a patriarchal history are inherently sexist and cannot meet women's emerging needs. Some women turn to the Wicca movement with its emphasis on connectedness to nature, the equality of all human beings and its goddess-centered images. Others, determined to redeem and use the most valuable assets of the tradition while remaining highly critical of form as well as content, gather outside the church's official structures, often in homes. Moved by the recognition that the inherited forms themselves are too hierarchical to reflect feminist principles of mutuality and also by the immediate need to survive in a sexist church, these intentional communities shape new forms for themselves. Though the actual format may vary from time to time, some characteristics remain constant: they replace hierarchy with mutuality (no domination by a single person); minimalism with graced excess (more water, more ashes, more beauty rather than only what is required); soberness with compassion and enjoyment (seriousness includes play and laughter); isolation with bonding; passivity with active listening, spontaneity, and articulated responses to the performances of the liturgy. The form supports new content, not only references to distinctive experiences of women, such as menstruation and menopause, battering, rape, breast or vaginal cancer, friendship and bonding, but also real connections to the oppression women have felt with support for transformative liberation. Consistent with the focus of liturgy, feminists design contexts where the encounter with divine reality can support change that emphasizes women's worth rather than women's limitations.

The patriarchal tradition of liturgy has hobbled Christian and Jewish communities for centuries, denying women's existence, determining how they should express their beliefs in an articulation based on male insights. The study and experience of feminism offers a new challenge to church and synagogue inviting congregations to probe their practices carefully and honestly. They begin by asking such questions as: When have I experienced moments of transformation? What characterized the time? What name or quality expressed my need for a transcendent reality? When is my human experience most sacred and most unjust? What motivates change in me? How does my religious experience connect with the challenges of the neighboring and world community? What do I treasure most about the liturgical experience I have known and why? The contribution of feminism to liturgy is to ask probing, profound, disturbing questions, to experiment in response to them and constantly to evaluate the entire process. Such a procedure is not new in the history of church and synagogue. What is different is the emphasis on the value of all the participants' experience, specifically, though not exclusively, women's experience. Feminism acknowledges particularity with regard to culture, race, gender, human capability. Feminism searches for ways to include these differences rather than project a preference or a "norm." Liturgy as a paradigmatic moment along a journey is an experience of transformation and liberation when it takes seriously the value of each person's contribution to its structure and its content. Feminism offers an opportunity to reexamine the integration of form, content and meaning in liturgy. Beginning at the heart of liturgy, feminism challenges the ways humans, primarily men, have limited God's revelation among us and have restricted our witness of that revelation to each other. Feminism offers corrections and recommendations, integral components of the promise inherent in the liturgical renewal of church and synagogue in this century.

FORGIVENESS, THEOLOGY OF

Forgiveness is an intentional process in which the forgiver freely chooses not to return injury for injury but rather to respond in a loving way to the person or situation that has inflicted some harm. The process of forgiveness is not only between an individual and God or between individuals, but includes the forgiveness of self, pardon between groups and the forgiveness of social and political structures. The capacity for forgiveness generally arises out of the experience of being forgiven and leads to reconciliation or mutual acceptance. Forgiveness is a difficult process because it is unconditional. It is offered even though it may not be accepted. It requires an ability to deal with one's own pain, pride, emotions and desire to retaliate. Basically forgiveness recognizes human weakness but also the possibilities of the human spirit. Forgiveness creates new possibilities for growth and relationship because it affirms the genuine worth of the other person and it enables the forgiver to be free and independent of a destructive force in his or her own life.

Forgiveness in Scripture

The human experience of forgiveness finds its source and its inspiration in the reality of God's forgiveness. A Christian theology of forgiveness is rooted in the gratuitous mercy of God. The English word "mercy" is an inadequate translation of the biblical concept of hesed, which is linked to and expressed in many images. In the OT, the God of mercy is the God of the covenant. Yahweh's love fashions a people who enter into a covenant relationship that is characterized by mutual love and faithfulness. The God of mercy is the God of forgiveness. Israel was often unfaithful but Yahweh's love endures (Isa 54:10). The infinite mercy of God again and again called Israel back to faithfulness. Only by experiencing God's mercy did the Israelites recognize and name their sinfulness. In experiencing God's mercy, Israel is empowered to manifest God's forgiveness and love to others. The God of mercy is the God of compassion. Yahweh hears the cry of the poor and the helpless. Yahweh shows them favor because of Yahweh's mercy and great kindness. The psalmist appeals to these qualities of compassion and mercy when asking for forgiveness (Ps 25:6; 40:12; 51:3). The God of mercy is the God who saves. Mercy is the fundamental motive underlying all of Yahweh's mighty deeds and the motive which gives unity and meaning to all Yahweh's actions in the lives of the covenant people.

The mercy of God is revealed in Jesus. Jesus manifests God's mercy in human words, actions and relationships. Jesus tells the disciples stories of mercy, generosity and redemption in order to help them gain insight into the gratuitous, gracious love of God and to help them make the experiences of forgiveness and reconciliation a reality in their lives. The parables stress the initiative of God in forgiveness. The appropriate response to God's love is love for one another. God's forgiveness is not a gift simply bestowed or received; it is always empowerment. It opens up possibilities of greater discipleship. The experience of the forgiveness of God intensifies and increases the human person's capacity to love and forgive. It is "God who has first loved us." Forgiveness calls for an acceptance and a response by humankind, but ultimately forgiveness is always God's free gift. Forgiveness goes beyond conditions, recompense or requirements. The parables and the sayings make it clear that there are no limits to forgiveness, that God's mercy extends to all humankind and to the whole cosmos.

The actions of Jesus, often a scandal to society, taught the disciples that forgiveness meant reaching out to the marginalized, to the "lost," and to those despised by society. Forgiveness is not merely an attitude, it is an action. Many passages of the gospels show the compassion and the forgiveness with which Jesus welcomed those who were considered as outcasts by the authorities (Lk 15:2). He was even ridiculed for being a friend of tax collectors and sinners (Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34). Jesus defended this relationship with sinners by stating that those who are well have no need of a physician and that he had come to call not the righteous but sinners (Mk 2:17; Lk 5:32). No one is excluded from God's mercy and compassion.

Not only does Jesus welcome sinners; the gospels provide a number of examples in which Jesus mediates the forgiveness of sins (Mk 2:5; Lk 7:48; 19:9, 23:43; Jn 5:14; 8:11). God's mercy is reflected in and experienced through Jesus. Jesus' declaration that sin was forgiven was blasphemy to the scribes because forgiveness was the prerogative of God alone (Exod 34: 6-7; Isa 43:25) and in Judaism the forgiveness of sin did not take place in the present, but only as a future event. The early kerygma affirmed Jesus' power to forgive sins on earth and justified the church's claim to declare the forgiveness of sins in the name of Jesus. Forgiveness of sin was integral to the very nature of the church.

Even worship and prayer are to give way to forgiveness and reconciliation: "If you know that someone has something against you, leave your gift at the altar and go first to be reconciled (Mt 5:23). Mt 7:1-5 warns against judging others and reminds the listeners that their relationship to God brings about a new relationship to each other. Those who have received mercy are to show mercy. The promise to forgive others in the Lord's Prayer (Lk 11:1-4; Mt 6:9-15) identifies forgiveness as an intrinsic quality of the disciple.

How often is the disciple required to forgive? The sum of "seventy times seven" (Mt 18:21-35) is a number beyond count because the follower of Jesus is to forgive as often as it is necessary. Everyone must be given the opportunity to change. As often as one promises repentance, one must be offered forgiveness.

The centrality of reconciliation in the life and teaching of Jesus culminates in his liberating death: "This is my blood of the covenant which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins (Mt 26:28). "My blood of the covenant" is the new and everlasting covenant founded on Christ's own life, death and resurrection.

"For the forgiveness of sins" summarizes what Matthew's gospel has already affirmed about God's mercy manifest in Jesus. He is the saviour who saves people from their sin (1:21); he is the servant of Yahweh who took upon himself the infirmities and sufferings of those who were afflicted (8:17; 12:18) and who gives his life in the service of many (20:28). The death of Jesus is freely offered for the life of the world (27:51-54). Thus, many of the OT themes of mercy—God's will to save, God's covenant of love and faithfulness, God's intervention in human history, God's fulfillment of eschatological promises—become visible in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus

Forgiveness in the Early Church

The gospels identify forgiveness as an essential characteristic of the reign of God and a fundamental quality of a disciple. Christians reconciled to God through Christ are entrusted with the message of forgiveness and reconciliation (2 Cor 5:18). Through baptism for the forgiveness of sins, the Christian is incorporated into the community of believers and its mission. The early Christians had a deep sense of awareness that they were the body of Christ and that therefore sin committed after baptism negated the very nature of the church. They also understood that God's mercy was manifested and mediated through the community of believers because Christ is present in the church. The church is the sacrament of God's mercy through Christ in the Spirit. Reconciliation with the community was the sign of forgiveness and reconciliation with God.

Gradually, community structures of forgiveness evolved that were both preventive and corrective for the sinner. Throughout the centuries these ecclesial forms of forgiveness changed in order to meet the concrete needs of people within a particular historical context. When medieval theologians attempted to define the meaning of sacrament and to determine the number of the central liturgical rites, penance was identified as the sacrament of forgiveness. From then on the sacrament of penance became the primary if not the sole means of forgiveness for Catholic Christians. An overview of the major historical and theological developments in the sacrament of penance indicates that shifts in sacramental practice brought about corresponding shifts in understanding the ways forgiveness was effected.

In the NT churches, baptism was for the forgiveness of sin. In the Pentecost account, Peter preached repentance in order that the people "be baptized in the name of Jesus for the forgiveness of sins and you shall receive the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:38). When the disciples gathered for "the breaking of the bread" they remembered that this action of Christ in the Spirit was also for the "forgiveness of sin" (Mt 26:28). Baptism was the initial action for forgiveness of sin, and eucharist was the memorial that both called the community to forgiveness of one another and expressed the forgiving nature of the community.

It is possible that the early church never envisioned any public sign of forgiveness other than baptism. However, the reality of the sinfulness of its members after baptism forced it to struggle with the meaning of the eucharist and with the understanding of forgiveness presented by Jesus. Paul describes the community as the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:27). The believers are Christ; it is through them that Christ's mission of proclaiming God's love in word and deed is continued and made manifest. The mark of this community is unity, an organic unity that points up the interdependence of its members (1 Cor 10:17). This unity, integral to the body, is expressed and deepened by the eucharist. The very nature of the body is contradicted by selfishness and division and they who eat and drink without recognizing the body eat and drink a judgment on themselves (1 Cor 11:29).

Penitential practices developed in the apostolic communities that began to shape the church's ministry of forgiveness. Means of pardon and reconciliation were fraternal correction (Mt 8:15-20; Gal 6:1-2), prayer (1 Jn 5:16; Jas 5:16), confession to one another (Mt 5:23-24), and especially the sharing of the eucharistic meal. Other forms of forgiveness were fasting, almsgiving and works of mercy.

A special process was set in motion with regard to serious and public sins (1 Cor 5:1-5; 2 Cor 2:5-11). It involved excluding the member for a time from the eucharistic meal and from the life of the community because such sin was not only an offense against God but also a contradiction to membership in the church and, in fact, a denial of the very nature of the church. The judgment to exclude the sinner was the prerogative of the community (Mt 18:17; 1 Cor 5:3-5).

and was intended to be remedial in nature. It afforded the sinner a concrete way of manifesting conversion and enabled the community to support the sinner through prayer and charity. Paul tells the Corinthian church that the ministry and message of reconciliation is given to the whole community (2 Cor 5:14-19) and that the members must take responsibility for one another.

In its origins, the act of reconciliation with the church was a renewal of baptismal commitment that found expression and strengthening in eucharistic communion. In the restoration of the baptismal bonding the sinner found once again God's forgiveness in Christ. Reconciliation with the church was reconciliation with God.

Rituals of Forgiveness

The 3rd century was marked by a number of controversies concerning the forgiveness and reconciliation of sinners. Tertullian (d. 225), as a Montanist, supported the permanent exclusion of those guilty of capital sins and attempted to distinguish between remissible and irremissible sins. St. Cyprian (d. 258), Bishop of Carthage, dealt with many of the practical problems of the penitential discipline arising from the Decian persecutions. Cyprian maintained that the subjective, personal element of doing penance effected the forgiveness of sins but the objective ecclesial aspect of reconciliation presupposes the divine pardon. Hippolytus of Rome (d. 235), in opposition to Pope Callistus, denied the church's right to forgive serious sins and Novatian (d. 258) refused forgiveness and reconciliation to apostates. These controversies contributed to the development of a more formal, ritualized means of reconciliation than was present in the NT church. Tertullian describes the process as having three stages. First, the penitent confessed his or her sinfulness by appearing before the community in penitential garb and begging the intercession of the community. Second, the penitent was assigned specific works of penance in order to foster conversion. Third, when the period of expiation was finished, the penitent was readmitted to the community and to the eucharistic table. This form of penance, a restoration of one's baptismal grace, had to be performed in the midst of the community to work to salvation. The forgiveness of sin is effected by the intercession of the church.

Gradually this penitential process developed into the institutional form of canonical penance. It paralleled the Christian initiation of its members in that it was a lengthy process and took place in and through the community. The primary purpose of canonical penance was to enlist the prayers and concern of the community on behalf of the penitents. At the eucharist, the bishop blessed the penitents and prayed for their perseverance. In participating in the conversion of the penitents the community itself was called to conversion, deeper faith and commitment of life. When the penance was completed the penitents were publicly received back into full communion with the church through the bishop's prayer and imposition of hands.

The reconciliation of the penitent was considered the work of the whole church. The penitential works of the sinner, encouraged and supported by the community, and the bishop's prayer and imposition of hands, were considered essential elements in the reconciliation of the penitent to the church, which was the sign of forgiveness. The early church understood the Holy Spirit to be the source of reconciliation and the church to be the embodiment of the Spirit. Reconciliation with the church is the means by which the Spirit is communicated to the penitent.

Canonical penance was directed to only a small number of people and to serious, scandalous sin. Baptism continued to be the preeminent means of forgiveness with "daily penance"—good works, almsgiving, charity to the poor and infirm, prayer, particularly the Lord's prayer—as the ordinary form of forgiveness for sinfulness (St. Augustine, Serm. 351 and 352).

Canonical penance declined around the 5th century, due primarily to the rigidity and severity of the penances and the rule that penance was non-repeatable. It was replaced by "tariff" penance which permitted penance more than once in a lifetime, was available to every individual and required a detailed confession of sin in order that the confessor could assign a penance (tariff) corresponding to the gravity of the fault. The tariffs determined for each sin were listed in the penitential books used by the confessors. The satisfaction or fulfillment of the penitential works effected the forgiveness of sin. When the satisfaction was completed the penitents were readmitted to the eucharist, which was the sign of forgiveness.

Even in tariff penance, confession of sin was considered only one form of forgiveness of sin. The Penitential of Cummean, which was widely circulated on the Continent during the 8th and 9th centuries, offered twelve means of remission of sin. Baptism was the premier means of forgiveness. Others were: charity, almsgiving, tears, confession of sin, acceptance and endurance of suffering, continuing conversion, prayers for one another, mercy, conversion of others, forgiveness of others, and martyrdom. The ecclesial form of reconciliation was always placed within the context of the whole Christian life.

Gradually, the custom arose of reconciling the penitent before the completion of the penance. The reconciliation of the sinner before satisfaction was explained by equating the humiliation and embarrassment inherent in confession with the satisfaction. Confession per se began to constitute the most important part of the penitential discipline in the 11th and 12th centuries and theologians taught that confession was absolutely necessary for the remission of sin.

Theological Disputes

Twelfth-century theologians struggled with the question of how the sinner was forgiven. The context of the dispute was the change in liturgical practice in which satisfaction, which had been the outward sign of contrition and the pre-requisite for forgiveness, now followed absolution. Theologians agreed that confession was necessary for forgiveness. The disagreement centered on whether it was contrition (which included the intention of confessing), the actual act of confessing or the absolution of the priest that effected forgiveness. Peter Abelard (d. 1130) taught that contrition effects forgiveness. Confession and the imposition of a penance by the priest are the outward signs of a repentant heart. The role of the priest is to pray for the sinner and to impose a penance in order to expiate the temporal punishment due to sin. Peter Lombard (d. 1160), the most influential of the 12th-century theologians, supported Abelard and maintained that sinners were forgiven before they confessed, that is, from the moment that they turned to God in sorrow and repentance (IV, d. 17 c. 2). The function of the priest is to declare that the sins are forgiven. In opposition, Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1142) argued that forgiveness is dependent upon the absolution of the priest.

The dispute about how the sacrament of penance effects forgiveness continued in the 13th century, resulting in a distinction between contrition (sorrow for sin motivated by the love of God) and attrition (sorrow prompted by other motives).

St. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) took up these same distinctions teaching that contrition, and not merely attrition, is required for God's forgiveness. Aquinas applied Aristotelian terms of matter and form to the sacraments in a systematic way and achieved a valuable synthesis. With regard to penance, he speaks of a quasi-matter, that is, the penitent's three-fold action of contrition, confession and satisfaction and a form that is the indicative words of absolution. Both matter and form were necessary for the efficacy of the sacrament and therefore there was an intrinsic relationship between contrition and absolution.

Duns Scotus, in opposition to Thomas, considered attrition sufficient for pardon; once the penitents have been forgiven through the sacrament, the grace of the sacrament changes their disposition of attrition to contrition. The position of Duns Scotus on attrition, and also his teaching on absolution as the essence of the sacrament, came to be the generally accepted opinions. The acts of the penitent were not causes of forgiveness but conditions for the effectiveness of absolution. By the end of the 13th century, absolution was seen as the means of forgiveness.

The Council of Trent (1545-1563), in refutation of the Reformers, did not settle the controversy between attritionists and contritionists. With regard to forgiveness, the council affirmed that faith alone was not sufficient for the forgiveness of sins, but that the acts of the penitent and the words of the minister are required. The interpretation of the Council of Trent in succeeding centuries led to an almost exclusive identification of forgiveness with the sacrament of penance. Forgiveness was seen almost entirely in terms of absolution.

From the Council of Trent until the Second Vatican Council the theology of forgiveness remained almost unchanged.

Vatican II

Vatican II called for a revision of the rite of penance to more clearly express both the nature and effect of the sacrament (S.C., 72) by restoring the baptismal and communal context of reconciliation: "by baptism priests introduce women and men into the People of God; by the sacrament of penance they reconcile sinners with God and with the church" (O.P., 5). The praenotanda of the Rite of Penance (1974) incorporated and extended these fundamental understandings. The major theme of the rite is the mercy of God and, in the context of mercy, the sacrament is once again understood as an act of worship. The rite presents the sacrament as an aspect of the mercy of God who reconciled the world in Christ. Christ's ministry of forgiveness and reconciliation is continued in the church whose very nature is expressed whenever it manifests itself as the sacrament of God's mercy. It is only by the "grace of a merciful God" that the sinner comes back to "that Father who first loved us" (1 Jn 4:19). In the sacrament, the faithful "obtain from the mercy of God" pardon for their sins and reconciliation with the church (n. 4). In the sacrament, faithful Christians experience and proclaim the mercy of God in their lives as they celebrate with the priest the liturgy by which the church continually renews itself (n. 11). The whole church as a priestly people, is to "help the sinner to obtain the mercy of God who alone can forgive sins" (n. 8).

The focus of the sacrament is clearly on the mercy of God; the confession of sins is secondary to this mystery. Confession is first a confession of faith and confession of praise. The sacrament is the celebration of faith in a God who loves men and women freely and forgives them out of mercy for the glory of God's name, through Jesus Christ in the Spirit. It is the celebration of the gratuitousness of God's forgiveness, mercy, grace and love. Forgiveness and reconciliation are the church's gift and task and continue the very activity of God revealed as mercy.

God's action is closely linked with the activity of God's church, and penance always involves reconciliation with others who are harmed by our sins (n. 5). In the communal forms provided by the new rite, the church as a forgiving community is more clearly discernible. The priest has a privileged ministry in the absolution and reconciliation of the penitent, but the whole community has a varied and active role in the mystery of God's mercy and forgiveness. Forgiveness is more than words; it is action. The ecclesial nature of penance impels the Christian community to work closely with others for "justice and peace in the world" (n. 5).

In the introduction to the ritual, the sacrament is situated within the framework of God's will to save and to reconcile humankind. The sacrament is placed within salvation history as another concrete instance of God's intervention and care for God's people. The relationship of penance to baptism and eucharist is once again restored. Penance is presented as the renewal of baptism, and the completion of forgiveness is participation in the eucharist. Through the sign of absolution God grants pardon to the sinner and this is expressed in a renewed and more fervent sharing of the Lord's Table (n. 6).

Summary

A theology of forgiveness is bound closely to the history of the development of the sacrament of penance. Within that history certain values emerge and recur that are valid for a current understanding of forgiveness.

Forgiveness is God's action in the Christian's life. It is an event that gives rise to a sense of awe and wonder because the Christian is confronted with the depth and the mystery of God's saving love. In the experience of forgiveness, the Christian is called to respond to God's covenant love by struggling against sin in oneself, the church and the world.

Baptism is the fundamental sacrament of forgiveness and eucharist is the sign and source of unity in Christ. The sacrament of reconciliation is a renewal of the baptismal covenant and the manifestation of the nature of the church as a reconciled and reconciling community.

Reconciliation is the ministry of the whole community because of the baptismal bonding in Christ, and Christians must continue to search for ways of making this ministry viable and visible.

Forgiveness, reconciliation and conversion are not restricted to the sacramental moment. Traditional forms of forgiveness—prayer, works of charity, mutual forgiveness, fasting, almsgiving—as well as contemporary forms are a part of God's saving action and as such must be integrated into the sacramental rituals of reconciliation.

Forgiveness is not merely an individual action or attitude but is inseparably connected with the communal and ecclesial experience of repentance and pardon. The church is the fundamental sacrament of mercy and compassion and the individual experience of this gift must still find sacramental expression because all saving action ultimately has a sacramental character.

The social aspect of grace and sin, by which the actions of individuals in some degree affect the whole body of the church, is a basis for the development of a spirituality of forgiveness that not only addresses personal sin but the sinfulness of structures in society.

Forgiveness as a quality of the Christian life is a gift. "God is rich in mercy; because of God's great love for us, God brought us to life with Christ when we were dead in sin . . . this is not your own doing, it is God's gift" (Eph 2:4-5,8). Forgiveness as a quality of the Christian life is a commitment to making the richness of God's mercy a reality wherever there is alienation or division in today's world.

FORMATION, LITURGICAL

When Vatican II initiated the renewal of the church's rituals, it was also aware that ritual reform must be accompanied by liturgical formation at every level of the praying church. With the realization that the liturgy is the summit of the activity of the church and fount of all her powers (S.C., 10), the council called for a formation which leads to "full, conscious, and active participation" (S.C., 14) in the prayer life of the church. Vatican II identified liturgical formation in very broad terms as proper preparation of those responsible for the teaching and celebration of the liturgy: namely, professors of liturgy (S.C., 15); and seminarians for whom major and mandatory course work was to be coupled with liturgical formation in their spiritual lives (S.C., 16-17). At the pastoral level, the council instructed priests to understand better what they are doing, and urged the promotion of liturgical instruction of the faithful (S.C., 18-19). In the period following Vatican II, pastoral experience has demonstrated that liturgical formation includes, in addition to good instruction: good experience of liturgical prayer for congregational formation, good planning of the ongoing liturgical life of the diocese and each parish, particular skills for those exercising the different ministries at each liturgical celebration, and overall attention to the use and function of symbol and ritual.

Addressing these concerns the American bishops, through the Bishops' Committee on the liturgy, have produced, among others, the following documents reflecting both an awareness of the spirit of liturgical reform and the needs of the American church for liturgical formation: 1) Art and Environment in Catholic Worship, 1986; 2) Music in Catholic Worship, rev. ed., 1983; 3) Promoting Liturgical Renewal: Guidelines for Diocesan Liturgical Commissions and Offices of Worship, 1988; 4) Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops, 1973; 5) Liturgical Formation in Seminaries: A Commentary, 1984.

Formation Through Liturgical Experience

Liturgical formation is the process which enables each individual to take his or her rightful place within the church (the local domus ecclesiae) when it engages in its most characteristic acts of sacramental worship. This means that the most natural setting for liturgical formation is the worshipping community. "The most powerful experience of the sacred is found in the celebration and the persons celebrating, that is, it is found in the action of the assembly: the living words, the living gestures, the living sacrifice, the living meal" (Environment and Art, 29). Thus, liturgical life, which never operates in isolation, has a very specific context: a faith context which reflects the gospel; a spatial context in which the worshipping community sacramentalizes that faith; and a ritual context in which that faith is vitalized. To be formed liturgically means that every worshipping Christian must become conversant in the context of faith; at home in the spatial context of the church, and articulate in the language of ritual activity. Thus, liturgical formation can never be limited to some members of the church, but is incumbent on all the faithful, because involvement in the liturgical life of the church is the right and duty of every Christian by reason of baptism (S.C., 14). Further, any attempt to identify liturgical formation solely as a pedagogical process which takes place outside the act of worship fails to understand that the best master of the praying church is liturgical prayer itself. Attention must be placed first on the act of worship before turning to the study and organizational aspects of the sacramental prayer life of the church.

The Spatial Context

Congregations as well as individuals are formed by the space in which they gather, and for this reason good liturgical space is a prime factor in proper liturgical formation. The environment of worship needs to be authentic and appropriate. Good architecture, art and furnishing create the proper setting for good liturgical celebrations. "The environment is appropriate when it is beautiful, when it is hospitable, when it clearly invites and needs an assembly of people to complete it. Furthermore, it is appropriate when it brings people close together so that they can see and hear the entire liturgical action, when it helps people feel involved and become involved" (Environment and Art, 24). This does not mean that the liturgical space must be elaborate or expensive, but that careful attention must be given to the main focal points demanded by the liturgical celebrations. In even the most humble building, attention should be paid to the quality of the space; liturgical space has to be prayerful, calling both the congregation and each individual to ritual and devotional prayer. Lack of resources can never be an excuse for either poor artistic design or poor worship, since prayerful space will be achieved by demanding quality and appropriateness from architecture, music and the other arts. "Whatever the style or type, no art has a right to a place in liturgical celebration if it is not of high quality and if it is not appropriate" (Environment and Art, 19). To meet the demands of the liturgical assembly any work of art must also be appropriate in two ways: "it must be capable of bearing the weight of mystery, awe, reverence and wonder which the liturgical action expresses"; and, "it must clearly serve (and not interrupt) ritual action which has its own structure, rhythm and movement" (Environment and Art, 21).

In each diocese the model of good liturgical space should be the cathedral, the mother church of the diocese. It is the bishop's task to make the "cathedral church outstanding in its beauty, observance of regulations, and popular Christian fervor, so that this church may indeed appear as the mother and teacher of the other churches of the diocese" (Promoting, 5). Since local artistic and liturgical talent are frequently found in each parish, every diocese should have a quality liturgy and art committee to offer advice and direction.

The Ritual Context

The ritual context of Christian worship calls for formation into a community whose symbolic activity functions with memorial and celebration. This is a challenge to the American church which operates in a social context that is uncomfortable with symbolic activity, focuses on the contemporary and frequently transitory, and considers religious convictions as a private matter. By contrast, good liturgical celebrations affirm a different set of values: community, symbol, memorial, celebration.

Community. First of all, liturgical worship is communal. The activity of the assembled congregation can never be private or impersonal. Western society in general, and Americans in particular, need specific orientation and formation into the communal nature of Christian worship. "A culture which is oriented to efficiency and production has made us insensitive to the symbolic function of persons and things. . . . As a consequence, we tend to identify anything private and individual as 'personal'. But, by inference, anything communal and social is considered impersonal. For the sake of good liturgy, this misconception must be changed" (Environment and Art, 16).

Any conscious community building at the parish level is of its very nature liturgical formation. The ecclesiology of Vatican II provides the theological basis for the local community, describing the church as the body of Christ constituted by all of the people of God. This community of faith, even though it is hierarchically structured, functions with shared ministries when it gathers for worship. It is by virtue of baptism that each Christian becomes a member of the worshipping community, assuming the right to participate to the fullest when gathered around font, pulpit, and altar. Further, baptism is the basis for any liturgical ministry which the individual exercises. Christians are first formed into the liturgical community when they assume their rightful position in communal prayer.

Symbol. Since the gathered assembly worships in sign, symbol and ritual, all of its members must become comfortable and conversant in the language of sacramental symbols. A conscious awareness of the symbolic nature of worship can best be achieved through careful attention to an authentic use of symbols in every liturgical celebration. "Renewal requires the opening up of our symbols, especially the fundamental ones of bread and wine, water, oil, the laying on of hands, until we can experience all of them as authentic and appreciate their symbolic value" (Environment and Art, 15). Whenever the worship service becomes heavily verbal, rational, and catechetical, the symbolic dimension of sacramental prayer suffers.

Liturgical prayer has a healthy and human balance between word and rite, the rational and the symbolic. By letting the symbols speak their own language they communicate a truth proper to sacramental reality. This truth is realized not only in word, but also in gesture, i.e., walking, assembling, bathing, eating, anointing, reconciling, singing, and all of the other visible forms of sacramental prayer. In short, liturgical worship calls for a commitment to truth in word and ritual. Put negatively, anything which hinders or diminishes such symbolic activity in worship can only be understood as a denial of the baptismal rights of the faithful to the fount and source of the true Christian spirit (S.C., 10).

The bishops have described liturgical formation into the symbolic nature of worship as follows: "To gather intentionally in God's presence is to gather our total selves, our complete persons—a living 'sacrifice'. . . . Liturgy is total, and therefore must be much more than a merely rational or intellectual exercise. . . . In view of our culture's emphasis on reason, it is critically important for the church to reemphasize a more total approach to the human person by opening up and developing the non-rational elements of liturgical celebration: the concerns for feelings of conversion, support, joy, repentance, trust, love, memory, movement, gesture, wonder" (Environment and Art, 35).

Memorial. The mystery of God's presence celebrated in Christian worship is a mystery tied to the history of salvation. God's loving redemption unfolds within human history. The contemporary experience of God has its spiritual roots in a pattern of divine activity which becomes normative for the present relationship between God and his people, or more exactly in the historical and redemptive ministry of Christ. In the biblical notion of memorial (anamnesis), the faithful call to mind this pattern of divine activity as a way of renewing and reliving that same divine pattern in their lives. This creative recall is at the heart of Christian worship. Each Christian must both understand and know how to make memorial. In a society deeply committed to the contemporary and the transitory, it is important that worship be rooted in solid biblical patterns. Liturgical formation into Christian worship involves learning how creatively to recall the deeds of salvation history, as well as one's own personal history of God's activity in one's own life. Failure to understand Christian memorial severely limits one's understanding of Christian worship.

Celebration. Christian worship is a joyful celebration of the mystery of God in the midst of his people. The praise of God done by the congregation is a response of awe and wonder to God's love. Memorial and celebration come together through a realization that the pattern of the divine relationship was established when God broke into human history. The common past is salvation history recorded in scripture, and individual past is the personal history of each Christian. As inheritors of that past the Christian can celebrate with praise and thanksgiving God's saving presence. The call to worship is answered by those who know how to celebrate the great deeds of the history of salvation.

Liturgical Ministries and Formation

While it is true that Christian worship is congregation worship, it is also true that the liturgical assemblies are hierarchically structured. Each type of liturgical celebration has its special ministers, whose essential functions are largely responsible for the success of good liturgies. A successful liturgical celebration depends for the most part on ministers who both understand their function, and properly carry it out while not overstepping or interfering with other ministerial functions.

The Presiding Minister. Each liturgical celebration has a presiding minister who gathers the community together, leads in prayer, prays in the name of the community, and performs the tasks which are proper to the presiding minister, such as the eucharistic prayer. Most frequently the presiding minister is the local parish priest, but there are occasions when others can preside: deacons at baptism; religious not in orders at the Divine Office, appropriate ministers at communion services when no priest is available and at paraliturgical services such as wakes. Such tasks presume an individual who has a prayerful presence and a clear and distinct voice trained in public speaking, and who is at least capable of handling some minimal musical tasks. The presider must be at home with ritual prayer, i.e., both familiar and comfortable with the symbolic words and actions of each celebration. Since liturgical prayer is first and foremost a prayer of this assembled community, the presider should also be aware of the specific needs of this congregation and the way in which God is present to this community in their daily lives. Each presiding minister must be trained in the basic skills needed to serve as leader of the praying community, and also have a deep familiarity with the inner structure of the rite, the rhythm by which the rite unfolds, and the relationship of the various parts of that rite. A properly trained presider will not assume functions which properly belong to another minister. The presider performs with authority and dignity only those functions which belong properly to the president of the assembly.

Other Ministers. In addition to the presiding minister, each liturgical celebration calls for a variety of different ministers: lectors, cantors, ministers at the altar, communion ministers, musicians and the choir, to mention a few. Each ministry serves a specific liturgical function which is properly its own. That function operates as an integral part of the complete liturgical act, and should not be performed by any other than the proper minister. Liturgical ministers do not act in their own names, but as servants of the community and facilitators of the overall act of worship. These ministers must have the physical, spiritual, technical and communal qualities necessary for their ministry. They must also understand the overall structure of the liturgical act, and their precise function therein.

Lectors should have a clear voice for proclaiming the word of God, and an understanding of the scriptures. Ministers at the altar should know the nature of the eucharistic action, have a sense of presence and service at the altar, not distract from the principal action in progress, facilitate not distract from the offertory, the eucharistic prayer, the breaking of the bread and the communion action. Music ministers, in addition to having musical talent, need preparation in the structure of the different rituals, the role of liturgical music in worship, the proper moments for, and distinctions between, singing by the congregation, the choir, and the cantor. Guidelines for music ministers and the role of music in the liturgical action are provided in the statement of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, Music in Catholic Worship, rev. ed., 1983.

Role of the Bishop in Liturgical Formation

As head of the local church the bishop has a special responsibility and exercises a unique function in the area of liturgical formation. Two documents deal specifically with this role of the bishop: Ecclesiae Imago (The Directory), from the Congregation on Divine Worship; and Promoting of Liturgical Renewal, from the American Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy. The bishop is the principal presiding minister as well as the moderator-promoter-custodian of the liturgical life of the diocese. "To lead those assembled for prayer is the first and primary liturgical role of the bishop" (Directory, 78). He is expected to maintain high standards of liturgical presidency. "The bishop presiding at worship, both in the cathedral and in the parishes of the dioceses, is the model of all liturgical gatherings of the local Church" (Promoting, 5). Worship in the cathedral church should both in fact and in perception be understood as the center of divine worship in the diocesan community. The bishop himself should frequently preside over the divine mysteries and the liturgy of the hours, especially on Sundays and other solemn feasts of the year. He should also try to make the liturgical life of the cathedral church outstanding in its beauty, observance of regulations, and popular Christian fervor, so that his church may indeed appear as the mother and teacher of the other churches of the diocese (Directory, 81a).

A second aspect of the bishop's liturgical role is to be a moderator, promoter, and custodian of the liturgical life within the diocese he serves. Since a liturgical spirituality is the most available way in which the majority of the faithful of a diocese come to an integrating experience of God's presence in their lives, the bishop is encouraged to use the liturgy as one of the main instruments of exercising his pastoral ministry (Promoting, 7). "The bishop should take care that in his diocese the liturgy, which is the common and public worship of the people of God, should be celebrated with as much dignity as possible and with an active, devout and fruitful participation of all, with the sacred minister presiding, in accordance with the prescribed norms" (Directory, 80). A sacramental catechesis should be provided for all of the faithful. It is the task of the bishop as high priest and chief moderator of divine worship in the particular church to "... promote the liturgical training of the faithful through appropriate commissions (e.g., liturgical, music, and sacred art commissions, etc.) and officials, through pastors and other priests, through religious and through lay people prepared for this work and dedicated to the apostolate of the liturgy" (Directory, 82). The document even calls for the bishop to consider under the proper norms "new liturgical experiments whereby the impulse and warmth of authentic faith may show its vigor by evolving new and meaningful ways to fulfill the expectations and more clearly interpret the spirit of the religious life of the community" (Directory, 84).

In the exercise of his pastoral role as "moderator, promoter, and custodian," the bishop does not work alone. As a member of the college of bishops his task is carried out consistent with the norms established by the American bishops, and by the universal church. In every case the bishop is advised to employ the assistance of those who have special preparation in the area of liturgical studies, theology, pastoral practice. The Directory advises the local bishop to employ suitable, chosen collaborators—clerics, religious, or lay people—with whom he shares the pastoral mission of liturgical formation (Directory, 198; 211).

Liturgical Formation in Seminaries

Since one of the principal tasks of priests is to preside at worship in such a manner that the other members of the assembly are led to pray, particular attention has been given to the liturgical formation of those preparing for the priestly and diaconal ministries. In 1979 the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education issued the Instruction on Liturgical Formation in Seminaries, and in 1984 the American Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy and the Bishops' Committee on Priestly Formation issued a commentary under the title, Liturgical Formation in Seminaries: A Commen- tary. These documents call for a spiritual formation of the candidates for orders which is liturgically based.

The liturgical life of the seminary should be of the highest quality where there is the full range of liturgical prayer including the communal praying of the liturgy of the hours. The teaching of the sacred liturgy in seminaries has the highest priority as a major course of study. Professors of liturgy are to be experts specially trained in the discipline of liturgical studies which includes the history, theology, and pastoral practice of the sacramental prayer life of the church (Instruction, 51). The professor of liturgy "should well understand that his work is not simply scientific and technical but rather 'mystagogical,' so that he may introduce the students into the liturgical life and into its spiritual character." Further, "the strict connection between the liturgy and the doctrine of the faith has a special importance for the correct liturgical formation of future priests. . . . Scholars working in the field of sacred liturgy are to investigate carefully the tradition of divine worship, particularly when they study the nature of the Church and the doctrine and discipline of the sacraments" (Instruction, 44). And "above everything else liturgical acts, both as regard their texts and their ceremonies, must be explained to the students. The prayers and orations offered by the sacred liturgy are to be explained in a way that sheds light upon the doctrinal treasures and the spiritual values they contain" (Instruction, 46). There is to be special emphasis on the history of the rites as well as introduction into the traditions of the Oriental churches so that there is, as much as possible, a wide grasp of the whole liturgical tradition of prayer. "Given the importance of sacred music in liturgical celebrations, the students should be trained in music by experts, including a practical training, in those things necessary for them in their future roles as presidents and moderators of liturgical celebrations" (Instruction, 56). "Finally, it is extremely necessary that the students be taught the art of speaking and of using symbols, as well as how to use communications media. Indeed, in liturgical celebrations it is of the highest importance that the faithful be able to understand the priest, not only in what he says, whether in the homily or in the prayers and orations, but also in what he does by way of gestures and actions. Formation for this purpose is of such high importance in the renewed liturgy that it deserves very special consideration" (Instruction, 58). These principles of liturgical formation spelled out in detail for those training for the priesthood apply equally to anyone involved in liturgical ministries.

Formation Through Education

Good liturgies will result from careful planning. Each parish should have a parish liturgical committee whose task is to be concerned with the proper function of the liturgical life of the parish. Its overall concern is for a healthy prayer life of the parish. Members of such a committee should have an intimate and commanding knowledge of the various types of liturgical prayer of the church, understand how ritual and communal praying operates and provides a physical, social, and spiritual context in which liturgical prayer can take place. In cooperation with the presiding ministers the committee serves a valuable formative function for the local worshipping church through planning and facilitating every dimension of the liturgical life of the parish. In addition to planning the Sunday liturgy, the committee should be concerned with baptism, marriages, penance services, anointing of the sick, daily prayer services, and the devotional life of the parish. Many parishes have secured the services of a trained liturgist to function as liturgical coordinator, educator, and chairperson of the liturgical committee.

At the diocese and national level, liturgical commissions and offices of worship serve as policy-setting and educational arms of the church. Through these groups implementation of liturgical changes and educational programs are effectively carried out. Each diocese is to have a liturgical commission whose concern is to advise and aid the bishop in setting policy for the total prayer life of the whole diocese. In addition to a diocesan liturgical commission many dioceses also have an office of worship which can give its full attention to providing resources and conducting workshops in liturgical formation (Promoting, 14). The office of worship is to function as a major diocesan resource for the purpose of liturgical formation. These commissions are to be staffed with people who have special competence and training in the area of liturgical studies. Experts in the field are necessary to provide insight, training, leadership, and a critical evaluation of the overall celebration of the liturgy. "When a bishop relies on a volunteer diocesan liturgical commission as the only diocesan worship structure, he should realize that its effectiveness may be limited. Often the nature and scope of the tasks facing the commission's members will put a heavy burden on their time and resources. Competing responsibilities of the members may often prevent long-term projects and future planning" (Promoting, 15). The American bishops have issued their guidelines in Promoting Liturgical Renewal: Guidelines for Diocesan Liturgical Commissions and Offices of Worship, Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy: National Conference of Bishops, 1988.

At the national level there are two organizations for the promotion of liturgical formation: The Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions (F.D.L.C.) and the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy (B.C.L.). The F.D.L.C., first convened in 1969 by the secretariat of the Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy, is a national organization of diocesan liturgical commissions, or their equivalent structures, in the United States and its territories. The B.C.L. is a standing committee of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (N.C.C.B.) with a history dating back to November 1958. The committee, assisted by a Secretariat in Washington, D.C., is composed of seven member bishops, various consultant bishops, and ten advisors (lay, religious, and priests). The functions of the B.C.L. are: to contribute to the preparation of appropriate liturgical rites, texts, and books; to assist bishops individually and collegially in implementing the official norms and directives of the Holy See and of the N.C.C.B.; and to assist the bishops in the development of liturgical catechesis and the continued liturgical renewal of priests, deacons, religious men and women, and the laity of the church (Promoting, 17).

At the international level there is the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (I.C.E.L.), and the Congregation of Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments. I.C.E.L. was established in 1963, during the Second Vatican Council, by the principal conferences of bishops from English-speaking countries. The primary program of I.C.E.L. is the translation into English of the official Latin texts of the Roman liturgy. In May 1969, Pope Paul VI divided the Sacred Congregation of Rites into two distinct congregations, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for the Causes of Saints. In 1975, Pope Paul VI established a new congregation, the Sacred Congregation for the Sacraments and Divine Worship, to take the place of the Congregation of the Sacraments (created by Pope Pius X in 1908) and the Congregation for Divine Worship. In 1984, Pope John Paul II divided the former congregation into the Congregation for the Sacraments and the Congregation for Divine Worship, and in 1988, he reunited these two congregations under the title of Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments. The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments is responsible for the pastoral, spiritual, canonical, and disciplinary dimensions of the sacraments and other liturgical rites of the church. This congregation also publishes Notitiae, a monthly journal containing short articles on liturgical renewal, and reports on the liturgical activities of episcopal conferences and national liturgical commissions.

FUNERALS, PREACHING AT

The preaching event at a funeral should always be a clear proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ, with special emphasis on his death and resurrection. It may also include a grateful reference to the life of the deceased, mentioning specific gifts, characteristics, and achievements of the deceased. The central thrust of the sermon, as of the entire funeral service, should be a witness to the resurrection.

The funeral sermon should avoid the extremes of being morbid, or death denying. It should avoid the extremes of being completely impersonal, or being a eulogy which gives a romantic and hence false description of the life of the deceased. God, not the deceased, should be the focus of the funeral message. This can be enhanced by closing the coffin before the funeral service and keeping it closed. The funeral sermon may be more effective in a setting of worship following the interment of the body.

The three inescapable aspects of the funeral setting and sermon are: God, the reality of death, and the congregation. The funeral sermon should interweave the three stories of God, the dead person, and the listeners. The listeners include not only the mourners but members of the community of faith who may or may not have known the deceased well, plus non-church people who are related in some way to the deceased.

The funeral sermon should face the reality of the death of the deceased, acknowledging that the loss is real and final. The preacher should use the name of the dead person, mentioning significant events, activities and characteristics of the deceased. Recalling the life of the deceased encourages the grieving process. It also can help the mourners move from relating to the deceased in life to relating through memory and in the communion of saints.

The funeral message should proclaim the majesty, power, steadfast love and wisdom of God. Since the ultimate comfort of the bereaved is found in the mercy of God, the funeral sermon should point to God, and God's gift of eternal life through Christ, rather than focus on the feelings of the bereaved.

The funeral message is God's word to the living and therefore should enable those present to relate their own living and dying to the good news of Christ's death and resurrection. The sermon should motivate all hearers, Christian and non-Christian, to reflect on their own death and to remember that the act of dying is but a dramatic symbol of what has been happening all along as we journey through death to life. The funeral message should call hearers to die to self and sin daily and to accept the free gift of eternal life through Christ.

The sermon at the time of death should deal with feelings—both negative and positive. The preacher should avoid euphemisms for death such as 'passing' or 'passed away' and should use death, died, and dead as ways of emphasizing the reality of what has happened. This will enable mourners to deal more effectively with their feelings of loneliness, anger, anxiety, as well as affection, hope and joy. The sermon should be sensitive to feelings mourners may have of anger toward God, frustration, and even a sense of the absence of God in their grief. Laments from the scriptures can help voice such feelings which are normal human reactions to loss.

The funeral sermon is part of the whole funeral process which serves as a "rite of passage" enabling mourners and the community to deal with the loss, and celebrating the moving of the deceased from the land of the living to the life beyond the grave. This rite of passage involves separation, transition and incorporation, and the funeral sermon may pick up and deal with these movements, showing how death separates the deceased from the living, celebrates the transition to the life hereafter and affirms the incorporation of deceased Christians in the communion of the saints.

The funeral message should celebrate Christ's victory over death which embraces all believers. In baptism believers die and rise with Christ. But this "end time" reality does not deny the reality of biological death: "For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive" (1 Cor 15:22). The resurrection of the Christian's body always remains future. Death, the last enemy, will eventually be destroyed.

There are two ways of viewing life after death: focus on the immortality of the soul, or focus on resurrection of the body. The first is rooted in Greek philosophy and Gnosticism. It says that the soul is immortal (does not die). Plato was one who claimed that human beings are a union of body and soul, a union that is dissolved at death. The soul is freed from the body as a person might be freed from a prison. While the body is destroyed, the soul, pre-existent and post-existent, continues. This became a generally accepted belief of the church and was formally defined as church doctrine by the Fifth Lateran Council (1512-1517). According to this view the soul as the unchanging kernel of life at the center of each individual continues untouched by death. According to medieval theology the souls of the dead were already enjoying bliss with God, waiting only for reunion with their glorified bodies on the last day.

A strong case can be built for a biblical view of eternal life, of course. This life grounded in God through faith is not destroyed or separated from God by death. But this life with God now and beyond the grave is a gift of God, not a natural aspect of all human life.

There can also be made a strong case for the resurrection of the body, as we affirm in the Apostles' Creed. In more recent years Christian theology has shifted more toward an emphasis on the resurrection of the body rather than on the immortality of the soul. According to the view of the resurrection of the body, death is a devastating reality because the entire person dies. For this reason anxiety is a very normal and understandable response to death. The terror which death holds for humans lies not so much in fear of hell as in the fact that humans are a totality of body/soul and therefore in death one is totally dead.

The funeral sermon should face squarely the mystery and absurdity of death. Because we are dealing with matters of faith and mystery we must use metaphors. While the metaphor of the language of immortality of the soul was chosen by many church Fathers to stress the continuing of the individual self beyond death, it seems to deny the reality and discontinuity of death. But the metaphor of resurrection is grounded in Hebrew thought and biblical faith. It takes death seriously, with all its mystery and absurdity. The sermon links individual human deaths with Jesus' death which is stressed in the Apostles' Creed: "crucified, dead, and buried; he descended into hell." But on the third day God raised him from the dead. And we believe that God will "also raise us by his power" (1 Cor 6:14). Paul, writing to the Philippians, indicates that a believer's total life and being will be transformed by the risen Christ "to be like his glorious body" (Phil 3:21).

In order to communicate metaphors found in resurrection language, the preacher should look for contemporary images as well as draw on biblical ones. The image of the butterfly, of the dying of the grain of wheat, and of reconciliation with God all may be helpful in making the funeral sermon effective in conveying Christian hope. The image of reconciliation takes seriously the break in relationship with God which death causes. But through God's saving act in Christ we are reconciled to God, leading to a joyful human experience. This image of reconciliation can link the present to the future as we anticipate being restored to God in the life beyond the grave. There are weaknesses in every metaphor. But we are forced to use them to convey religious truth, in spite of the fact the best metaphors conceal as well as reveal.

The funeral sermon should enable mourners to affirm once again the hope of new life in Christ. And it should confront the non-believer with the Christian teaching of the resurrection and life with God beyond the grave. This can best be achieved through stories, images and metaphors. The apostle Paul uses images of different kinds of "bodies" and of the seed dying in order to receive a new body, radically different from the body of the seed that was sown.

The funeral message, by necessity, is developed under the pressure of time, usually two or three days at most. While visiting with the family of the deceased, when this is possible, the preacher should listen for clues to the significance of the life of the deceased in order to help weave the fabric of the funeral sermon. Each funeral sermon is unique for it deals with God's grace and the life of a unique human being whose death is unlike that of any other death.

There are a great variety of approaches to developing the funeral sermon using standard structures as the following: biographical, drawing on the life of a biblical character who faced death, such as David who mourned the death of his little son; doctrinal, which focuses on a Christian doctrine such as the providence of God, the grace of God, or the future life. The expository sermon is based on the exegesis of a biblical passage especially relevant to that particular occasion. With the life situation sermon the preacher begins with the congregation as it mourns the death of a particular individual and then relates God's comforting love to those who grieve. In an occasional sermon the message would take into account the unique occasion of the death: after a long illness, as a result of an accident, crime or suicide, or if it occurred on Christmas, Easter or the deceased's birthday or anniversary. A textual sermon takes a text from scripture and relates the thrust of the text to the funeral occasion. With the help of a concordance the preacher can discover the text especially fitting for the particular funeral.

The narrative form of sermon is especially fitting for a funeral sermon as it allows the preacher to weave the sermon with the threads of the life of the deceased, the grace of God, and the grief of the mourners. The sermon might be thought of as a series of episodes, with various images and metaphors which enable hearers to relate to God and one another in love. The funeral sermon should focus on one particular key aspect of the funeral occasion. By shaping the sermon around a single issue the minds of mourners are given a sense of clarity and reality. Two of the pitfalls of funeral sermons are generality and abstraction. The sermon should acknowledge that there are no simple answers to the mystery surrounding death. Final answers are not expected. The funeral message can provide mourners a frame of reference and a sense of the presence of God to help them work through their grief and to try to make sense of death's dilemma.

G

GATHERING RITES

The term "gathering rites" refers to the ritual beginning of official rites as well as to the liturgical opening of other non-sacramental convocations. The more structural language better indicates the function of the ritual element than the various designations given in specific rites (e.g., "greeting" in penance, "entrance rite" in matrimony, or "introductory rites" in eucharist). Whatever the context, the intent is "that the faithful coming together take on the form of a community and prepare themselves" properly to enter into the celebration (G.I.R.M., 4th ed., 24). The pattern generally includes song, gesture (e.g., procession), greeting and (presidential) prayer or collect.

In the first place, it should be noted that the most fundamental and theologically significant factor is the act of assembling itself. This ancient emphasis cannot be missed in the liturgical theology of Sacrosanctum concilium and Lumen gentium which insist on the significance of the liturgical assembly. However elaborate or simple the accompanying adornment, the gathering of the Christian people in assembly for worship constitutes an ecclesial event.

Gathering for worship expresses itself ritually in a movement from other occupations, places and concerns to a unity in worship which is based in common Christian identity. Thus, gathering enacts a transition and an integration. It is possible to distinguish three phases in this movement: arrival/welcome, establishment of identity, beginning/opening. Clearly the three phases are closely related, but each has its own primary agenda; mixing the agendas can often lead to confusion.

For the first several centuries beginning the celebration could be accomplished very simply. The eucharist, for example, began directly with the bishop's greeting ("Peace to you," or "The Lord be with you," completed by "And with your spirit.") and the readings. But the entrance into the church is one of the moments which attract elaborations, and over time it became much more complex. The missal of Paul VI represents an effort to shape the ritual without benefit of a single model from which to work. We will illustrate the agenda of gathering by examining the "introductory rites" as they presently stand in that missal.

Welcome

It would seem natural that welcoming members, visitors and strangers belongs at the point of arrival. This might not have been necessary in the ancient town church, but it is increasingly significant in communities in which such natural patterns of relating and mutual recognition cannot be presumed. An authentic welcome eases the transition into a different experience of community, helps to create a sense of belonging and prepares for communal action. As sensitivity to this moment has increased, more and more importance has been given to what are called ministries of hospitality. The welcome and greeting which people receive upon their arrival situate them as members of the community which is gathering and as participants in that community's common act of worship. Thus liturgically apt hospitality goes beyond the merely warm reception and seeks to express reverence for the person and for the event. Cultural sensitivity and custom surely condition the experience of welcome and belonging; at this point such considerations can be given free expression adapted to different persons.

Establishment of Identity

This movement may include procession, song and ritual greeting. While the style and degree of elaborateness of articulation will vary according to season, feast or occasion, the central purpose is to recognize and give expression to the fact that this is a gathering of the Christian people specifically as church.

As ritual, the procession is a choreographed gesture which signals the beginning of the celebration and expresses the identity of the congregation and its ministers as participants in the mystery being celebrated. The act of moving through the community sweeps the participants along to the precincts of altar, ambo and chair. Ministers and congregation are not, therefore, identified over against one another, but reciprocally.

From about the 4th century there is evidence of a processional entrance of the celebrant which came to include the book of the gospels and other ministers as well as candles and incense. Naturally this procession came to be accompanied by song, in the first place by an antiphon and as many verses of an appropriate psalm as were needed. The early collections of antiphons and chants reflect the effort to set the tone of the celebration by announcing the feast or the mystery being celebrated. The missal of Paul VI continues this tradition and allows the use either of the antiphon provided or another song which will fulfill the same function. The General Instruction of the Roman Missal goes beyond the simply functional use of song as accompaniment; its purpose here is first to "intensify the unity of the gathered people, lead their thoughts to the mystery of the season or feast . . . "(25). Given this appropriate attention to song as part of the entrance, it is difficult to justify the direction in the following paragraph that, if there is no singing, the antiphon "is recited either by the faithful . . . [or] by the priest after the greeting." The veneration of the altar by the ministers is part of the entrance and may be enhanced by the use of incense. The older Roman tradition (and most Eastern traditions to this day) also include reverence to the book of the gospels. The entrance concludes with the (seemingly misplaced) sign of the cross and the greeting.

As we have noted above, the greeting was originally very simple, and the ancient forms are preserved in the missal of Paul VI along with two other substantially biblical greetings, also in the form of a ritual dialogue. The exchange depends for its vitality upon the awareness of being the Christian people; in turn, it enhances that common identity by expressing it ritually. The practice of appending or substituting more colloquial greetings or casual remarks would seem to miss this ritual point and to blur the integrity of the exchange as a typically Christian sign of mutual recognition and respect. Any additional spoken overture at this moment should be clearly in the form of an invitation or orientation to prayer and not a didactic "introduction" or exhortation.

Rite of Blessing and Sprinkling Holy Water

This memorial of baptism is provided for use on Sundays. It is especially appropriate during the Easter season, and may be indicated for other Sundays as well when Christian baptismal identity is a special focus of the celebration. Since the gesture of sprinkling the people would seem to call for a kind of procession through the community, use of this rite would suggest a simple entrance procession. When this rite is used, it replaces the penitential rite.

Penitential Rite

An innovation of the missal of Paul VI, the communal penitential rite presents particular problems. It would seem to be in continuity with the prayers at the foot of the altar of the previous missal, especially when the Confiteor is used, but that perception is mistaken since the previous practice was a private gesture. Indeed, the use of the Confiteor would seem almost always to be the least desirable option because of its heavily individualistic orientation. Such a redirection obviously confuses the professedly communal nature of the gathering itself and would seem to require a kind of retrieval of the community's attention. The second form provided is a kind of brief responsory which confesses sinfulness and calls for God's mercy. Its brevity, communal expression and confidence in God's mercy would recommend this option for simpler celebrations where a penitential emphasis is warranted. The third form for the penitential rite presents a series of litanie acclamations incorporating the Kyrie as a response. The models provided contain acclamations of praise and pleas for mercy in a way that suggests their aptness for Lent and at other more solemn gatherings with a penitential orientation. This form of the penitential rite has unfortunately come to be used as a kind of communal "examination of conscience" in some places. Surely this is a disruption and misdirection of the liturgy and a confusing reversion to a privatized spirituality, however covertly expressed. Finally, a word should be said of the invitations which open the penitential rite. While the first two options provided serve as useful models, the third, "... to prepare ourselves to celebrate ... let us call to mind our sins," is a most unfortunate translation of an infelicitous (Latin) original. This language expressly reverses the communal orientation of the gathering and brings the sense of confidence and joy in God's loving, merciful presence to full stop.

Gloria

The Gloria expresses in anthem form essentially the same sentiments as the litanie (third) form of the penitential rite in an expanded and more jubilant way. By tradition the singing of this anthem marks more festive and joyful occasions. It is difficult to understand how recitation (cf. G.I.R.M., 31) of the text could possibly realize a desirable result.

Prayer

The presider's opening prayer or collect concludes the act of gathering, formally opens the celebration and serves as a transition to the liturgy of the word. In its function as an opening, the prayer thematically introduces the mystery being celebrated. As a collect the prayer gathers into one the silent sentiments of the community and gives them collective expression, often in the form of a petition that the community might realize the fruits of the celebration. Clearly, the pause for silent prayer by all and the acclamation, "Amen", are integral elements of the prayer and contribute to its ritual function.

Gathering rites cannot succeed when they are trivialized by dull routine or when they are overblown into an "event" in themselves. They fulfill their purpose when they help people to grasp their Christian identity at worship and orient the assembly to the event which brings the community together. It would seem that this is only possible in the case of the Mass when care is taken to select from among the many disparate elements which are collected in the missal of Paul VI. Only such a careful selection will shape a coherent and unifying act of gathering for worship which leads naturally to the service which follows.

GESTURE AND MOVEMENT IN THE LITURGY

By gesture is meant all non-verbal action by the subject of the liturgy, ministers and assembly, involving the use of the human body as an instrument of meaningful communication. This rather broad category of gesture includes all movement (e.g., procession, dance) that involves the use of the body in meaningful non-verbal communication activity on the part of an individual or group. Such movement—individual or collective—involves spatial mobility.

The liturgical reform initiated by the Second Vatican Council both underscored the principle of active participation by the entire liturgical assembly and emphasized the place of gesture and movement in the liturgical action. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy states that "to promote active participation, the people should be encouraged to take part by means of acclamations, responses, psalmody, antiphons, and song, as well as by actions, gestures and bearing" (S.C., 30). Furthermore, the introduction of the vernacular and the presence of ministers who preside facing the assembly has brought about a new awareness of the need and importance of good and meaningful gesture and movement within the liturgy.

The use of gesture and movement within the liturgy rests solidly upon basic principles derived from anthropology, theology and liturgy.

Anthropological Principles

Because liturgy is an action of a community of persons bound together by a common faith that is given visible expression in precise ritual forms, it is also influenced by the basic principles of cultural anthropology.

The human body is both a source of individuation and of personal identity. But as a unity of spirit and matter, a person utilizes the bodily to give expression to the non-material. The body, therefore, becomes not only the primary symbol of the individual composite but also the instrument of communication by that individualized and unique unity that constitutes each human person.

When inserted into a given society, a person will make use of both verbal (e.g., language) and non-verbal (e.g., gesture) forms for the purpose of self-expression and interpersonal communication. The greater part of such processes, however, takes place on the level of the non-verbal. Within the context of a specific society, the individual through the process of socialization learns the acceptable and meaningful communication patterns of the culture on the verbal and non-verbal levels so that both forms can be used with meaning and profit. Because the verbal and non-verbal forms of expression are in fact culture-bound and therefore arbitrary, the meaning of the individual elements of communication and expression is not to be found in the elements themselves (e.g., a particular sound or gesture). Rather, the meaning of any element is an acquired or an attributed one, but at the same time one that has been agreed upon and accepted within a common cultural frame of reference. To use these elements in an idiosyncratic manner is to render meaningful human communication more difficult. Indeed, the very purpose of the elements is frustrated since they no longer bear or relate to the agreed upon meaning they have been given or have acquired within a specific cultural framework.

Finally, within a culture, the acceptable forms of verbal and non-verbal expression and communication remain open to possible mutation, addition or subtraction. Furthermore, even an existing form, while remaining the same, can actually be given or gradually assume a new meaning within a given cultural context. Such changes may be introduced by agents of change from within or from without the existing cultural system, attesting to both the dynamic character of culture and to the arbitrary nature of the various forms of its verbal and non-verbal expression.

As one can readily see, the general anthropological principles enunciated above are applicable, mutatis mutandis, to the specific area of the non-verbal elements (gestures and movement) employed in worship. The body is used in prayer. It is a means of expressing and communicating one's faith stance in worship. Since no language is inborn, the meaning of most gestures needs to be learned. Because of the dynamic elements of expression, gestures are open to change in both meaning and form.

Theological Principles

Moving now beyond the underlying principles offered by the behavioral and social sciences, we consider a second set of principles on the use of movement and gesture in the liturgy as found in Judaeo-Christian theology.

Creation Theology. Theological reflection on creation gives rise to two principles in our consideration of gesture and movement in the liturgy. The works of divine creation are good; the works of creation manifest the very nature of God.

The Christian believes that the works of creation are intrinsically good by the design of the Creator (see Gen 1:4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31). Any other belief would be a denial of the goodness of the Creator and the intrinsic value of the creative work of God. Furthermore, it is beyond the Christian belief to make a dichotomy between the material and spiritual realms of creation as if one were good and the other evil. Thus, when considering the human person, Christian theology does not repudiate the body because it is material and, therefore, of less value. Rather creation theology recognizes how the material and spiritual realms are integrally related in the plan of God, and that together they give glory to the Creator and work toward that final transformation of all creation. This is not to reject the presence of sin by the human person who by free will can mar the creative work of God.

If all creation is good, it is also revelatory, since in creation God is also engaged in self-manifestation. Therefore, all of creation is an expression of the wisdom and the love of the Creator who freely manifests his own nature in moving beyond himself in absolute freedom to create works completely distinct from his being. Such divine creative self-communication underscores the value of all our attempts to express ourselves in worship by the use of specific communicative and revelatory actions, including human gestures and movements.

Christology. It is in the person of Christ, the Incarnate Word, that we find manifested the full plan of creation and redemption. In creation Christ is the mediator. In the incarnation Christ is the sacrament of encounter with God. In the paschal mystery of death and resurrection he is revealed as the saving Redeemer. In the words, gestures, and movements of Christ, the Christian finds manifest Christ's own person and indeed, the three persons of the Trinity. Therefore, it is no wonder that the church, the body of Christ, employs in its worship the human language of verbal and non-verbal signs and symbols, gestures and movements.

Ecclesiology. The worshipping community offers worship in union with Christ. As a faith community that is both universal and local in nature, the church employs an array of signs, symbols, gestures and movements that might be either universal or local in meaning and expression. Incarnate in time and in space, the local church has no other option if it is to be and remain true to its very nature.

Legitimate diversity in ecclesial expression will follow when room is made for those variations and adaptations to different groups, regions and peoples that the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy permits and calls for (S.C., 38). This principle is as applicable to gesture and movement (non-verbal language) as it is to verbal communicative forms (e.g., vernacular usages, music, etc.).

Sacramental Theology. The sacraments as systems of verbal and non-verbal communication make present and effective the mystery symbolized. To refer to the sacraments as symbols is, at the same time, to recognize that they are the medium through which the mystery-reality is expressed, made present and effective. As a ritual process, human and tangible symbols are used, surrounded by select verbal and non-verbal cultural elements (such as gesture and movement) to both disclose the meaning of the sacrament and to convey the deepest expressions of the worshipping community.

Liturgical Theology. In the broad category of theology one can isolate several basic liturgical principles for the use of gestures and movement within the liturgy. The liturgy is an action by the faith community that involves the entire person. The deepest levels of faith and belief are expressed in both verbal and non-verbal forms. In this way active participation by the individual and community in the mystery celebrated is facilitated and externalized through such means as individual or collective gestures and movements.

This setting side by side of a series of repetitive verbal and non-verbal forms in the liturgy makes for ritual structures. Just as in ordinary human ritual patterns, liturgical rituals reinforce belief systems, bond the community, and disclose meaning. In the liturgical act, ritual elements such as gesture and movement contribute to both the expression and the understanding of the sacramental moment as well as to its particular efficacy.

The entire assembly and its various ministers have their particular roles within the liturgical act. Some gestures and movements might be common to all; others may be unique to individual ministries. Such role distinctions need to be respected also in the use of gestures and movements.

The type of gesture or movement used within the liturgy depends on its purpose. Furthermore, if it is to convey meaning, it must be executed in a way that is truly understandable and appropriate for the space and occasion. Unnecessary or repetitive use of gestures or movements can hinder both the communicative process and the transmission of meaning. Gestures and movements should be clear and marked by noble simplicity.

Thought should be given to using gestures and movements that come from and are expressive of the local worshipping community. Such is the present challenge in terms of the inculturation of the liturgy.

Liturgical Gestures

History. Since gestures and movements are intrinsically tied up with the communication process, it is no wonder that from the beginning, they have been employed in Christian worship. The NT and a study of the liturgical documents from the early church evidences their gradual development. With regard to the situation in the church of Rome as described in the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, it has been noted that "apart from the rite of total immersion, the laying-on of hands for confirmation, the laying-on of hands over the offerings by the concelebrants during the Eucharistic prayer and the laying of hands on bishops and priests during their ordination, and the laying-on of hands on the deacon by the bishop, there is no insistence of gesture symbols" (Nocent, 21). Even during the period after 313, the Peace of Constantine, when liturgical creativity spread, more attention was given to the development of texts (euchology) than to gestures and movements. The reason for this remains conjectural, although it could have come from the desire to distinguish Christianity from pagan religions by emphasizing the spiritual character of Christian worship. That the development of gestures was more significant in the East is attested to by Egeria in her late 4th century account of the liturgy in Jerusalem. Influenced by the Church in the East and the North (Franco-Germanic practices) the Roman church began to adopt additional symbols, gestures and movements in its liturgy while at the same time introducing some that were then unique to Rome (e.g., the fermentum). Roman ritual austerity prevailed until the end of the 13th century when an appreciable French influence was asserted on the Roman liturgy (i.e., the pontifical of William Durandus). For the greater part such practices remained inflexible until the reform initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

The operative principles in the Vatican reform of the Roman rite are found in the S.C. 21-40. The reform, based on sound theological, historical and pastoral principles, was introduced "in order that the Christian people may more surely derive an abundance of graces from the liturgy" (S.C., 21). More precisely, with reference to their ritual expression and content, the Vatican constitution directed that "the rites should be marked by a noble simplicity; they should be short, clear, and unencumbered by useless repetitions; they should be within the people's power of comprehension and as a rule not require much explanation" (S.C., 34). In the light of such directives the post-conciliar liturgical reform was undertaken. The results of the reform are evident in the revised liturgy of the Roman rite and reflected in the type, place and use of gestures.

Types of Gestures. The variety of liturgical gestures almost defies categorization. The function of the various gestures, however, suggests the form of classification presented here. It should be noted that a particular gesture may in fact be placed into more than one category depending upon its function and/or meaning. Whereas some liturgical gestures are biblical in origin, others are the result of cultural influences (e.g., Jewish, Roman, Byzantine, etc.).

1. Epicletic: The gesture of imposing hands while calling upon the Holy Spirit, invoking the power of God. As one of the oldest and most significant liturgical gestures, it is used in the eucharist, confirmation, ordination, etc.

2. Demonstrative: A movement of the hand intended to simply indicate or point out the attitude of the person (e.g., striking one's breast to show sorrow, humble repentance; kiss of peace to express reciprocal Christian love).

3. Unitive: A positioning of the hand intended to express moral unity with another (e.g., the optional gesture of priest concelebrants during the eucharistic institution narrative).

4. Salutatory: The gesture that accompanies a greeting as, for example, with the opening salutation of a liturgical service.

5. Signing: The gesture that accompanies the making of the sign of the cross, blessing, marking, etc.

6. Reverential: A gesture intended to express reverence or respect as in a bow, genuflection, incensation, a kiss, or as in the gesture of reverencing the altar, incensing a person, etc.

7. Utilitarian: A gesture that is employed for practical reasons as, for example, the breaking of the consecrated bread (fractio), the elevation of the consecrated bread for all to see, the washing of the hands after the distribution of ashes, etc. In some cases, the original purely functional gestures have been given a theological or spiritualized interpretation. The washing of hands after the reception of the gifts was originally a practical matter but was later interpreted as a gesture of seeking interior cleanliness. The mixing of water with wine was a common meal practice at the time of Christ in Palestine, Rome, and elsewhere, but in other cultures was given an allegorical interpretation in the liturgy (i.e., representing Christ's humanity and divinity or the blood and water that flowed from his side).

8. Postural: The gesture that is used in the very bearing of one's body in a particular position for a longer period, e.g., standing (expressing resurrection), orant posture (standing with hands extended in prayer), kneeling (expressing a penitential attitude), sitting (indicating authority or attentive listening), prostration (supplication), extended period of bowing (readiness to receive blessing, as in the solemn blessing of the eucharist), etc.

The Place of Gestures. In the celebration of the liturgy gestures are part of the entire communication genre of the ritual action. The rites themselves indicate not only what gestures are to be used but also their precise place within the structural flow. It was for this reason that in the recent revision of the various liturgical rites, attention was given not only to the written liturgical texts but also to the directives for the employment of gestural language on the part of both the ministers and the assembly.

A careful study of each rite reveals the place of non-verbal language within it. By way of illustration, the gestures that are used in the Rite for Reconciliation of Individual Penitents are spelled out here. In this particular rite of penance the non-verbal gestures, although limited, are part of the acceptable and required ritual language. An initial salutatory gesture is involved in the welcoming of the penitent: "The priest should welcome the penitents with fraternal charity" (D.O.L., 368, no. 16). The sign of the cross (signing gesture) is added to the introductory rites. The primary gesture accompanies the absolution. The priest extends his hands over the head of the penitent (or at least extends his right hand) as he begins the form of absolution (epicletic gesture) and concludes the words of absolution with the sign of the cross. The postural gesture of the penitent (sitting, kneeling) reflects the inner attitude of the person.

Use of Gestures. Although the precise place and nature of each non-verbal gesture is noted in the individual rites, the manner in which the ministers employ the prescribed gestures is significant. A poorly articulated language (verbal or non-verbal) is counterproductive in terms of communication and the transmission of the intended meaning. Liturgical gestures must be done with deliberate intent, care and reverence so that they serve as authentic bearers of the deeper levels of meaning. Commenting on gestures, the Consilium established for the implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy stated that "they will be effective as such only to the degree that they are motivated directly by an inner vision, the contemplation of mystery.

Careful observance of the rubrics, necessary though it is, is not enough here" (D.O.L., 42, no. 487).

In the use of gestures one must be aware of the difficulties that can arise. 1) The repetition of the same gestures on the part of ministers or assembly (e.g., the sign of the cross) can lead to a mechanical or perfunctory usage. In 1968 the Consilium raised the relevant question: "How can gestures that have become mechanical from habit, sloppy from routine, half-hearted from apathy still function as signs of the work of salvation?" (D.O.L. 42, no. 487). 2) There is the danger of reducing gestures to their bare minimum. In the process, however, their communicative value is proportionally lessened as is seen, for example, in the gesture of the minister who washes his finger tips rather than his hands, uses a few drops of water for the baptismal washing rather than flowing water or immersion, dabs the sick with oil rather than anointing them with generous and visible portions of oil, and reduces the sign of the cross at the final blessing of the assembled Sunday community to postage stamp proportions. 3) In some societies there is the danger of thinking that unless the gestures have utilitarian value, they have little or no significance and can be set aside easily. Such might be the case with the celebrant who refuses to proclaim the eucharistic prayer with hands in the outstretched, orant posture. 4) There is the danger of expanding gestures out of proportion and so disrupting the intended ritual flow of the liturgical act, thus blowing the one ritual element out of proportion in relation to the entire rite. As an example one might suggest the practice where the presider at the eucharist feels he must extend the sign of peace to each and every person in the community and in the process clericalizes the gesture and expands the ritual moment disproportionately.

Minister of Gestures. In the process of human communication the use of the body is natural to everyone. Liturgical body language as found in ritual gestures is not limited to one or the other person. Since all in the assembly are to become active participants in worship, all are invited to incorporate significant ritual gestures into their prayer. The time, place and manner in which one does so is, however, structured by the particular rite. The principle enunciated in the General Instruction of the Roman Missal is applicable to the use of gestures by the members of the liturgical assembly: "...all, whether ministers or laypersons, should do all and only those parts that belong to them, so that the very arrangement of the celebration itself makes the Church stand out as being formed in a structure of different orders and ministries" (D.O.L. 208, no. 58).

Meaning of Gestures. Like all gestures, liturgical gestures are open to various meanings. Simply stated, such gestures can have four levels of meaning: the ordinary, the contextual, the theological, and the symbolic-sacramental.

The first level of meaning is the ordinary, i.e., that which is given to gestures by one's culture—by the common understanding outside of the liturgical action and which is recognized even by the non-initiated (e.g., the use of water for cleansing). When placed in worship setting such gestures take on a second level of meaning (contextual) drawn from the understanding of the religious tradition. Thus a ritual washing in a specific liturgical context is recognized as Christian baptism. The theological meaning of gestures is that which is a result of theological reflection on scripture and ecclesial tradition. Thus, in the baptismal gesture one understands, in a doctrinal manner, the Christian teaching about new birth, cleansing from sin, etc. On the fourth and highest level of meaning, gestures reveal a sacramental meaning which involves both symbolic presence and efficacy. The celebrant's gestures in the celebration of Christian baptism, for example, reveal Christ's presence as the Constitution on the Liturgy clearly states: "By his power he [Christ] is present in the sacraments, so that when a man baptizes it is really Christ himself who baptizes" (S.C., 7). Moreover, the celebrant's gesture of pouring the baptismal water also speaks to the believer of the efficacy of the sacred symbol. This symbolic-sacramental level of meaning can best be illustrated in the general introduction to the Rite of Christian Initiation when it speaks about the effects of baptism: "Through baptism men and women are incorporated into Christ. They are formed into God's people and they obtain forgiveness of all their sins. They are rescued from the power of darkness and brought to the dignity of adopted children, a new creation through water and the Holy Spirit. Hence they are called and are indeed the children of God" (D.O.L. 720, no. 2251). This fourth level of meaning is comprehensible only with the eyes of faith.

Liturgical Movement

By liturgical movement is understood the purposeful transfer from one place to another of the human body by an individual or group for religious reasons within a liturgical action. Like gestures in general such planned movements are based on principles grounded in anthropology, theology, and liturgy. Recognition is given to the value of the human body in prayer, the ability of bodily movement to express and communicate inner sentiments of faith, and the need for personal active participation in worship. Rather than some sort of religious spectacle, rhythmic movements (including dance) are expressions of a person or persons engaged in communal prayer.

Types of Movements. In the liturgy of the West, movements from one place to another have been traditionally limited to various types of processions. More recently, however, in some cultures, Christian worship has begun to incorporate rhythmic movements and dance as expressive forms of prayer.

Processional Movements

Processions can be divided into three categories: functional, ordinary and extraordinary.

Functional Processions. Functional processions are those which are established elements of a given ritual structure. For this reason they are also called ritual or ceremonial processions. A liturgical rite may have its own proper functional processions. In the Order of the Mass, for example, there are functional processions in the introductory rites (opening procession), in the liturgy of the word (the procession with the book of the gospels), in the liturgy of the eucharist (at the presentation of the gifts), in the communion rite (the communion procession) and in the concluding rite (the closing procession). In the Order of Christian Funerals there are functional processions which involve the transfer of the body to the church and place of committal. The functional dimension of a procession does not exclude the possibility of other reasons for the movement. For example, the utilitarian purpose of moving the book of the gospels from the altar to the ambo is also a gesture of profound respect and reverence for the word of God.

Ordinary Processions. Those liturgical processions which are established in the liturgical books or by church custom for use during the course of the liturgical year are called ordinary processions. Among these are those held on: The Presentation of the Lord (blessing of candles and procession); Passion Sunday (Palm Sunday); the Easter vigil (Easter candle procession); the Body and Blood of Christ (Sunday after Trinity Sunday) with its blessed sacrament procession. In these ordinary processional movements the assembly commemorates with profound religious sentiments the various mysteries of the Lord. They are normally accompanied by other ritual elements, e.g., song, symbols, etc.

Extraordinary Processional Movements. Processions which are incorporated into the liturgical calendar by an episcopal conference or a local bishop are extraordinary processions. These are introduced because of the particular needs of peoples (e.g., the traditional Rogation Day procession in the fields on the feast day of St. Mark, April 25, to ward off pestilence) or to praise God through the honor and respect shown to certain saints (e.g., the traditional May procession honoring the Blessed Virgin), processions with specific relics, sacred images, etc. Such extraordinary processions are means of witnessing to the faith by public expressions of praise, petition, penance, etc.

With reference to processions in which the eucharist is carried in public, the 1973 Roman ritual entitled Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass leaves the advisability and the scheduling to the bishops. "It is for the local Ordinary to decide on both the advisability of such processions in today's conditions and on the time, place and plan for them that will ensure their being carried out with decorum and without any loss of reverence toward this sacrament" (D.O.L. 279, no. 2221).

History of Processional Movement.

The use of parades for civic occasions and of processions for religious motives is common to all peoples. The OT and the NT provide biblical bases for the Judaeo-Christian practice. The processional prototype is the OT Exodus theme (Exod 12) reflected in other passages such as the procession at the destruction of Jericho (Josh 6: 1-16), the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12: 27-43), etc. OT processional psalms indicate the presence of such movement among the chosen people (e.g., Psalms 24, 68, 118, 132). The NT recounts the procession that accompanied the triumphal entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem (Lk 19: 28-40). The development and use of processions in Western liturgy is witnessed to in the liturgical books developed after the Peace of Constantine (4th century) and the experience of Christian religious in the West. The development from simple and exceptional events to the elaborate and frequent ones is characteristic of the Middle Ages. In the Vatican II reform the position of processions was treated in the 1984 Ceremoniale Episcoporum (Chap. XXI).

Rhythmic Movement

In view of recent developments in the style of Christian worship in the West, rhythmic movement and dance have been recognized as acceptable forms of liturgical movement. The term "rhythmic liturgical movement" is used to describe a procession which is accompanied by a limited pattern of rhythmic bodily movement (e.g., two steps forward and one back) on the part of one or many persons, usually accompanied by vocal or instrumental music. The rhythm is a unifying element; it binds together the various elements of ritual expression: body, spirit, music and gesture. Rhythmic movement has been introduced locally with several ritual elements: the entrance procession, responses to the proclamation of the word, presentation of gifts, acclamations, the Lord's Prayer, post-communion praise, and recessional.

Liturgical dance may be defined as the series of rhythmical motions and steps set to purposeful dance forms and patterns to express authentic sentiments of prayer in public worship.

History of Rhythmic Liturgical Movement. In the Roman rite rhythmic liturgical movement is of recent development. After Vatican II local communities (e.g., African, Indian and North American black communities) began to incorporate rhythmic movement as culturally valid expressions of faith. Such dance patterns at times reflect practices used in non-Catholic communities.

In 1988 the Congregation for Divine Worship confirmed the use of The Missal for the Dioceses of Zaire in which the incorporation of rhythmic movements during a eucharistic celebration within the Roman rite was officially approved. The general instruction to the Zaire eucharistic liturgy, as presented in Notitiae (Vol. 24, 1988) states that: "Rhythmic movements which express the participation of the body in prayer are done by the assembly as it remains in place during the entrance procession, during the acclamation chant after the assembly has placed itself in the presence of God, during the presentation of the gifts and the recessional" (no. 28). Furthermore, the same general introduction to the Zairian liturgy states that "the dance around the altar, done by the ministers during the Gloria or its equivalent, during the incensation of the altar, shows the desire to communicate with the force of life which radiates from the altar, the sacrifice of Christ" (no. 29).

Style of Liturgical Movement. The style of processions and rhythmic movement within the liturgy is determined by a number of factors. Among these are: 1) the specific liturgy being celebrated; 2) the size of the assembly; 3) the cultural context; 4) the environment where the movement is to occur; 5) and existing liturgical norms.

In every case the movement is to be carried out in a becoming manner with the avoidance of that which speaks of the pompous, spectacular, theatrical and entertaining. It is to be authentic expression of communal prayer.

General Conclusion

Word, gesture and movement to one degree or another have always been used to communicate and express religious belief and sentiments. The audio and the visual go together; word and gesture are mutually supporting. At a time when Western liturgical expression tends toward the wordy, the use of the non-verbal, when done in an appropriate and careful manner, is especially welcome.

Good liturgy engages and expresses the entire human person. It is humanly holistic. Gestures and movement add a necessary dimension to religious expressions that can too easily remain on the abstract, intellectual and cerebral plane. The entire person must be encouraged to participate fully in the liturgical action. In this regard catechesis might be needed to assist individuals to understand the higher levels of meaning associated with both gesture and movement.

Gesture and movement have a ministerial role within the liturgy. Like other accepted and encouraged artistic forms, they serve as vehicles for a fuller and richer expression of the prayer of the assembly. Their incorporation in the liturgy "must flow from the community itself as it seeks an authentic, visible, cultural expression of its inner faith stance before the ineffable mystery of God" (Krosnicki, 352).

The competent authorities need to adapt gestures and movements to the felt psychological, cultural and religious needs of the community. This is the case, for example, in eucharistic liturgies with children. The 1973 Directory for Masses with Children observes that "if, in accord with the norm of the General Instruction of the Roman Missal, a conference of bishops adapts the congregation's actions at Mass to the mentality of a people, it should take the special condition of children into account or should decide on adaptations that are for children only" (D.O.L. 276, no. 2166). All of the revised Roman rites indicate areas where adaptations by conferences of bishops, local bishops and individual ministers can be made. Little has been done in this area; it remains the agenda for the future.

GESTURES, LITURGICAL

In the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the church acknowledged the necessary participation of the whole person in liturgical worship: "To promote active participation, the people should be encouraged to take part by means of acclamations, responses, psalmody, antiphons and songs, as well as by actions, gestures and bearing" (S.C.30). This engagement of the person is accomplished not only by means of verbal communication but by non-verbal as well.

Human communication consists of complex systems of interaction. One can speak of verbal language systems which convey ideas through words and sentences, and emotions through pitch and intensity. A non-verbal language system can complement a verbal with gestures that interpret the verbal (e.g., sign language) or with gestures and actions that emphasize the verbal (e.g., striking the breast in the confiteor). A non-verbal language system is not dependent on the verbal, however. Gestures and actions can express the intensity of an emotion without any verbal component. Postures can express relationships between persons without need for verbal articulation.

Religious rituals are no different from ordinary human rituals in their use of verbal and non-verbal languages. In religious rituals, however, the communication happens not only between persons but also is directed toward God. Religious ritual is therefore specially suited to a non-verbal communication that is evocative and symbolic. The history and praxis of Judeo-Christian prayer reveals the significant role that bodily movements, actions and gestures play in liturgical worship.

In this article, under the heading "liturgical gestures," we include all those postures, gestures and bodily actions used by presider, other ministers and people in the liturgical assembly. Liturgical gesture can be categorized by those actions of the body which: a) express or embody an interior attitude (e.g., folding or opening and lifting hands); b) serve a symbolic purpose (e.g., the imposition of hands as a symbol of empowerment); c) express the relationship between persons in the assembly (e.g., joining hands for the Our Father) or between the assembly and the transcendent (e.g., genuflection and kneeling); and, d) serve a functional purpose (e.g., movement of a person from one place to another in order to perform an action).

Certain of these postures, gestures and actions can fall into multiple categories. An entrance procession, e.g., (a) expresses a particular attitude of celebration; (b) can symbolize a journey of the people; (c) expresses the relationship of the people who are gathering; and, (d) is functional in that it moves people and ministers to the place where the liturgical action will be).

Definitions

Posture. A posture is a position of the whole body that is set by a preliminary action and sustained for a period of time.

Ordinary postures in liturgical worship include standing, sitting, kneeling and prostration. Postures can be expressive of different attitudes (e.g., respect, reverence, awe, adoration, supplication, contrition, attentiveness). They can be symbolic (the standing posture as symbolic of the dignity of the human person). Postures express the different relationships within the assembly because of the variation of spatial levels (the assembly kneels while the presider stands for the eucharistic prayer). They can also be functional (sitting is the most comfortable posture for listening). Postures are often complemented by specific gestures or positions of the arms and hands (e.g., standing with arms raised in the "orans" position, sitting with hands in open or folded position, kneeling with head bowed, lying prostrate with arms extended in cross position).

Uniformity of posture is demanded by the communal nature of liturgical worship: "The uniformity in standing, kneeling, or sitting to be observed by all taking part is a sign of the community and unity of the assembly; it both fosters and expresses the spiritual attitude of those taking part" (G.I.R.M., 20).

Actions. Bodily actions are ordinarily movements of the whole body that change the position of the body in space or through space. Ordinary liturgical actions are genuflection, turning (orientation), bowing, and procession. There is as well a special class of liturgical actions that have a privileged role as primary sacramental actions: immersion, anointing, imposition of hands, breaking bread and pouring wine. Certain of these do not involve the whole body but are categorized as actions because of their special significance. Actions, like postures, can be many things. They may express interior attitudes (e.g., genuflection expresses reverence and respect). They can be symbolic (e.g., turning to the east as symbol of resurrection). They are sometimes relational (e.g., bowing before altar, book or sacred elements). And they may be functional (e.g., processions move persons from one place to another).

Gestures. Gestures are movements of some part of the body, usually the hands or arms, which have an expressive or symbolic purpose. Ordinary gestures include signing of the cross, kissing of sacred objects, kissing or greeting of persons (sign of peace), elevation of arms or hands, eyes or object, extension of hands (reception of communion), blessing of objects or persons.

Liturgical gestures therefore, include a wide range of physical movement which combine functional, expressive, symbolic, and relational elements. The following study of each of the postures, gestures and actions will further illustrate the purpose of each in the liturgical assembly.

Postures

Standing. In general this posture expresses an attitude of respect between persons (one usually stands when someone enters a room). It also defines the relationship between persons (one stands in the presence of an authority or one of greater rank). Standing is the posture that symbolizes human readiness (one is able to move easily from this posture). It has also come to symbolize human dignity.

Because of its primary meaning as an expression of respect, standing has been the principal posture of Judaeo-Christian prayer. This tradition is rooted in the scriptures. The description of the reading of the Law from the prophet Nehemiah gives an instance of the standing posture in the liturgical assembly: "And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people, for he was above all the people; and when he opened it all the people stood. And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God and all the people answered, 'Amen, Amen,' lifting up their hands; and they bowed their heads and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground" (Neh 8:5-7). Other texts which illustrate the standing posture for prayer and receiving the word of God include: Exod 20:21; 33:10; Neh 9:5; and Dan 10:11. As a symbol of "readiness" standing is the posture for the celebration of the Passover meal (Exod 12:11).

Standing for prayer continues to be the model in the gospels. In Mk 11:25, Jesus says, "When you stand to pray. . . ." Both the Pharisee and the publican stand in prayer even though there is a difference in attitude (Lk 18:11-13).

This traditional posture of prayer derived from the Jewish tradition finds a new symbolism in light of the experience of the resurrection and the expectation of Christ's second coming. Paul uses the standing posture as a symbol of a slavery that has ended (Gal 5:1; Eph 6:14). The book of Revelation adds the dimension of "worthiness" to stand in the presence of God, and the "readiness" in waiting for Christ's coming again in glory (Rev 7:9).

This posture of standing for prayer with hands uplifted continues to be the ordinary posture of Christian prayer in the earliest centuries. It is evidenced in paintings in the catacombs and in a number of writings in the early period. These writers reinforce the liturgical custom of standing for prayer, but specifically interpret its meaning in the light of the resurrection.

According to Tertullian (De Oratione, 23, C.C.L. 1:271-2) Christians stand on Sundays and during Easter time as a symbol of the joy of the resurrection. They are forbidden to fast and to kneel during these times (De Corona Militis 3, C.C.L. 2:1043). This is echoed by Jerome when he says, "it is a time of joy and of victory when we do not kneel or bow to the earth, but risen with Christ, we are raised to the heavens" (Epist. ad Ephes. pro. P.L. 26:472). Justin, in his Questions to the Orthodox (115 P.G. 6:1363) says

"we do not kneel on Sundays as a sign of the resurrection through which we are freed from our sin by the grace of Christ."

An explicitly eschatological dimension is given in the interpretation of Basil (Treatise on the Holy Spirit, 27): "we stand to pray not only because, risen with Christ and seeking the things that are above, we recall to our memory the day consecrated to the Resurrection but because this day is an image of the time to come" (P.G. 32:190-191).

These patristic writers give clear testimony to the symbolic and relational dynamic of the standing posture for the early Christians. As a paschal people made worthy to stand in the presence of God through their share in the resurrection of Christ, Christians stand ready to greet him when he comes again. In the contemporary liturgical context, standing is once again the principal posture of Christian prayer: "At every Mass the people should stand from the beginning of the entrance song or when the priest enters until the end of the opening prayer or collect; for the singing of the Alleluia before the gospel; while the gospel is proclaimed; during the profession of faith and the general intercessions; from the prayer over the gifts to the end of the Mass except at the places indicated later in this paragraph" (G.I.R.M., 21).

Kneeling. This posture can signify supplication and adoration. It can have as well a penitential meaning or it can be a posture for private prayer. The power of this posture as supplication comes from the obvious difference of levels between the one who is entreating and the one being entreated, as in Mt 18:26: "So the servant fell on his knees, imploring him, 'Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay you everything.'" Its power as a posture of adoration is evidenced in Psalm 95: "Come, let us worship and bow down, let us kneel before the Lord, Our Maker," and in Paul's letter to the Ephesians (3:14): "For this reason, I bow my knees before the Father."

The sense of "awe" before the Creator moves the person "to the knees." This same sense of "awe" is coupled with a sense of unworthiness in the example of Peter falling to his knees in Lk 5:8: "When Simon Peter saw it, he fell down at Jesus' knees saying, 'Depart from me for I am a sinful man.'" Jesus himself uses this posture of private prayer as he prays in the garden before his passion in Lk 22:41: "And he withdrew from them about a stone's throw and knelt down and prayed." Stephen kneels to pray before his martyrdom (Acts 7:60).

In the earliest centuries kneeling was seen to be inappropriate for celebration of the Sunday eucharist and during the Easter season because of its penitential and private association. It was forbidden during the Easter season by Canon 20 of the Council of Nicea. St. Irenaeus gives the reasoning behind the prohibition: "the practice of not kneeling on the Lord's Day is a symbol of the resurrection by which, thanks to Christ, we have been delivered from sin and from the death which he put to death (Fragment 7 of a treatise on Easter; P.G. 7:1234).

Although the patristic witnesses acknowledge the appropriate use of standing for prayer on Sundays and during the Easter season they also affirm the use of kneeling for prayer as an expression of penitence and humility. For example, Tertullian: "As for other times, who would hesitate to bow before God, at least for the first prayer by which we begin the day. And on the days of fasting, all the prayers are made kneeling" (De oratione, 23; C.C.L. 1:272).

Origen echoes this sentiment in his treatise "On Prayer" when he says that "one ought to kneel when one accuses oneself before God of his own sins and supplicating God to be healed and pardoned" (Peri Euxus 31; P.G. 11:552).

An example of the use of kneeling for prayer in the first centuries is given in the Apostolic Constitutions which details the liturgical practice for penitents and catechumens during the ordination of a bishop. They are invited to kneel as the deacon leads the community in prayer for them. They then rise for the presider's prayer and bow their heads for his blessing. The whole community kneels for the "universal prayer" and then stands for the presider's prayer and blessing. (Apost. Const. 8:6.8-12.2).

During the Middle Ages there is a significant change in this ancient practice of kneeling before the oration. Jungmann describes it as such: "A new thing had appeared, or rather a substitution: kneeling not before but during the oration. This change concurred with the gradual contraction of the pause which the 'Flectamus genua' implied. The Ordo Romanus antiquus (about 950) offers a transitional aspect . . . 'Let us pray. Let us kneel. Almighty and eternal God . . . Let us stand.' Thus the pause during which the congregation was to pray was filled with the priest's oration" (pp. 245-246).

The increasing popularity and use of kneeling throughout the liturgical service is evidenced in Canon 37 of the Synod of Tours (813) which insists on kneeling as the ordinary posture of prayer, except for Sundays and solemnities. The emphasis in the 13th cent. on eucharistic adoration (i.e., the "real presence") intensifies the need not only for kneeling during the penitential and confessional moments of prayer but also for adoration during the canon. In the Ordo of John Burchard (1502) the people kneel throughout except for the gospel. For sung Masses, Sundays, or feasts or ferias in the Easter season, the people kneel for the confession and stand until the "adoration" in the canon during which they kneel. They then stand until the dismissal. This is also the first evidence of the priest's genuflection after the words of consecration.

It is clear that during the Middle Ages there was a dramatic change in understanding of the identity and role of the assembly. Their identity as circumstantes, made worthy to stand around the table through Christ's resurrection, had changed to penitentes, unworthy even to behold the sacred elements. Their role as active participants in worship was gradually delegated to the choir in the sung Mass and to acolytes in the low Mass. Private prayer, penance and distant adoration became the dominant mode of eucharistic worship which continued to the 20th century. Even reception of communion, when it took place, happened kneeling at the altar rail. Kneeling, therefore, was the most appropriate posture given this role and identity of the assembly.

Although the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy has returned to the assembly its rightful role as full participants, there has been a reluctance to restore the original identity of the assembly as equals to the priest/presider, specifically at the time of the consecration of the elements. This moment continues to be interpreted as one which demands the adoration of the assembly although the General Instruction on the Roman Missal does allow for variation if the people are "prevented by the lack of space, the number of people present, or some other good reason" (21).

There is presently a wide variety of practice in this use of the standing and kneeling postures during the eucharistic prayer. Some communities stand throughout despite the official legislation. Some kneel immediately after the Sanctus and rise after the Great Amen. Some kneel only throughout the Institution Narrative. In some communities one can find some who kneel and some who stand. There is also variation in the posture at the acclamation, "Lamb of God": some churches opt for kneeling as an expression of adoration and others for standing in readiness to receive the Lord.

Excluding the use of kneeling for the consecration, contemporary practice has reserved this ancient posture for private prayer and devotion and occasional liturgical use. There are a number of special uses of the kneeling posture in the Holy Week services, especially at the transference and exposition of the Sacrament at the conclusion of the Holy Thursday eucharist as a sign of adoration and also at the beginning of the Good Friday service when the presider prostrates himself as a sign of penance and total submission.

Sitting. This posture signifies presence and repose and as such is used by the one who presides with authority over a group as well as by those who receive instruction. The person with power and authority sits on a special seat or throne to judge, rule or preside. "You will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of Power" (Mk 14:62). Jesus often teaches his disciples from a seated position, as in the sermon on the mount (Mt 5:1), or, after he has read from the scripture, he sits before he begins to interpret them (Lk 4:20). The person who listens with attention also adopts the seated position: "Mary sat at the Lord's feet and listened to his teaching" (Lk 10:39).

In contemporary liturgical practice, the seated posture is used during times of reflection, meditation, and reception of instruction: "The people should sit during the readings before the gospel and during the responsorial psalm, for the homily and the presentation of the gifts, and, if this seems helpful, during the period of silence after communion" (G.I.R.M., 21). Although the seated posture was ordinarily reserved for the presider/bishop in the early centuries and was not available for the assembly because of the lack of seats in church, this posture has become an integral part of the church's worship in the liturgical renewal.

Prostration. This dramatic posture signifies complete submission to a greater power and a sense of unworthiness. Its use in scripture is in circumstances that reveal intensity of feeling before God, e.g., the call of Abraham (Gen 17:2). Jesus falls prostrate on the ground in the intensity of his prayer in the garden (Mt 26:39). This posture can be seen as a more dramatic supplication than kneeling and has been used in this way in liturgical worship, especially for penitents and catechumens in the first centuries (Jungmann, p.302).

The present use includes the beginning of the Good Friday service, although kneeling is optional. It is prescribed as well during ordination and consecration rites as a posture of intense prayer while the litany of the saints is being sung.

There are two kinds of prostrations: on both knees with the face to the ground and the full prostration with the whole body extended lengthwise. One probable reason for the substitution of the simple kneeling position with head bowed for the prostration is the obvious lack of space to execute this posture properly in a crowded church space. The present environment in most worship spaces with pews or seating arrangements mitigates against this ancient posture although it continues to be used in monastic communities and in some churches that provide open spaces for prayer.

Actions

Bowing. This action of inclining the head or torso expresses the interior attitude of respect and reverence toward a person or object. The action of bowing reveals one's relationship to the other person through the lowering of the head or torso which changes the focus and level of encounter. Bowing is an abbreviated form of prostration.

In the OT, bowing is symbolic of a people's recognition of the power of a deity: "You shall not bow down to their gods" (Exod 23:24). In the Psalms it signifies the adoration due to the sovereign God: "There is none like thee among the gods, O Lord, nor are there any works like thine. All the nations thou hast made shall come and bow down before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name" (Ps. 86).

Bowing is traditionally the action associated with receiving a blessing. Numerous evidences of the deacon's call, "Bow your heads to receive God's blessing," are found in the Apostolic Constitutions. Cesaire of Arles (A.D. 532) says in his Sermon 77, "Each time the deacon invites you with a loud voice to pray, bow faithfully not only your heart but also your body." He continues to chastise those who are not willing to make this sign of humble adoration. "Those who neglect kneeling for prayer and lowering the head for benediction are those who choose to chat rather than sing." Even the sick are expected to curve the back and lower the head (C.C.L. 103:316-7).

A more profound bow from the waist is called for at moments which demand a momentary expression of adoration, i.e., the doxology. This action of respect and adoration has always played an important role in the liturgy of the Eastern churches. It has unfortunately been replaced by the genuflection in the Western liturgy which is mistakenly understood as a fuller expression of adoration. Genuflection is in fact a more awkward action for the human body to execute and in practice does not express the reverence and grace of a profound bow. In popular practice, however, the profound bow is beginning to replace the genuflection, even when the genuflection is prescribed.

Bows of the head at the mention of the divine names, the name of Jesus and Mary, as well as the name of the saint whose feast is celebrated are prescribed in contemporary liturgy. Bows of the body are reserved for the presider as he reverences the altar and for the whole assembly at the words of the creed "and he became flesh of the virgin Mary" (G.I.R.M., 234).

Genuflection. This action which is a "bow or bend of the knee" is an abbreviated version of the posture of kneeling and as such it expresses respect or veneration. In the early church it was rejected because of its association with adoration of the emperor and in some places with the mockery of Jesus in his passion (Mt 27:29; Mk 15:19).

With the popularity of kneeling becoming more in evidence, however, it is understandable that this abbreviated form of the posture of kneeling would take the place of the bow in those places in the liturgy that called for a momentary action of adoration. In fact, there is a gradual development in which genuflection is less associated with moments of prayer and more with salutation of authorities and veneration of sacred objects. By the 4th cent., genuflection became the sign of veneration of the cross during the liturgy of Good Friday in Jerusalem, as is evidenced by Egeria the Pilgrim (C.C.L. 175:81). The Council of Nicea (787) approved genuflection before images. And in the first Roman Ordo (A.D. 950), the deacon kneels for a moment to kiss the feet of the bishop of Rome as a sign of adoration. In the Ordo of John Burchard (1502), the priest genuflects after the words of consecration while the assembly is kneeling throughout the prayer. The Roman Missal of Pius V (1572) establishes genuflection and kneeling as the primary action and posture of adoration.

Genuflection had become the preferred action of reverence and adoration for the ministers who were unable to lead the prayer in the kneeling position yet who were expected to adore and venerate the consecrated species or other sacred objects or persons.

In today's liturgy, genuflection is prescribed as an act of adoration for the presider after the elevation of the host and chalice and before communion. It is as well the action of adoration before the tabernacle (G.I.R.M., 233). In the creed, on the feasts of Annunciation and Christmas, genuflection replaces the bow at the words, "he became flesh" (G.I.R.M., 98).

Turning (Orientation). Early Christians found an obvious symbolism in turning toward the east for prayer because of the rising of the sun and its association with the resurrection of Jesus. Origen says, "We pray to the east, the origin of light" (Peri Euxus, 32; P.G.11:557-8).

Christians were thought to be worshippers of the sun because of this eastward orientation (Tertullian, Apol. 16, 9-10; C.C.L. 1:116). Or as Basil explains, "We look to the east, but there are only a few who know that we are searching for an ancient homeland, paradise, which God planted in Eden, in the east" (On the Holy Spirit, 27; P.G. 32:190-191).

This priority given toward turning to the east for prayer created the habit of building churches with an eastward orientation as well as the presider's leading the prayer facing the east with the assembly and only turning toward them for the blessing.

Other churches built in the westward or basilican position allowed the presider to face the assembly throughout the entire service. It is this orientation of presider facing the assembly which is in use in contemporary worship because of the primary need to be seen and heard in leading the community in prayer.

Processions. This action which involves a number of people moving forward with a definite purpose can be expressive of different interior attitudes depending on the liturgical context. A funeral procession is dramatically different from a wedding procession because of the human context. The procession on Good Friday to venerate the cross has a different emotional content than the procession with palms on Passion Sunday. In other words, there are different attitudes expressed in these processions, i.e., adoration, festive celebration, supplication. Processions are usually accompanied by litany or song which are indicative of their mood and intent.

Within a liturgical context there are those processions which involve the whole assembly moving from a gathering place outside the church into the nave and sanctuary. The procession with candles and light on the Feast of the Presentation, that of carrying palms on Passion Sunday, and the Easter vigil procession led by the paschal candle are examples of this kind of gathering. Other processions that involve the whole assembly within the liturgical service include the procession to the table for communion and the veneration of the cross on Good Friday. There are also those processions which involve a limited number of persons, usually the ministers, with the assembly joining in song or in silence, regarding the procession as one beholds a parade. These include the entrance procession in the Roman rite and the small and great entrances in the Oriental rites, the gospel procession, that of the newly baptized, the procession with the holy oils at the Mass of Chrism and the transfer of the eucharist at the conclusion of the Holy Thursday liturgy.

Processions are not only expressive of interior attitudes but serve a strong symbolic purpose as well. Central to the symbolic experience of Jews and Christians is the "Exodus," the journey of God's people toward the "promised land." Processions are evocative of this experience as well as others that evoke the sense of a people moving together purposefully.

Processions with rhythmic movement are becoming more popular in African liturgy, especially in the approved "Roman rite for the diocese of Zaire." These kinds of processions wed music and rhythm together with the movement of the body and are not simply "walking processions." Even in western cultures attempts are being made to introduce rhythmic movement as an important component of processional form.

There is as well a rich tradition of procession outside the liturgical celebration as an expression of faith or solemn supplication, i.e., Marian processions, penitential processions in the Middle Ages, processions with the blessed sacrament, especially on the feast of Corpus Christi.

Sacramental Actions. There is a special class of liturgical actions that have a privileged place in the repertoire of liturgical gestures because of their essential use in the sacramental life of the church. They are imposition of hands, immersion and pouring water, anointing, breaking of bread and pouring wine. Each is grounded in scripture and has always played a primary role in the celebration of sacraments and as such are symbolic actions.

Gestures

Liturgical gestures use some part of the body to express an interior attitude, i.e., the elevation of hands and eyes, folding the hands together, striking the breast. They are used as well to express a specific relationship to a person or sacred object, i.e., kissing the altar, gospel book or kiss of peace. Other liturgical gestures have a primarily symbolic purpose, i.e., the sign of the cross, extension of the hands in blessing.

Elevation of Eyes and Hands. The classic posture of prayer, the orans position for early Christians, includes the raising of eyes and hands. In Jesus' prayer he often would "raise his eyes toward heaven" (Jn 6:5; 11:41). Paul urges the community to pray "lifting holy hands" (1 Tim 2:8). Origen says, "as there are many dispositions of the body, it is uncontested that those which consist in raising hands and eyes should be preferred above all, for the body brings to prayer the image of the qualities of the soul" (Peri Euxus, 31; P.G. 11:552). Tertullian sees the image of the crucified Christ in this position. "Not only do we raise our hands, but we raise them in a cross like our Lord in his passion, and by this attitude we confess Christ" (De Oratione 14; C.C.L. 1:265).

Although this gesture was clearly the preferred way of praying for early Christians, subsequent developments which emphasized the kneeling position for the assembly diminished its use. It was replaced by the folding of the hands together, a gesture which was more suitable to private prayer and the kneeling position and whose derivation seems to come from the Frankish feudal custom of a vassal presenting himself to his lord. The orans position was left to the presider alone.

In the contemporary life of the church, the charismatic renewal has "recovered" this way of prayer for the whole assembly during the eucharistic prayer. There is also evidence that communities are beginning to pray the "Our Father" with open and extended hands. In general use, however, this classic position of prayer has not yet recovered its rightful place.

Striking the Breast. This dramatic gesture expresses an interior attitude of repentance, humility and extreme sorrow. In the gospel of Luke, it is used by the tax collector, who "standing far off, would not even lift up his eyes to heaven, but beat his breast, saying, 'God, be merciful to me, a sinner!'" (Lk 18:13). It is likewise the gesture used by the witnesses of the crucifixion (Lk 23:48). St. Augustine cautions against the overuse of this gesture for those who strike their breast every time they hear the word "Confiteor" (Serm. 67,1; P.L. 38:443).

Its use in contemporary worship is limited to the confession of faults and by some as an accompanying gesture with the "Lamb of God."

Kissing the Altar, Gospel Book and Cross. This gesture expresses a reverence and respect for sacred objects, especially those which symbolize Christ. The kiss as a gesture of honor and respect was taken over from the ancient custom of kissing the threshold of the temple as well as the images of the gods. As early as the 4th century the saluting of the altar with a kiss made its appearance as a popular practice. In the Middle Ages, the rubrics called for the priest's kissing the altar frequently throughout the ritual, and the gospel book before the proclamation (Jungmann pp. 210-211, 287).

This practice has continued in contemporary worship, although the altar is revered only at the beginning and end of the liturgy. This same attitude of reverence expressed through a kiss is found in the veneration of the cross on Good Friday.

Kiss of Peace. This gesture, which expresses an attitude of interior peace, was used by early Christians as a seal of the prayer which had preceded it. As Tertullian says, "What prayer is complete without the holy kiss?" (De Oratione, 18; C.C.L. 1:267).

Jungmann details the development of this "seal and pledge" of prayer in this way: "The original place of the kiss of peace was, in reality, at the end of the service of readings and prayers rather than at the start of the Sacrifice-Mass. According to the ancient Christian conception, it formed the seal and pledge of the prayers that preceded it. But after the service of readings and prayers had been joined to the celebration of the Eucharist, regard for our Lord's admonition (Mt 5:23 f.) about the proper dispositions in one who wishes to make an offering would probably have led to placing the kiss of peace (as guarantee of fraternal sentiment) closer to the moment when one is 'bringing his gift before the altar'" (p.480).

At a very early date (5th century), the peace was proclaimed after the canon as a pledge of the assent of the people to the eucharistic prayer that had preceded it. With the insertion of the "Our Father" after the canon at the time of Gregory the Great, the kiss of peace became an illustration of the words: "as we forgive those who trespass against us."

Although the kiss of peace has retained this place in contemporary eucharistic liturgy, there is a tendency on the part of many presiders to move it to its original place at the completion of the liturgy of the word, before the gifts are presented. There is as well a tendency on the part of the assembly to see it not so much as a formal, ritual gesture but rather as an opportunity to exchange greetings. There are some who object to this transformation of a reverent, ritual gesture into an opportunity for "socializing." It is perhaps the absence of any moment of greeting each other at the beginning of the ritual that has brought about this social exchange at the time of the peace.

Sign of the Cross. This distinctively Christian gesture symbolizes a person's unity with Christ, confessing the cross as central to the mystery of salvation and confirming one's identity as a Christian. In the early centuries it was common to sign the forehead with great frequency as Tertullian attests: "at every forward step and movement . . . in all the ordinary actions of daily life" (De Corona Militis, chap.3; C.C.L. 1:1043). Making the sign of the cross on the forehead was thus seen as a way of strengthening oneself in one's Christian identity.

It is clear that this tangible sign of the cross was associated with the administration of the sacraments, especially those of initiation, as Augustine relates: "Only when the sign of the cross is made on the foreheads of the faithful, as on the water itself with which they are regenerated, or on the oil with which they are anointed with chrism, or on the sacrifice with which they are nourished, are any of these things duly performed" (Tract. in Joan. 118; P.L.35 p.1950).

The custom of signing on the forehead, lips and breast before the reading of the gospel as well as signing the book comes from the 11th century and remains as a ritual gesture for the assembly. The multiple signings throughout the canon in the Tridentine liturgy have been reduced in the present ritual to one sign of the cross during the epiclesis.

Although the sign of the cross was traced on the forehead, or other parts of the body in the early centuries, by the 8th century there is evidence of the sign being made with the first three fingers of the right hand, tracing the sign from the forehead, to the chest, to the right shoulder and then the left. This custom has continued in the Greek church. In the Latin church, a change was made in the 13th century and one adopted the modern usage which consists of holding the hand open and moving from left to right (H. Leclercq, pp.1343-44).

The sign of the cross which begins so much of Roman Catholic prayer with its accompanying words, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," is meant to have a clear baptismal reference. The efficacy of this sign as a blessing, confession of faith and identification with the mystery of Christ continues to make it a primary symbolic gesture for many Christians.

Extension of the Hands in Blessing. This gesture symbolizes the transmission of power from one person to another or to the assembly. In the OT, there are many references to the extension of one's hands as an expression of power. Moses "stretches out his hand over the sea . . . and the waters were divided" (Exod 14:21). When his hands grow weary in the Israelites' battle with the Amalekites, Aaron and Hur hold his hands up until the victory is accomplished (Exod 17:11-12). The Lord God "with a mighty hand and outstretched arm" brings back his people (Ezek 20:33).

This gesture of outstretched arms and hands is the primary one associated with blessing at the end of the eucharistic and other liturgies. The imposition of hands in the rites of initiation, ordination, reconciliation and healing derives its meaning from this gesture. In these cases, however, there is the added dimension of human touch as it communicates power and grace to another person.

Extension of the Hands for Communion. The practice of receiving communion in the hand in the early centuries was given a symbolic meaning as is evidenced in the Mystagogic Catechesis of the 4th century: "When you approach, do not go stretching out your open hands or having your fingers spread out, but make the left hand into a throne for the right will receive the King, and then cup your open hand and take the body of Christ, reciting the Amen. Then sanctify with all care your eyes by touching the Sacred Body and receive it" (Jungmann, p. 508). The present discipline of the church encourages the return to this ancient practice of communion received in the hands.

Other Gestures. It is a natural human tendency to express oneself through bodily gestures and actions. Despite an official reticence to allow spontaneous expression in the church's liturgy, there has been a desire on the part of many to include a fuller range of gestural expression. It is now common for the assembly to join hands during the "Our Father" if it is spoken, or to use gestures if it is sung. Moments of acclamation, i.e., gospel Alleluia, eucharistic acclamations, are often accompanied by some gestures. The influence of contemporary liturgical music has led to the inclusion of simple, prayerful gestures throughout the service. Leaders of song or animators of the assembly use a variety of gestures to engage the community in song.

Although these gestures are not legislated, they contribute to the active participation called for by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. It is especially important in liturgies for children that they be engaged by means of gestures and postures as is indicated in the Directory for Masses with Children (33,34).

Conclusion

Liturgical gestures offer the assembly of the faithful a wealth of expressive and symbolic movements, postures and actions which not only enhance communal prayer but are in themselves a non-verbal language of prayer. The continuing challenge to the reform of the liturgy is to encourage the fullest use of these liturgical gestures in a way which reveals their significance as well as their beauty.

GOD, IMAGES OF, IN LITURGY

Images of God in liturgy are mediated in so many ways that any system of categories is imperfect. I will use the general categories of physical or sensory setting, language, and social setting, even though there is some overlap and interaction of categories. The sensory category covers art, architecture, lighting, incense, flavors tasted, instrumental and vocal music (but not words), amplification, acoustics, etc. The language category covers language which is read, heard, spoken, or sung, whether printed or not. The social setting category illustrates the saying that actions speak louder than words, and covers how people are treated, the cultural and sub-cultural context, the community situation, and the liturgy leaders, with attention to inclusion and diversity. Images of God in liturgy are expressed in and formed by elements in each of these categories. Images of God will be analyzed along with images of each Persona of the Trinity.

A number of aspects or principles which are true for liturgy in general are applicable when considering images of God in liturgy. For instance, some features of liturgy, including divine imagery, are explicit, while other features are implicit. Similarly, the general principle that neither the explicit nor the implicit aspects of the liturgy should counteract, contradict, or distract from the gospel message is certainly applicable to the images of God communicated through the liturgy.

The implicit material can be hard to identify. For example, the choice of certain sermon topics will convey that God is interested in those topics but not others. A related idea is that some things are unspeakable. Also, some things which are seemingly irrelevant to divine imagery influence it nevertheless. For instance, to take an example from the social setting category, whether children always or never contribute to liturgical leadership will suggest to many people (including children) that God is either accepting of children or is tolerant of their exclusion. The decision might have been made for a particular reason, or the matter might not ever have been deliberately addressed. Yet regardless of the purpose, the results may function in unintended ways.

It is frustrating for liturgists to know that despite their care in planning, people are getting unintended messages, some of which are a result of human carelessness and sin rather than accurate reflections or deliberate proclamations of the nature and values of God.

This is related to what has been called the "halo effect," which means that what the church does or tolerates is understood as either what God wants, or at least what is acceptable to God, and this is more pronounced or emphatic for children, who do not have the intellectual understanding of alternate explanations. The "halo effect" can charge anything connected with the church with an aura of divine meaning and power, and it applies to language, arts, and actions, where it influences images of God, among other things. It enhances some inadequate or sinful aspects of liturgy, as well as enhancing many good things which are routine.

Vulnerability is another common and related aspect of liturgy. Many people are especially sensitive to hurts and affirmations when they approach the liturgy and God. This natural sensitivity deserves respect.

Liturgists can expect different people to be responsive to different elements of the liturgy. For one person, any sung text has a double weight, while another person gets absorbed in the music and does not notice the words. For one person, anything the clergy say is authoritative, while for another anything sung or said in unison is most impressive and powerful. One person trusts and focuses on the printed texts while another gives great weight to anything seemingly from the heart, such as sermons or extemporaneous prayer. Repetition will add weight for some people, and maybe something sung, heard, and read will be most emphatic. Because people respond individually, and because in the liturgy they are interacting with God, it is impossible for liturgists to control the experience. Nevertheless they have substantial responsibility.

Two other principles: people are selective in their focus of attention, and a caption or explanation offers an interpretation and meaning to what might otherwise be misunderstood or mystifying.

Images of God in liturgy are deeply affected and formed by the whole liturgical context, and not just by the visual images on the walls or the explicit words spoken aloud. Thoughtful liturgical planning can arrange many elements of liturgy so that what is communicated is a consistent, deliberate, and faithful proclamation of the gospel.

The Physical or Sensory

Perhaps the most obvious images of God in liturgy are the literal visual ones, such as a crucifix, a nativity scene, a dove on a banner, the hand of God in an icon or stained-glass window, a statue or icon of Mary and the Christ child, etc. Such two and three dimensional images found in the room where the liturgy takes place, or printed in bulletins or books, are considered in this section, along with other physical or sensory aspects of the liturgical space which can form or affect images of God.

Many of the visual images are representatives of Jesus, God incarnate, while other images are symbols of God, sometimes abstract and sometimes representational. For instance, the triangle symbol of the Trinity is obviously abstract, and the two most common symbols of the Holy Spirit, the dove and the flames, are sometimes more abstract than representational.

While a crucifix is clearly an image of God incarnate, the empty cross has more than one set of meanings. When it is understood as a reminder of how Jesus got the death penalty, or as a symbol of the Christian faith, then it is not likely to be regarded as an image of God. But when it represents Christ's sacrifice and God's power to overcome sin and death, then it is more likely to be considered an image of God, of who God is and how God acts.

Because of its widespread use in church decoration, the plain cross may be the most common visual symbol in liturgy. But it is so common in some buildings, appearing on every pew and light fixture and at every other opportunity, that it is more apt to convey "religiousness" than any vivid or direct or powerful imagery of God.

Some visual images of God are missed by many viewers because they lack interpretive captions and nobody has explained the symbolism. For example, the mother pelican "vulning" herself to feed her young with her blood is perhaps the most widespread female image of God in liturgical art, yet because the symbolism is no longer commonly known it is often not recognized as representing Christ's sacrifice on the cross, the atonement, and the blessed sacrament of holy communion (See Molle nkott, pages 44-48).

Most of the visual images of God in church art are images of Jesus, and thus are male images. There are a few female images of God, like the pelican, in traditional liturgical art, and a few more in contemporary liturgical art. The remaining divine images, such as the Pentecost flames, are not sex-specific.

If preachers can familiarize themselves with local decorations, and point them out when they are relevant to the Bible readings or sermon themes, then many of the decorations will retain associations of meaning in the minds of those present.

Selectivity and individuality of response and interpretation are illustrated by the person who, seeing a stained-glass window of St. Mary Magdalene, thinks, "Christ called her, a woman, on Easter morning, as an apostle to the other apostles, and the church should ordain women—that's God's will," thus confirming a particular image of God. Another person would just give a passing glance to an anonymous image of a saint. The first might choose to dwell on the saint, while the second might look around and focus on a crucifix, or upon something that was not an image of God.

Language

Linguistic analysis of divine imagery in liturgy must include all texts used routinely, texts just used occasionally (for funerals or special services), propers and commons, and words spoken only once (sermons, announcements, pastoral prayer, etc.). It will also include bulletins or other papers or books placed in the hands of the congregation, words projected for reading or singing, inscriptions on the walls, writing on banners and what the choir sings.

There are two major ways to find images of God in liturgical language—in words addressed to God or describing God (such as Almighty, Lord, Jesus, Father, Everliving, Holy, Merciful, sweet heavenly dove, Christ, Blessed Trinity, Holy Spirit, slow to anger, etc.), and the stories of how God acts, which implicitly describe God by their content (God frees Israel from slavery, keeps commitments, demands justice, etc.). Imagery in the first category is usually explicit, but in both categories there are aspects which subtly affect imagery without many people being aware of them.

The rest of this section will focus on male and female images of God because this is an area of controversy and it can illustrate principles applicable in other cases.

A distinction is made in this article between male and female images of God on the one hand, and masculine and feminine images of God on the other hand, although not all writers are careful in their use of terminology. The use of the masculine and feminine imagery helps to promote and maintain sex role stereotypes, especially when masculinity is equated with maleness and femininity with femaleness. Such stereotypes are inherently sexist. Male and female divine imagery can also be used in sexist ways, as when a certain selection of images is used to encourage complementarity of women and men (as distinct from cooperation with equality). But female and male images of God do not have to be used that way, and, indeed, should not be. Sex role stereotypes in each culture are so familiar that liturgists, especially song writers and preachers, have to plan attentively to avoid them.

There is a growing body of literature about female images of God in the Christian tradition, yet many basic facts are not well-known. For example:

—Male images of God are not inherently sexist.

—The Bible has both male and female images of God.

—Female images of God do not conflict with sound trinitarian theology. Female imagery has been used for each Persona of the Trinity, and for the One God.

—Christian writers have used female images of God in every century.

—These writers include men and women, Protestants and Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholics and others, native writers on every inhabited continent, and writers of various literary genres.

—Female images of God occur in Christian art as well as literature.

—Good liturgy can use a balance of both female and male imagery of God. Many believe it should do this.

The father image of God is God-given, and along with some other male images of God it should be used liturgically just as carefully as the novel female images of God are introduced and used. Male images of God in liturgy will be stronger and more meaningful if they are not used carelessly or haphazardly or automatically, but instead are used deliberately, thoughtfully, and with attention to the rest of the liturgy (Piccard, pp. 1-2).

Even when liturgists do not feel uncomfortable with sexism in liturgy, and even if they do feel comfortable with female images, they are still responsible for how these matters are dealt with in public worship; their private devotions are another matter.

A congregation's over-all long-term pattern of worship should be balanced in ways in which particular services can be imbalanced. Thus a parish might have a non-sexist service focusing on the fatherhood of God if it had another service sometime focusing on the motherhood of God. So long as no sex role stereotypes were used, a balanced non-sexist pattern would be maintained.

Worship services for special occasions when a unique congregation will be gathered should be planned with attention to its time together. Thus if a conference has three services, there should be a balance of elements (such as male and female images of God) among the three services. Or if there is a special occasion when many visitors will be present, it is usually wise for the service to be internally balanced in isolation from the parish's other services. Balancing can be done either by having an equal weight and number of female and male images of God, or by eliminating all sex-specific divine images. A subtle stereotype to avoid would be using 5 or 10 different male images of God but only using one or two female images, especially maternal ones!

Some people are so sensitive on certain issues that these matters affect their very ability to participate in liturgy—or even to remain in the building. Thus funerals, the sacraments, baccalaureate services, etc., are certainly times for sensitive and careful planning.

If people think of God as male (or as more male-like than female-like), or think of the word "God" as a male word, then the very word "God" which is not inherently sex-specific will be fundamentally sex-specific for them. Similarly, words associated with sex role stereotyped traits and jobs and behavior (nurturing, almighty) will be interpreted as sex-specific by some people. There is disagreement about whether or not the word "Goddess" is suitable liturgically. It does communicate powerfully and it has remedial effects, but because of its feminine ending it is inherently sexist.

Knowing about all the centuries of Christian literature using female images of God some liturgists are hesitant to develop their own. But whenever an image can be accurately described as an image of the God revealed in the Bible then there is ample authority for its use.

The liturgical use of racist and sexist language and content (that is, what is said as well as how it is said), can convey the idea that racism and sexism are acceptable to God. The old hymn text "strong men and maidens meek" is an illustration because, although it is inclusive (in that both sexes are included), it is also a blatant example of sexist content by the use of sex role stereotypes. Other hymn texts like "keep them white and clear" are more obviously racist than the routine mistranslation of Cant 1:5 as "I am very dark, but comely."

The church is a long way from perfection on these matters, and setting goals and timetables for education and change, and writing local guidelines, can be very helpful. Guidelines for avoiding sexism and racism in sermons and hymns need to go to all preachers and hymn selectors, not just white men.

God uses different images to reach different people. The liturgy should be rich enough to serve the whole community.

Social Setting

How people are treated in the liturgy and in the rest of the world, and how the liturgy recognizes the social settings of their lives, will deeply affect their understanding of God's interest in them individually and God's interest in the conditions of their lives. For this reason it is especially important for the clergy and lay leadership to be aware of social dynamics and trends, and to be sensitive and mature in dealing with people.

Preachers and ushers or greeters must be chosen with care, and training will be needed from time to time because good intentions alone are not enough. How visitors or unusual people are treated (or mentioned) will say a lot to them and to others about God. Justice, dignity, acceptance, and respect ought to be automatic, but even people of goodwill are not always sure how to show it best. Misunderstandings can occur, and may be serious problems.

A number of people remark on how someone represents God's care to them, or represents or symbolizes God to them in varied life situations. As God's obvious representatives, the clergy especially do influence the imagery for God for many people in their congregations. Their behavior in the liturgy and elsewhere, the content of their sermons, and the particularities of their individuality can each be significant in this way for some people. Individual features (race, sex, abilities and disabilities, degree and style of conformity to expectations, quirks, etc.) are all potentially influential.

A person does not have to be "holier than thou" to be a lector or singer, but the diversity of the congregation should be represented around the altar. (Perhaps only the diversity of grave and notorious sin should be excepted from the diversity represented.)

Liturgy is not just what happens during the scheduled services, but also includes the preparation and cleanup. Who gets consulted and how they are treated, who has decision-making power and responsibility, and who does which work are all significant.

For example, if a category of people is included and treated with respect in liturgy planning and leadership, then many people will receive the message that God accepts and affirms that category of people. Thus images of God are shaped. Race, sex, and age are not the only factors to consider, but also such groupings as the homeless and renters and homeowners, ethnic majorities and minorities, able-bodied and disabled people, clergy and lay, people with varying sexual preferences, dropouts and well-schooled people, workers and students and unemployed and retired people, people of varying intelligence, immigrants and natives, etc.

Of course, if a low status or oppressed group is included but is routinely given cleanup responsibility, or secondary and overly simple tasks, the church (if not also God) will be seen as accepting the unjust status quo.

How much rehearsal time is needed so everyone can contribute appropriately with confidence? Although sarcasm in the sacristy may not cause the obvious liturgical changes, it obviously affects the meaning of the liturgy for those involved, and can affect their understanding of God. Is the liturgy a place where people are safe to make a contribution without being attacked? Is it a place where people are held acceptable for keeping commitments about preparation? How these routine matters are dealt with will affect self-esteem and divine imagery.

Liturgy often treats some difficult topics as unspeakable, like incest and domestic violence, which are acutely relevant to images of God as Father. And sometimes sin is denounced as if the church were blameless. An example, like the Wareham Guild, established so needleworkers on vestments would get a living wage, is a fine illustration of the church's corporate amendment of life for corporate sin.

Actions do speak louder than words, but some words are needed. The sermon content has a major role in the shaping of images of God in connection with the social setting. The social strengths and health and maturity, as well as the corporate (social) sins, which are important in the community life need to be addressed in the light of the gospel. In addition to being addressed in sermon content these matters can be addressed explicitly in prayer and prayer invitations.

To fail to recognize and address strengths and weaknesses, grace and sin, conveys the idea that God is uninterested. But what kind of God would be uninterested in these things which so influence peoples' lives?

Ideally a variety of images of God will be integrated in liturgy, demonstrating how all life flows from the divine and is related to the divine.

Benedictine of the Abbey of Solesmes, which he revived in 1833, and which was re-established as an abbey, with Guéranger himself as first abbott, in 1837.

His own work, and indeed the work of the monastic community at Solesmes, was devoted to the careful and prayerful celebration of the Mass and the liturgy of the hours. Solesmes itself is known for its revival of Gregorian chant. Guéranger's best known works are: (a) his Institutions Liturgiques, in which he set forth his plea for a liturgy that was simple, pure and uniform, and (b) his L'annee liturgique, meditations on the liturgical texts, feasts, and the scriptures for the church's liturgical year. This second served as inspiration for later works in the same tradition, esp., The Church's Year of Grace (Pius Parsch) and The Liturgical Year (Adrian Nocent).

HEALING

Healing is no stranger to the Judaeo-Christian tradition. In the Hebrew scripture God affirms "I am the Lord your physician" (Exod 15:22). A central description for God's work in the creation is that of healing. Healing is one expression of God's special care for people: "I am the Lord, your healer" (Exod 15:26b). God orders people with power and destroys enemies and deceivers. God's will for the people, a will that is not without condition, is imaged through that of God as healer. Both disease and health originate with God: "I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal; and there is none that can deliver out of my hand" (Deut 32:39).

God relates to people both positively and negatively. In Hosea, God is represented as being in despair over Israel's seeming incurableness. In Jeremiah, Yahweh affirms: "Your hurt is incurable, and your wound is grievous. There is no one to uphold your cause, no medicine for your wound, no healing for you" (Jer 30:12-13). Yet God's compassion is infinite; God simply cannot abandon Israel. Both the discipline and the healing of Israel is from God: "Yet it was I who taught Ephraim to walk, I took them up in my arms; but they did not know that I healed them" (Hos 11:3).

Yahweh heals the diseases which have their origin in God and are the consequences of human infidelity and sinfulness. Often the situation of Israel is compared to someone who is left without medical help: "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then has the daughter of my people not been restored?" (Jer 8:22). While many texts refer to the healing and the sickness of individuals, the healing from Yahweh is primarily for the reconstitution of Israel. The importance of these various texts lies in the fact that Yahweh is represented as the restorer and orderer of human life.

In the NT, Jesus' miraculous healings are presented as the signs that the Messiah has arrived and the Kingdom of God is in our midst. Among the powers of the Messiah is the power to heal the sick (Lk 7:21; also Mt 11:4-6). Jesus' healings are presented in the gospel as the product of his charismatic power.

From a historical point of view, Jesus stood in the tradition of Jewish charismatic healers. Touching is a very important aspect of Jesus' ministry of healing. In fact, in the Hebrew Scripture the language of the senses is used to express God's compassion. God is the one who sees our afflictions, who hears our cries and feels our pain. The ministry of Jesus represents God as salvific God, a God of life.

Jesus' ministry of healing is in line with his constant emphasis upon compassion. The root meaning of compassion is "being moved by" another's situation at the very core of one's being. Not only does compassion characterize Jesus' ministry and is the basic ground for his deeds of healing, but for Jesus, God is also the compassionate one. Jesus invites his disciples to be imitators of God's compassion: "Be compassionate, even as your Father is compassionate" (Lk 6:36). Jesus' movement must be characterized by compassion. In fact Jesus sent his disciples out to continue his ministry of healing (Mk 6:7-13; Mt 10:5-10; Lk 9:1-6). In the letter of James we find the classic NT text on the implementation of this ministry (5:14-16).

Jesus performed healings on the sabbath in defiance of the law (Mk 3:1-6). He healed individuals who were considered on the margin of society such as a tax-collector (Lk 19:1-10). He healed individuals outside the land of Israel (Mk 7:31-7). In his healing he rebuked the forces that seem to make people sick (Lk 13:16). Illness is viewed by Jesus as a destructive and deteriorating force. Any attitude that would glorify sickness is alien to Jesus' attitude. Jesus as the Savior is the great physician (H. Beyer, T.D.N.T., 130).

Toward a Theology of Healing

While healing is an important element of Jesus' ministry and redemptive work, it has never been a major concern of theology. A theology of healing is quite absent from the Christian tradition. Developments in many areas of theological concern, and the re-discovery of the importance of the healing ministry in the charismatic movement, demand a theology of healing.

Such a theology presupposes first of all a definition of health. Health is often understood as merely the absence of disease or infirmity. Yet the preamble of the charter of the World Health Organization attempts to convey a holistic view of health: "Health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity." To this definition one should add a spiritual element. The root of the word implies completeness, wholeness. Yet unlike disease which is frequently recognizable, tangible, and rather easily defined, health is a more nebulous reality, difficult to define and never in a state of perfection.

A theology of healing must emphasize the centrality of the concept of personhood and the principle of totality. Health must be defined in such a way as to encompass the total good of the person. Christianity insists that we see healing and disease with the eyes of faith. It offers the triadic framework of creation, fall and redemption as its basic worldview. The framework can be expressed in the following way: Creation: original blessing, light, freedom, integrity, peace, health; Fall: deprived human condition, blindness, bondage, brokenness, estrangement, disease; Redemption: restored human potential, enlightenment, liberation, reintegration, reconciliation, health.

A theology of healing must be anchored within this framework; the major operative elements have to be a theological anthropology and an anthropological soteriology.

From an anthropological perspective all forms of dualism have to be avoided. The body-soul unity is a necessary implication of the doctrines of creation and resurrection. The human spirit lives in and through expressive embodiment, because the human person is a psychophysical unity. Within this anthropology, woman and man should not be considered as a composite of several levels such as body, soul, spirit, but as a multidimensional unity. Different dimensions of human reality do not lie one alongside the other. In every stage of life all dimensions are potentially or actually present.

Salvation itself can be described as the act of healing. In many languages the root of the word "salvation" indicates this. The Greek word soteria, comes from saos, and the German heiland from heil. All of these different roots mean whole, not yet split, not disrupted. Healing is the re-establishment of a whole that was broken, disrupted, disintegrated. Ultimately healing in the sense of salvation implies victory over death itself.

In the NT the concept of salvation implies the deliverance of human beings from all forms of evil, from sickness, from mental illness, demonic powers, and ultimately from death. The concept of reconciliation emphasizes the restoration of broken relationship. Redemption connotes freedom from various forms of bondage; the term salvation is a rich and complex one and cannot be restricted simply to the restoration of broken relation with God. It encompasses the total good of the person and in that sense it connotes the process of healing.

There can be no total dichotomy between eschatological salvation and salvation in this world, between "secular" history and salvation history, between healing for eternal life and healing for this life. For salvation to be truly human, salvation must have some experimental dimensions. It must reflect at least partially what women and men experience as saving. Ultimately we do not know what salvation implies. To indicate this mystery the Greek fathers spoke of the divinization of woman and man.

No human techniques of healing can ever remove fully the various forms of suffering that afflict humanity. Victory over suffering is essentially partial and limited. It would be false to understand salvation uniquely as meaning perfect wholeness, for such wholeness means ultimately liberation from finitude and basically from mortality. Ultimate salvation does not in any way imply that salvation comes to humanity simply from outside. Salvation is from within, from what occurs here within our human context. The NT gives us an expression of this: one is judged ultimately according to one's compassion (Mt 25:34-40).

According to the NT, salvation involves two movements that are not to be separated: a movement beyond this world, eschatological in nature, and a movement within this world, towards wholeness in life through the gifts of this world such as medicine, rest, friendship. While within the Christian perspective there are values higher than life, life in all of its dimensions is of real value.

Jesus' ministry of healing continues in the church and takes place in charitable, charismatic and sacramental ways. The charitable expresses itself in the ongoing tradition in the church of caring for the sick in hospitals and other institutions. The charismatic ministry of healing is very much present in the contemporary church. The sacramental ministry of healing, while expressed in the eucharist and penance, is most fully operative in the sacrament of the anointing of the sick. The evolution of this sacrament is indicative of the many problems involved in developing a theology of healing. In the early church the sacrament was understood primarily as an unction for healing. But step by step this was transformed into unction as preparation for death and had more to do with forgiveness of sins than with bodily healing. It was eventually perceived as the final sacrament for the dying. The healing intended is a spiritual healing (T. Aquinas, III, Supp. 29.1).

In the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (S.C., 73ff), and in Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (1983), the original purpose of the unction is restored as a sign and prayer for the return to physical health. The new rite is intended to help us understand human sickness in the context of the whole mystery of salvation. Here the gift of bodily health is looked upon as ancillary to the good of the soul. Yet the restoration of physical health remains uncertain. It must be admitted that the ultimate triumph over sickness and evil is achieved eschatologically (Rom 8:18-20). Sickness and suffering are not unqualifiedly contrary to the will of God. The mystery of God's will for life remains paschal in nature; the suffering of Christ, in light of the resurrection, was not a defeat of God's will. Yet the church's ministry of healing is an affirmation of the primacy of life and its ultimate victory over death, a victory proleptically achieved in the resurrection of Jesus. All healing then must be understood as originating in God as the giver of life. No healing can be effective in separation from the structures of life itself.

Finally, a contemporary theology of healing must address the basic question of addiction as a pervasive situation. Any addiction is a limitation of the freedom of human desire. It involves the severe loss of willpower and brings about a radical distortion of reality.

Now the basic metaphor used in the scriptures for sinfulness is that of bondage or slavery from which one must be delivered into freedom. Addiction is related to sin. It is the bodily and psychological dimension of sinfulness. Deliverance and healing from addictive is a freeing of the will in its journey to God. Our addictions hinder our seeing the truth. Healing of addictive behavior is freeing, an experience of God's salvific presence. It is the re-lived experience of the Exodus, the experience of spiritual deliverance.

HERMENEUTICS AND WORSHIP

The public worship of God, whether in a tradition of canonically defined texts and sign-acts, or in a more oral, spontaneous tradition, is intrinsically hermeneutical. Texts, both written and spontaneous, are necessary if worship is based in Christian scriptures and the biblical tradition. The interpretation and understanding of such texts and of the words used in worship is determined by the performative or "event" character of liturgy. Scripture and liturgical texts occur in a highly interactive context of communal actions and symbols and thus are activated by the performative character of liturgy. In other words, a human community celebrating the liturgy constitutes an essential matrix for interpreting and understanding the texts which are read, sung, prayed and proclaimed.

The term "hermeneutics" is commonly used to designate the theory of interpretation of texts, most especially of biblical texts. The hermeneutics of worship recognizes that historical/critical and literary interpretation of the scriptural texts cannot finally be separated from the actual worship context in which they are employed. H.-G. Gadamer observes, "Understanding is not to be thought of so much as the action of one's subjectivity, but as the placing of oneself within a process of tradition, in which past and present are constantly fused. This is what must be expressed in hermeneutical theory" (Truth and Method, p. 258).

The liturgy is principally constituted by biblical texts and sign-actions of the gathered assembly, woven together in symbolic rites which manifest and proclaim the mystery of God's self-giving. Thus interpretation and understanding of texts must be integrated into the hermeneutics of the whole liturgical celebration. The cycles of readings require biblical interpretation in preparation of the homily as well as in catechetical instruction of the faithful. The lectionary orders scripture over cycles of time, both temporal and sanctoral, thus creating a pattern of selectivity and juxtaposition with symbol and sign-action which generate a complex set of reciprocal relationships between biblical texts, sacramental sign-acts, prayer and proclamation.

Liturgical hermeneutics moves beyond traditional biblical hermeneutics in two primary ways: it shares with recent biblical interpretation a stress upon text/reader/context interaction; and it places texts of several kinds in the situation of actual ritual and prayer. Traditionally "hermeneutics" involved the formulation of rules for the interpretation and understanding of ancient texts. The focus was particularly upon grammar, vocabulary and literary style. Traditional hermeneutics recognized that literary texts were conditioned by specific historical and cultural factors. Twentieth century developments have come to emphasize that the contemporary interpreter's standpoint and range of interests brought to the texts must also be taken into account. No longer can it be assumed that understanding ancient texts is achieved by making appropriate references from a system of objectively stated rules. Just as the modern reader's standpoint and social/cultural "situatedness" is crucial to biblical hermeneutics today, so the contemporary worshipping assembly's social/cultural character, interests and perceptions are central to the interpretation of liturgy and liturgical experiences.

Interpretation must examine the constantly shifting interaction of texts, sacramental actions, symbols and the whole environment in which worship takes place. The "poetics" of liturgical action cause the texts themselves to yield different layers and levels of meaning as they appear and reappear in worship over time. Thus a given lection or psalm, occurring in two different seasons or worship environments, may have a distinctively different force and point in each context. Biblical texts and central symbols as well as ritual acts also have a previous history. Thus they carry layers of juxtaposed meaning with them into the liturgy, so to speak. Both the texts and the symbols signify and speak to the assembly. This means that the symbols and sign-actions can never be treated as mere illustrations of the meaning of the biblical texts. Neither can we regard the biblical texts as simply giving warrant for the employment of the symbols. Hermeneutics with respect to the liturgy examines the ever-changing interanimation of text, sign-act and symbol.

In light of the foregoing sketch, the work of Paul Ricoeur on symbolism advances the discussion. He identifies three dimensions of symbolism: the cosmic, the oneiric and the poetic. The liturgical assembly activates these three dimensions. Celebrating the liturgy together gives rise to the reflective dimension of symbol—to theological and devotional thought. The cosmic dimension of symbol concerns symbols as concrete features of the world—food, elements, persons, events and the like. Symbols are oneiric in that they appear in our dreams and collectively shared stories about the world which bear deep emotional and intellectual power. Living symbols are poetic in that they condense wide ranges of meaning, presenting imaginative fusions and transfigurations of human experience, often allowing us to grasp the mystery of a veiled reality in terms of a visible and palpable reality. Symbols are polysemantic and participatory, taking us beyond the literal and the obvious.

So in liturgy we encounter texts, sign-actions and symbols which interpret one another. Consider the paradigm, water. Water has been associated with the manifestation of the sacred in human experience from time immemorial. It is life-giving and death-dealing in the world of everyday. The oceans are deep and seemingly unfathomable, suggesting danger and life. Water is for drinking and bathing and cleansing. At the same time, human beings can drown in water. It is a primary element of the world in common human social experience. At the same time, water appears in our dreams and imagination. The fear and awe and wonder or delight associated with water surfaces in our unconscious and in all human literatures. Waters of chaos and womb-water rise before us in dreaming and imagining. Poetry has found in water images an enormous range: "Spins to the widow-making unchilding unfathering deeps," sings Gerard Manley Hopkins of the sea-storm in "The Wreck of the Deutschland" (line 104).

In primary symbols such as water we find the confluence of textual depth with the cosmic, oneiric and poetic dimensions. The power of the symbol is activated in the liturgical enactment of the rites of baptism or of sprinkling. When the liturgy of the Easter vigil is celebrated, the water is surrounded by biblical and prayer texts which speak insistently of water, from Genesis through Isaiah through Romans. The psalms which are sung or recited are themselves permeated with the multivalency of water. Thus texts which speak the many-layered meanings of the biblical witnesses come to interact with the signification of actual baptismal water in the midst of a people gathered about fire, the stories, water and the feast. The symbols thus give rise to reflection on the word of God and the divine mystery of the paschal feast. In the lections, prayers, psalms and homily, we find discursive reference to those cosmic, oneiric and poetic fields of force which constitute living symbolism.

In less dramatic ways, every liturgical assembly is a hermeneutical event, giving focus to a range of meanings out of the whole range available in the texts. The eucharistic rite itself is given participatory depth by careful attention to the liturgy of the word. A powerful reading, a thoughtful homily, a well-sung psalm, or a pastorally sensitive, biblically based set of intercessions can lead the worshippers into a more intense sharing in the communion rite. The eucharistic prayer itself, with its thankful remembrance of who God is and all that God has done, recapitulated in Jesus Christ, is a receiving point of all that has preceded it in the liturgy. This is why equal care must be given to all the details of the whole service in liturgical planning and in the celebration. How each unit—readings, responsorial psalmody, prayers, acclamations—is related to the whole musical, visual and choreographical ethos of the rite in its context affects the assembly's depth of participation and experience.

Christian worship both forms the community in and gives expression to the church's self-understanding before God. Being drawn into the triune life of God is to come to understand and to interpret the world as created, sustained and redeemed. In this way liturgical hermeneutics takes us beyond the interpretation of actual texts to interpretation and understanding of the world and our baptismal vocation as God's people therein. The development of an adequate liturgical hermeneutics requires knowledge of and sensitivity to plurality in cultural expression as well as to the anthropological dimensions of sign, symbol and language. The pastoral implications already alluded to are far-ranging. The study of how antiphons function to provide the assembly a way of hearing and praying the psalms, for example, can bring musicians and congregation into deeper mutuality. The study of the eucharistic prayer and its surrounding action, or the baptismal prayers surrounding the font, contributes to a more vital celebration and a deeper living hermeneutic in the assembly. The recovery of the Bible as the church's living memory made active in the ritual context is at the heart of the pastoral work just begun by the recent 20th century liturgical reforms.

Participation in all the dimensions of liturgy brings understanding. The assembly gathered about the book, the font and the table is at one and the same time an event of interpretation (texts, symbols, persons and the world) and an event in which the assembly is interpreted by the living tradition. Both together constitute the larger horizon of worship and hermeneutics.

HISTORICAL RESEARCH AND LITURGICAL RENEWAL

Although some may disagree about the extent to which historical research has caused, accelerated and shaped the contemporary renewal of Roman Catholic liturgy, few scholars would deny that the causal relationship is anything less than massive.

Lest the question be begged, however, it must first be observed that contemporary liturgical renewal is neither complete nor wholly successful. As a movement driven more by the pen of scholars than by felt needs in the communities of worship, its implementation has relied heavily on administrative fiat. Frequently, there was little in the religious life of the local churches to make them receptive to liturgical renewal. And when the renewal itself, as often happened, was carried out awkwardly or less than satisfactorily, it was no longer the perceived tyranny of the rubricist but that of the historicist which tended to be given the blame.

Second, the recent flowering of historical research in liturgy is but a relatively small part of a much larger development: the discovery of historical consciousness in modern Roman Catholic thought. Within the past fifty years, the historical-critical method has moved from being regarded as dangerous, even heretical, to a position of quasi-normativity in the work of Catholic scripture scholars. Historical contextualization has, in significant ways, historically relativized the definition of the great councils. The development of doctrine is no longer seen as a formula for heresy but as a foundational concept for every serious student of theology. In other words, the ossification which characterized the liturgy from the post-Tridentine reforms up to the renewal of the Easter vigil in the 1950s and the post-Vatican II liturgical reforms was only a small part of this general ossification of Roman Catholic intellectual life. Thus, the way contemporary liturgical renewal is moved forward by historical research is only part of a much larger picture in which the whole theological life of the church is being moved forward by historically conscious research. E.g., Richard P. McBrien's Catholicism (1980) and Bernard J.F. Lonergan's Method in Theology (1972) amply illustrate how pervasive historical consciousness now is at all levels of critical Catholic theological thought. Let us examine, then, within this larger context, the role which historical research has played in liturgical renewal.

Renaissance Scholarship. Although it had no effect on the liturgy controlled by the post-Tridentine reforms, the work of the renaissance scholars, in which we can find the early traces of modern historical-critical scholarship, actually laid the first foundations for a liturgical renewal that was to take effect only centuries later. The late 15th century invention of printing made the broad dissemination of texts possible. The polemical situation of the Protestant and Catholic Reformations motivated Christian scholars to recover the testimony of history contained in the theological writings of the past. Prominent among these were liturgical writings. Producing liturgical collections from the earlier medieval writings seems to have been the main achievement of the Catholic liturgical scholars of the 16th century. The work of Melchior Hittorp, De catholicae ecclesiae divinis officiis ac ministeriis (1568), stands out. However, there was still very little by way of critical editing of texts, and the great patristic sources remained largely unknown and untapped.

17th and 18th Centuries. It is to this period that liturgiology as a true science can trace its origins. The era of specialization was beginning. What church historians, patrologists and positive theologians were doing in their respective disciplines, liturgical scholars were also beginning to do in theirs. In particular, the Benedictine Maurists distinguished themselves by their critical editions and studies of the Western liturgies. In addition, learned treatises on the liturgy itself began to appear in impressive numbers. The work of the Oratorian, P. Lebrun (d. 1729), Explication littérale, historique et dogmatique des prières et des cérémonies de la Messe, is one outstanding example among many. Some texts and studies of the Eastern liturgies also began to appear. In all this, however, the assumptions of a "positive theology" dominated, i.e., one did not study the past in order to learn from it how one might reform or renew the present, but primarily in order to find in the past historical legitimation for the achieved doctrines and practices of one's own particular church. Only later, in the 19th century, does one begin to find the historical consciousness that enables historical research to become a catalyst for liturgical renewal.

19th and 20th Centuries. The key figure here is unquestionably Prosper Guéranger, O.S.B., Abbot of Solesmes from 1837 to his death in 1875. Practically the whole modern liturgical movement can trace its lines to him. The most noted among his voluminous works are his Institutions liturgiques (3 vols. 1840-51) and L'Année liturgique (9 vols., 1841-66). Of tremendous importance was also the Oxford Movement. Its interest in the Fathers and Christian antiquity included, of course, attention to the ancient liturgies. In particular, the reflections of J.H. Newman on the development of doctrine made that question something from which no subsequent Roman Catholic theologian could legitimately prescind. From this time, and in ever increasing numbers, scores and eventually hundreds of scholars became engaged in publishing liturgical texts, recovering and studying the liturgies of the ancient church, both East and West, reflecting on the significance of these studies for contemporary sacramental theology and liturgical practice, and disseminating these ideas in popular writings. Centers for liturgical study sprang up all over the Western world, including, eventually, North America (Collegeville and Notre Dame).

For a long time, however, all this had little effect on the public worship of the church as a whole. Apart from the restoration of frequent access to the eucharistic table under Pius X, the eucharistic liturgy of the mid-20th century was hardly distinguishable from that of the late 16th century: a highly stylized Latin ritual which, while indeed inculcating a reverent sense of the sacred and a deep awe of the tremendum, relegated most of the faithful to roles of mere passive participation. An in-principle corrective and invitation to genuine renewal was issued in Pius XII's encyclical Mediator Dei (1947). As his earlier encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943) was for biblical studies, so too this can be seen as the Magna Charta for modern liturgical scholarship and the movement of liturgical renewal.

However, it was not as if this encyclical initiated the great modern flowering of liturgical studies. That was already well under way. Most of the scholarly and historical periodicals and serials and the popular journals which carried the movement had already been published or had been publishing for decades: in England, Liturgy (earlier Music and Liturgy) since 1929; in France, Monumenta Ecclesiae Liturgica (1900-12), Dictionnaire d'Archéologie Chrétienne et de Liturgie (1907-57), La Maison-Dieu since 1945, L'Art sacré since 1935; in the Low Countries, Les Questions Liturgiques et Paroissiales since 1910, Paroisse et Liturgie since 1919, Tijdschrift voor Liturgie since 1919; in Germany and Austria, Antike und Christentum (1929-50) continued by the Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum since 1958, Oriens Christianus since 1901, Liturgiegeschichtliche Quellen und Forschungen since 1918, Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft (1921-41) later the Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft since 1950, Ecclesia Orans since 1920, the Handbuch der Liturgik (2 vols., 1932-33; abbreviated Engl. trans as The Liturgy of the Roman Rite, New York, 1961), Texte und Arbeiten since 1919; in Italy, Ambrosius (serving the Milanese rite) since 1925, Ephemerides Liturgicae since 1881, Rivista Liturgica since 1914; in Spain and Portugal, Liturgia since 1945; in United States, Orate Fratres since 1926 (Worship since 1951), Liturgical Arts since 1928.

This by no means exhaustive list, which does not even begin to list the works of the great scholars of the modern liturgical revival such as Dix, Jungmann, Michel, and a host of others, suggests the extent to which Pius XII was not initiating but just giving his blessing to an already extensive research movement which was poised to take off as a movement of concrete renewal across the whole church. And take off it did. Within five years of Mediator Dei, the new rite of the restored Easter vigil had been promulgated ad experimentum, and within another five years it had been extended to the whole church. This one development functioned like a match set to tinder. Within another ten years Vatican II had come and gone; its constitution on the sacred liturgy, Sacrosanctum concilium of Dec. 4, 1963, had already been followed by a series of post-conciliar decrees and instructions instituting the practice of concelebration and of communion under both species, returning the liturgy to the vernacular, etc. Other developments followed in quick succession: the reform of the lectionary and the liturgical calendar; the new sacramentary with multiple prefaces and eucharistic prayers; the restoration of the offices of deacon and lector; new rituals for the burial of the dead, for baptism, marriage, and the other sacraments; the reform of the breviary; the restoration of the catechumenate in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, etc.

This veritable explosion of renewal, not all of it, admittedly, implemented with the same success, was caused and, in many instances, directly shaped by historical research. In many cases it consisted of a reappropriation of the forgotten wealth of the early church. Among these retrieved treasures, the "mystery theology" associated with the name of Odo Casel stands out. The fundamental insight of mystery theology, the mystery-presence (Vergegenwärtigung) of the paschal mystery of Christ in the eucharist, and the insight that the central reality of every sacrament is an entrance into the paschal mystery and a personal encounter with the risen Christ, has become the foundational insight of contemporary liturgical theology, contemporary theology of church and sacrament, and contemporary ecumenical theology among those churches which have maintained a strong sacramental identity. Casel drew this fundamental insight directly from the Fathers of the church. The great (Vatican II) conciliar and post-conciliar theologians such as O. Semmelroth, E. Schillebeeckx and K. Rahner have used it to set the fundamental agenda on the theology of worship, sacraments and church on which we are still working.

In summary, the reason why the extensive historical research into the liturgy which preceded our own day failed to have a direct effect in liturgical renewal lies, it seems, less in the nature and quality of that research than in the attitudes towards history which pervaded Roman Catholic life and thought until recent decades. As soon, however, as historical consciousness found itself welcome in Roman Catholic thought, as gradually took place in the two decades following the Second World War, the historical research that liturgiologists, historians, patristic scholars and theologians had been doing for centuries was liberated from its monastic walls and dusty bookshelves and set free to work as an explosive catalyst in the life and worship of the church. But explosive catalysts make for unevenness in renewal. The church's struggle to make up for centuries of dormant or suppressed renewal makes, at times, for a messy church. That is our present situation. The future should be, one may hope, not a new stasis in which no further development can take place—for that would only make another explosion inevitable—but a new equilibrium in which the findings of historical research can act as a gentle, natural leaven in the liturgical life of the people of God.

HOLY SPIRIT IN CHRISTIAN WORSHIP

This article will reflect upon the specific nature and function of Christian worship as seen from a theology of the Holy Spirit. Christian worship is not something in which the Spirit occasionally has a function, but rather something which from beginning to end is the proper work of the Holy Spirit. It is the specific "personal" characteristic of the third person of the Trinity to fulfill the divine work of glorification accomplished in Christ. Christians give God glory, or worship God, by acknowledging God's supreme act of self-glorification which is the creation and salvation of the world.

The experience and concept of God which lie at the heart of Christian worship make it something quite distinctive, from the point of view of its nature, goal and necessity. In order to appreciate this, it seems worthwhile to begin first with a few introductory remarks about religion and worship in general. Then we shall investigate the nature and function of worship, first in the OT and then in the NT, where the connection between worship and the Spirit becomes explicit. Finally, we shall consider how this all finds expression in the eucharist, the church's central act of worship.

I. Worship and the Religious Dimension of Humanity

Persons who study religion and the human act of worship which is its heart find themselves investigating something which is as central and universal in its significance as it is difficult to define. We all know what we mean when we refer to the different religions. Most of us could make a list of quite a number of them. We are accustomed to refer to the "world religions" as if they shared a common essence or at least exhibited an obvious similarity in nature or in function. Closer inspection reveals that it is not so simple. Each certainly seems to involve both a view of life and a corresponding way of life. But perhaps that is where the common similarity ends and an extraordinary variety begins. Each bears witness to the strikingly different ways in which human beings have experienced both the depth and the ambiguity of reality and have tried to respond to it. The religions exhibit the perennial and typically human concern with ultimacy, with the ultimate questions raised especially by what some call "limit-experiences." What, if anything, is the ultimate truth and meaning of reality? What does that have to say about who I am, where I came from, where I am going, how I shall get there? These are the basic questions which touch on the religious dimension of our existence. We cannot avoid them. The fact that we raise them so seriously reveals both our distinctive nature as transcendent beings and our search for the Transcendent. In this sense we can and must speak of the religious dimension as constitutive of human life.

But religions do not arise merely from questions. As Rudolph Otto suggests, it is experience of the Wholly Other, the mysterium tremendum et fascinans, that we properly call religious. This is the sort of experience which gives birth to religion and worship, whatever other factors might be involved in the historical genesis of a particular religion. Religion begins where there is some manifestation of the power and presence of the transcendent which is able to throw new light on the meaning of reality as a whole and thereby offer some kind of answers to the basic religious questions already mentioned. This is expressed in its customs, discipline, rituals and doctrines.

Although the etymology of "religion" remains somewhat obscure, and is limited by its western provenance as a general descriptive term, the word suggests several important points. Religion is what "binds" (Lat. re-ligio) human beings with the realm of the divine and with one another as a particular worshipping (and often socio-political) community. Cult and culture are inseparable. Properly speaking, of course, there is no such thing as a one-person religion. Religion is not a purely private matter of a solitary individual in relationship to God(s); nor on that account is it merely a generally public collection of such individuals. It is precisely communal. In the proper sense of the word, religion is something which only makes sense in community: it literally makes the community, binds it together in its devotion to God(s). In its ritual, the believers "re-bind" themselves to the divine as a community. Thus religion, especially in its ritual, is fundamentally concerned with the acknowledgment of and participation in the divine reality which alone has the power to hold everything together: to make the community and the cosmos whole.

Bearing in mind that no adequate definition for such a diverse phenomenon can be given, we might first understand worship most broadly as creaturely response to the divine. As such it concerns a reality which is perceived as numinous, awesome, mysterious and radically Other, a reality which transcends any of its particular manifestations or symbolic representations. It concerns that reality upon which all else depends. In other words, worship is proper to God alone, however God might be conceived. We may praise others, but we do not worship them. It is expressed in bodily gestures, and in some languages, the word for worship indicates bowing down, prostration or kissing.

Even in such gestures, worship is seen to be a form of direct address. The heart and purpose of worship is not to talk about God but to talk to God, to enter into relationship with God. Worshippers often address God in praise and petition. Both the gestures and the words which are at the heart of worship are forms of direct address, implying the personal character of the one worshipped and the personal relationship with God which worship articulates.

Worship is not merely a response subsequent to an experience of divine revelation; it continues to be a special time and place of presence. Almost universally in the history of religions, cult is something in which the action of the divine upon humanity takes place as well as the human worship of the divine. Indeed, it is an on-going arena of manifestation and participation. We often find the conviction that the believers are called, summoned, even commanded to come together in worship by their God and may expect God to manifest himself or herself. Particularly good examples of this are the ancient mystery religions which highlight the dramatic reality of revelation and the roots of religious ritual in drama. Though it is unlikely that they form the proximate historical source of Christian worship, the similarity is obvious and was captured quite early in liturgical terminology (mysterion, sacramentum).

The way a people worship is an expression of its conviction about who God is and who it is for God and how God is related to the world. In worship, therefore, we may speak of a transcendent dimension, a communal dimension and a cosmic dimension.

II. Old Testament

The concrete history of Israel's religious institutions, the development and shifting significance of the different cultic practices, liturgical forms and places of worship is long and complex. But in all of its forms, and whatever its particular focus, worship for Israel means the acknowledgment of the divine glory which God himself has revealed. It is God who glorifies himself by revealing himself in the world.

1. God's Glory. God's glory (kabod, "weightiness," "worthiness," "majesty," "brilliance") is seen in the majesty, beauty and order of creation. "The heavens declare the glory of God" (Ps 19:2). Wisdom is seen as a personification of God herself precisely as "an aura of the might of God and a pure effusion of the glory of the Almighty" (Wis 7:25). But Israel's God is not simply a Creator who was active in illo tempore, nor merely a transcendent presence felt in the majesty or powers of nature. Israel experienced God as present and personally active in the events of its own history. Thus, the countless texts in the OT which express praise and glory to God nearly always include a recounting of the significant events through which God has shaped Israel's history. In order to speak of God's glory, Israel tells its own story.

"In the beginning, God created...": the central revelation of God's glory and the living heart of Israel's history is found, not in the cosmologies of Genesis, but in the Exodus from Egypt culminating in the Sinai covenant. The glory of YHWH is revealed in his mighty deed, which is the liberation of Israel from slavery and the creation of them into a people. Thus God's self-revelation is precisely as the redeemer/creator of the people. In Israel's experience of God and in her memory, God's power and glory will be forever connected with its very beginning, life and future.

This is the event in which Israel comes to personal knowledge of the God of their ancestors. It speaks of God's utter sovereignty and intimate presence with and for them for all generations and it shows in mighty deeds that he is indeed the One who is with them in their suffering and who has come to save them. Israel comes to believe in YHWH because of his triumph over Egypt and its idols and breaks into song, praising God for his glorious deeds (Exodus 15).

With the revelation of the divine name YHWH and with the decisive events of the Exodus, a whole new level of commitment and relationship is established. On Sinai, we have the formal proclamation of this fact by God and recognition of this fact by Israel. YHWH solemnly identifies himself: "I, the Lord, am your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, that place of slavery" (Exod 20:2; = cf. Deut 5:6). This is where YHWH has revealed that he is the only true God (Deut 6:4) and that Israel is his people. It is the reason why Israel must worship YHWH and him alone (Exod 20:3f; Deut 5:7f) and why Israel must love YHWH with all its heart, soul and strength. It is the basis of the great commandment and the heart of the whole Mosaic Law; it is the one thing that Israel must forever remember and take to heart (Deut 6:4f).

2. Israel's Worship as Memorial: Zikaron. In all of its various forms (including rituals for purification, sacrificial offerings of atonement, prayers of petition and intercession, harvest offerings of thanksgiving, and so on), Israel's worship remained centered in the YHWH cult surrounding the Exodus and Sinai covenant. To worship God means to praise and thank YHWH, the God of the covenant. It means to remember that event in order to enter into it personally, acknowledging its demands and living in its promise.

Of course, this process of redemption/creation is one that was really only just begun in the Exodus event. The entire story chronicled in the OT is really the concrete history of a single process of redemption/creation; a single process of God's revealing or accomplishing his glory as the God and life-giver of his covenant people. It is also a remarkably candid admission of failure by Israel. Through bitter experience, Israel learns the truth of Moses' warning on the banks of the Jordan: "If, however, you turn away your hearts and will not listen, but are led astray and adore and serve others gods . . . you will certainly perish" (Deut 30:17f). In light of its own experience of infidelity, Israel's confession and praise of God's glory precisely in his covenant fidelity takes on special significance and forms the basis upon which Israel can approach the Lord again and again seeking life through mercy and forgiveness. Thus even those cultic actions which focus on purification, repentance and atonement have their basis in the praised-filled remembrance of God's saving deeds and constant fidelity. The community finds courage and confidence to seek forgiveness as it remembers (and reminds God!) what God has already done and promised.

This becomes especially evident in the prophetic tradition. The prophets plead with Israel to come to its senses, to understand itself, its present condition and its future by remembering its origins. Memory is what leads Israel back to God and "back" to its future. In God and God's gracious action, Israel finds its true identity, learns to interpret its present condition and renews its hope in a promised future.

In its remembering, the wholeness and meaning of its life appear. Precisely because Israel's worship is a remembrance of God's saving deeds, it is the place where the wholeness and meaning of its life are manifested, celebrated and renewed. This is especially evident in Israel's major feasts: Unleavened Bread, Weeks, Booths and Passover. Passover, later combined with the Feast of Unleavened Bread, is of central significance. The celebration of Passover is not simply an anniversary of what happened to the ancestors. Through God's initiative, it is an effective re-presentation of the saving events of the past as a present reality. The faithful of each generation are enabled to journey out of Egypt themselves and enter into the life of the covenant promise.

Thus, what we have here is not simply the quite understandable necessity of memory for the people to know who they are, where they came from, what their promise and future is. The remembering is established as memorial by God himself. Israel is commanded by God to remember. Thus the remembering of the people is something which happens within the totality of the single saving act of God. It is taken up and included so to speak in the saving/creating action. The significance of the command to remember is precisely one of historical mediation of the saving events. God's command is at once a divine pledge making Israel's worship a means to perpetuate his saving action.

The dynamic of memorial (zikkaron) is thoroughly sacramental: both praise for God's saving deeds and participation in the salvation they effect. Doxology and soteriology are intrinsically united. In and through the worship of the community, God continues the act of redemption and creation begun in the Exodus.

3. Spirit and Sacrifice. Throughout Israel's history and in many different forms, sacrifice was the central act of worship. It must be understood as an acknowledgment of God's deeds and promises. Both the covenant with Abraham and the covenant on Sinai are solemnized and symbolized in blood sacrifices. In Israel's later history, the different gifts offered in sacrifice are signs of and responses to the gracious gifts of the Lord. In offering them, the community expresses its desire to enter more deeply into the covenant union with God. Thus sacrificial worship is not a means to placate or persuade God. It is a sign of the community's remembrance of God's fidelity and of its own repentance and renewed desire for union with God. It expresses the surrender of one's spirit (whole self) to God in order to be filled and renewed with God's own Spirit.

This is the notion which underlies the strong criticism of temple worship and sacrifice which is evident especially in the prophetic literature and the emphasis on spiritual sacrifice in the Psalms. True worship, precisely as the acknowledgment of YHWH's mighty deeds, really consists in the spiritual (personal) surrender of love (Ps 40:6-10; 50:8-13; 51:16-19). This is the only appropriate response to the loving deeds of God who creates and renews the people by filling them with his spirit (compare Ps 51:10f; Ezek 11:19f; 36:26f; 37:14; 39:29). The externals of worship have true meaning only as expressions of interior devotion and love. Such love will express itself not only in cultic acts, but even more so in the life of the community. God is glorified when covenant love and justice inform the community's life (Amos 5:21-25; Mic 6:6-8). Without this, external cult is worthless. Of what use is a temple and its cult to YHWH, whose glory fills the heavens and the earth? Of what value the holocausts and grain offerings to the One who created the universe and all its creatures (Isa 66:3)? Where justice and mercy are done, there shines the glory of the Lord (Isaiah 58). What God desires is love not sacrifice (Hos 6:6). In an extraordinary image expressing her future consolation, Jerusalem, wrapped in the cloak of justice, crowned with the glory of the eternal name, is called "the peace of justice, the glory of God's worship" (Bar 5:4). Thus worship has a fundamental ethical orientation to the life of the community precisely because of its orientation to God. The people, here symbolized by Jerusalem, will itself be the revelation of God's glory when it manifests God's justice and peace.

This last image is a good example of another important development in Israel's worship. The post-exilic writings of the OT evidence a growing awareness of the universal cosmological and eschatological scope of the promise rooted in the Exodus and covenant. This influences Israel's worship notably. The glory of God's presence (shekinah) is not limited to fire, cloud and tent, but is seen more and more in the eschatological perspective of the new heavens and the new earth which YHWH will make, when God's wisdom and Spirit will fill the earth (compare Sirach 24; Ezek 36:26f; Joel 3:1f). On that day, the Lord himself will come to gather people from every nation to see and proclaim his glory. They shall all be brought to Jerusalem as an offering to the Lord. And all men and women will worship before him (Isa 66:18ff).

4. Worship as Sacrifice of Praise and Thanksgiving. The true nature of sacrifice is especially seen in two forms of worship which take place in the context of a meal. They are of particular significance for understanding the origins and development of the Christian eucharistic liturgy. The first is the table-fellowship meal which was quite common in the time of Jesus and probably the sort of meal which Jesus celebrated with his disciples just before his death. Bread is broken, and several cups of wine, including the "cup of blessing" are shared. There are prayers of petition and a final prayer of praise. Its heart is a series of three solemn berakoth, joyful, memorial prayers of praise, thanksgiving and acknowledgment of God's saving deeds. The first praises God as the creator of all life. The second recalls the Exodus, covenant and the fruits they have yielded for the people. The third is dominated by the petition that the creating, redeeming action of God be renewed today and that it may be fulfilled in the coming of the Messiah, who will restore Jerusalem and universally establish the kingdom where God will be glorified eternally for his saving deeds.

The second is the toda, a sacrificial meal offering of thanks made by someone who has been saved from death or some other life-threatening situation. Many of the psalms (22, 30-31, 40, 41, 66, 107, 116, to name a few) have this ritual meal as their sitz im leben. The story is recounted and the saving action of God is confessed, often in the context of Israel's salvation history as a whole, from its founding events to its promised future. Even more than the holocaust offering or the unleavened bread and wine which were a part of such rituals, the act of thanksgiving and praise itself (toda) was the heart of worship, the true sacrifice which glorifies YHWH (compare Ps 50:14,23; 116:17). It was an expression of the offering of self, the sacrifice God truly desires (compare Ps 51:17-19; 40:7-11). It looked forward to the end-time when God's saving deeds would attain their final and universal dimension (Ps 22:28f). According to an old rabbinic tradition, while all other rituals would cease in the messianic age, the toda would be sung throughout eternity. Some scholars argue that the eucharistic celebration of the early church should be understood not only in terms of the last berakoth meal of Jesus with the disciples, but as the toda of the risen Lord.

III. New Testament

Whatever may be said of the different influences upon Christian worship throughout its history and its similarities to the cultic practices of other religions, its roots are to be found in the Jewish experience and worship of God we have just described. Turning to the NT, we find the same basic characteristics: the elements of thanksgiving, praise and adoration as the people remember and proclaim the mighty acts in which God has revealed himself, especially in Jesus (Christ, who is confessed, only in the Spirit, to be Lord (1 Cor 12:3). The so-called "High Priestly Prayer" of Jesus in John 17 and the opening sections of many of the letters of the NT, especially the Pauline epistles, are good examples of "Christian" berakah and tefillah.

But Christian worship is not only spontaneous human expression of joy and celebration. The NT anchors worship in the command of Jesus and in the power of the Holy Spirit. In the OT, the presence and action of God were already spoken of in terms of God's word and Spirit, which, as the figure of wisdom shows, were not sharply distinguished from each other. In the NT, especially in terms of the community's liturgical practice, we see the beginnings of the distinctions which would form the basis of later trinitarian theology. The close relationship between the Son (Word) and the Spirit is increasingly spoken of in terms of personal distinction, based no doubt on the community's new experience of God, not just in Jesus (who gone, would return again), but now present and active within it. As the personal identity and role of the Spirit come to be recognized more clearly, we observe the particular association of the Spirit with the identity and mission of the church in general, and with the nature and purpose of the church's worship in particular. A few remarks on the former will help to illuminate the latter.

1. God's Glory. Before the resurrection, the person and ministry of Jesus may have raised many hopes and even elicited a kind of faith (Lk 24:21). But even when compared to the unfortunate destinies of the other prophets, Jesus' life and death on a cross could hardly be seen in any traditional sense as the glorification of God. It is only when Jesus is raised by God in the power of the Spirit that his own life and death may be seen as the glorification of God in his complete offering of self, rather than the just punishment of a blasphemer.

Still, what is new, what is "good news," is not the fact that a pious man has glorified God, but that God has glorified Jesus and given those "who had been hoping" a share in his Spirit. In the light of the resurrection, the Christ event is seen as the act of God himself. Only in this way is the cross the revelation of the glory of the divine, self-surrendering love. Jesus is the fulfillment of all God's promises and previous actions (2 Cor 1:20); the outpouring of his Spirit is the inauguration of the eschatological and therefore universal fulfillment of all the world (Acts 2:17ff) and as such, the completion of God's creating/redeeming action in Word/Spirit. This is revealed in the raising of Jesus from the dead by the "glory of the Father" (Rom 6:4), and indwelling of this same Spirit in the believers (Rom 8:11).

The divine glory (doxa), the OT kabod revealed in God's actions, is shown to be the divine nature or life itself as it has appeared (ōphthē) in Jesus (Eph 1:17; 2 Cor 4:6; Heb 1:3) and as it is communicated in the Spirit to the world (Eph 3:14-21; 1 Pet 4:14). Thus, we may say that for the NT, God glorifies himself by communicating the divine life itself to the world. The glory of God is the salvation of the world. Doxology and soteriology are one theologically.

The Spirit carries out the divine work of God's saving glory, established in Christ, to its completion. That is why glory is particularly associated with the Spirit's ministry (2 Cor 3:8), which will be to bear witness to Christ (Jn 15:26), and to lead men and women into the fullness of the truth revealed in Christ (Jn 16:13).

The Spirit glorifies Jesus by enabling believers to see his life, death and resurrection as the revelation of the glory of the divine love and by transforming them in the power of this love, making of them living witnesses of its glory (2 Cor 3:8, 17f).

The resurrection of Jesus is the revelation of the Spirit and it is with the sending of the Spirit that the church comes into existence and is constituted as the Spirit's own witness to the truth of God's self-revelation in Christ. The glory which believers have heard, seen and touched in Christ is now to become visible in their own lives, especially in their love for one another. In this way, the Spirit gives witness through the church in every age to the revelation of God's enduring love for the whole world in Jesus Christ, making the glory of this past event shine forth in power as a present, transforming reality. The power of the Spirit active in the church is the real "proof" that Jesus has been raised.

It is the loving union (koinōnia, communio) of believers in Christ which seeks out the least of the brethren and excludes no one, that most fundamentally reveals the glory of God in Christ and the presence of the risen Lord as Spirit in the church. Only as a community reconciled in Christ can they be effective in the Spirit's ministry of reconciliation (compare 2 Cor 5:16-21). This loving union is proper to the person of the Spirit and is the Spirit's final goal and greatest work (1 Corinthians 12; 2 Cor 13:13; compare Phil 2:1ff).

2. Authentic Worship. It has been claimed by some scholars who recognize the primary significance of the communio (one often suspects views of the OT and its relationship to the NT bordering on Manichaeism, and reactions to a triumphalistic, almost magical sacra-mentalism which has been evident in the church's history), that in the gospel of the kingdom, Jesus announced an end to the law and the abolishment of religious cult as prescribed therein. "Community, Yes; Cult, No!"? In view of the fact that some of the oldest traditions represented in the NT deal with liturgical matter, quite specifically with the memorial commanded by the Lord (in the Synoptics and Paul), such a view seems untenable. What is new is neither the abolishment of cult, nor the invention of an absolutely new one; Jesus reinterprets the existing liturgical form of the berakoth meal when he says "Do this in remembrance of me." And the very form of celebration as meal highlights its intrinsic connection with the communio.

It is true that Jesus, like the prophets before him, was critical of the degeneration of the temple cult. Like them, he urged that the sacrifice desired by God was the heart, not a burnt offering. It is what is called worship "in the Spirit" by Paul, who was attacked for "influencing people to worship God in ways that are against the law" (Acts 18:13). John speaks of worship "in spirit and truth" (4:23f), James of "pure worship" (Jas 1:27). This has three senses. (1) Christian worship, completely in the prophetic traditions of the OT, is spiritual (i.e., personal) in nature. It means the surrender of one's whole self to God who has graciously acted on the world's behalf (Rom 12:1; 1 Pet 2:5). (2) Such worship has as its ground and goal the life of the community as a whole (2 Cor 1:20; Jas 1:26f). (3) Such worship is inspired and directed by the Spirit (Phil 3:3) in whom the believing community remains in Jesus and his word, and therefore in communion with each other (Jn 4:23).

Once this is seen, the significance of the criticism of the temple cult can be appreciated. The community itself is designated the temple of the living God (2 Cor 6:16), built of living stones, an edifice of spirit (1 Pet 2:5) and dwelling place of the Spirit of God (1 Cor 3:16). This people is created in the new covenant (Jer 31:31ff) as a priestly people claimed by God to proclaim the glory of God's works (1 Pet 2:9-10). Its worship is the offering of "spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet 2:5). The spiritual worship acceptable to God is the offering of oneself as a living sacrifice (Rom 12:1).

The people is at once spiritual temple, holy priesthood and living sacrifice, all by the action of the Holy Spirit who forms it into the body of Christ, himself temple (Jn 2:21; compare Heb 10:20), high priest (Heb 5:1f) and perfect offering (Heb 9:12, 14; 10:10).

In other words, through the Spirit, the church's worship of God is its communal "Yes" to what God has done in Christ (2 Cor 1:20) and, therefore, a participation in the worship of Christ the High Priest. This worship consists in a participation in the sacrifice of Christ, which is the surrender of one's whole self to Christ's mission for the salvation of the world as it is announced and effected in the kingdom.

IV. Spirit and Eucharist

The Spirit builds up the church in communion with Christ and empowers it to carry out its mission in a variety of ways and through a variety of gifts, but especially in the church's worship, through word and sacrament. In its memorial sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, the Spirit enables the church to remember the saving action of God in Jesus Christ, makes it a present reality in which believers are called to acknowledge and participate, and fashions them ever more fully into a communion of divine love as the body of Christ. "One body, one Spirit in Christ," they share both in his life and in his mission: that universal community of love in the Spirit which is the Kingdom. Only because of the presence and action of the Spirit is the community able to obey (and understand the full implications of) the Lord's command: "Do this in remembrance of me." Thus, as we already saw in the OT, "memorial" is not merely a subjective act of remembering a past event, but an action of God, an institution established by God and given to God's people in order to perpetuate (make present) God's saving action.

The unity of the church, and its mission of reconciling unification, is meant to come to particular expression as it celebrates the memorial of the paschal mystery of Christ, which is the heart of its worship (1 Cor 10:16f; 11:17ff). This is especially evident when one considers the structure of the eucharistic liturgy. Like the Jewish table-fellowship meals from which it arose, the eucharist is primarily a communal act of thanksgiving (berakah/toda, eucharistia/eulogia, gratias agere) and praise in which the community remembers and proclaims (zikkaron, anamnesis, memoria) the saving deeds of God and brings gifts (anaphora) of bread and wine, elements which come to symbolize both the supper and sacrifice of the Lord, and the offering of self which is the goal of true worship "in the Spirit." Within a few centuries (West Syrian rite, later forms of Addai and Mari, later versions of Hippolytus) we find the role of the Spirit explicitly stated in the form of what came to be called the epiclesis, more or less a conclusion of the anamnesis. Through the power of the Spirit, those who partake in the holy mysteries are to be filled with the Spirit, being gathered together into the body of Christ to the glorification of God the Father.

In its primitive forms, before the introduction of an invocation of the Spirit to transform the elements themselves, or to consecrate them as sacrificial offerings, the epiclesis highlights the fundamental purpose of the eucharistic celebration (and, it may be said, the fundamental role of the Spirit in Christian worship): the fulfillment of the church in unity in order to glorify the Father through the Son. This is expressed in the most ancient form of the great doxology: "Glory be to the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit" (before developments in trinitarian theology in the 4th century led to a focus on the divinity of the Spirit and corresponding changes in liturgical formulae to stress this (e.g., Basil's doxology, which lives today in popular form: "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Spirit. . .").

The current form of the great doxology in the Roman church is quite similar: "Through him, with him, in him, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, all glory and honor is yours, Almighty Father, forever and ever." It may serve as a summary and conclusion of this article. It reminds us of the connection between the community act of worship and its life: both are "in the unity of the Holy Spirit." This formula may express the glory which the church gives to the triune God, but it also expresses the deeper truth that the glory which is truly God's is to be found in the living communion of love which the Holy Spirit establishes through, with and in Christ. In other words, the Father's glory is the unity of the believers in the Holy Spirit, through, with and in Christ. Thus the Spirit is called "Lord and Giver of Life" by the ancient creeds precisely because it is the Spirit who is and who bestows life as the life of persons in communion. All of the "marks" of the church as it is built up by the Spirit, one, holy, catholic, and apostolic, are essentially ways of expressing the union which the Spirit effects between believers with Christ and in him with one another.

The community gives God glory chiefly by living in loving union. This is precisely what the example of Christ teaches (Phil 2:1-11). It is not the liturgy per se, but the transformation of life, the reconciliation of human beings with God and with one another, which is the ultimate aim of glorifying God "in the Spirit." This is what the liturgy is meant to express and effect. As Matthew 25 reminds us, the only public works (liturgy) which are absolutely necessary for salvation are what used to be called the corporal works of mercy (see the warning of L.G., 14, the assurance of L.G., 16). Sacramental worship of God should lead us with God to the world, which after all is God's creative, redemptive work (liturgy!). As Rahner points out, it is important not because in it something happens which does not happen at all elsewhere but because it makes visible the "divine depth" of our real, everyday lives as they are created, redeemed and sustained by God's Spirit. Indeed, it is necessary both as a symbolization of the hidden reality of this "liturgy of the world" and as the ongoing renewal of the communio God has made to be a witness thereof. Whether or not the world comes to the eucharistic worship of the church (S.C., 10) seems quite secondary.

Where worship fails to illumine the sacred depth of the "secular," where it no longer prepares people and enables them to encounter God in everyday life, where worship becomes removed from God's desire to establish the kingdom, or from our mission as church to be a real and effective mediation of God's love in action, we make of God's saving opus operatum in Christ an esoteric ritual, "something to be done" and done correctly, but robbed of its life-giving, transforming power. Ritualism is a "sin against the Holy Spirit."

Through "right worship" (orthodoxia), the Holy Spirit leads the community in owning, celebrating and renewing its identity and mission. Made one through Christ, the church is a visible sign or sacrament of salvation. As sacrament of the Spirit (Kasper), it symbolizes in a real and effective way the kingdom which God's Spirit is finally bringing about, not solely "within" the visible church, but in the whole of human history: intimate union with God and the unity of all humankind (L.G.,1). This is how the Spirit glorifies the Son and so brings the process of God's self-glorification to its completion.

HOLY SPIRIT, BAPTISM IN THE

The exact meaning of "baptism in the Spirit" is disputed among Christians. No one denies that intensified experiences of the Spirit (often accompanied by the gift of glossalalia) have occurred in the lives of believers since the earliest days of the Christian era, but there is considerable difference of opinion about the significance of these events.

Classical Pentecostalism maintains that the experience of being baptized in the Spirit is the decisive moment in personal salvation. Water baptism is understood as a kind of rebirth that signals an individual's conversion, but Spirit baptism ("the second blessing") is recognized as the definitive experience of being filled with the Spirit of Jesus and empowered to witness to the gospel. Pentecostals also maintain that the charism of speaking in tongues (glossalalia) is the inevitable evidence of this experience of being sanctified. According to these Christians, therefore, there is no salvation without baptism in the Spirit and there is no baptism in the Spirit that is not accompanied by the gift of tongues.

This distinguishing characteristic of Classical Pentecostalism finds its source in the NT witness, primarily that provided by the author of Luke-Acts (Acts 2:37-39). In the letters of Paul there are several texts which affirm that Christian life is a gift of the Spirit of Jesus (Rom 8:9, 14ff; Gal 4:6; 1 Cor 12:13); that life in Christ is an incorporation into his dying and rising (Rom 6:3ff; 8:11; Col 2:12); and that the experience of being washed in the baptismal waters by the community of believers is an occasion for receiving the gift of the Spirit from the God of Jesus (1 Cor 6:11; 12:13; 2 Cor 1:21-22). Paul links incorporation into Christ through water baptism to the experience of being immersed in the Spirit. Water baptism and Spirit baptism are therefore understood as interrelated without being identified. The Christian community (with the exception of the Pentecostal churches) has generally understood the gift of the Spirit as the effect of the ritual of (water) baptism in the name of Jesus. "Baptism in the Spirit" is therefore not always understood as an event subsequent to water baptism; it is also thought of as an aspect of Christian initiation itself. All who are baptized into Christ are filled with the Spirit of Christ.

The Pentecostal churches understand water baptism in the name of Jesus as a rebirth that ratifies one's repentance or conversion, but that remains ineffective without the outpouring of the gift of the Spirit. The Catholic and mainline Protestant churches, on the other hand, understand Christian (water) baptism as the sacramental cause of the gift of the Spirit. The two are distinct, but not separate.

A third way of interpreting baptism in the Spirit is associated with the charismatic renewal in both Catholic and Protestant communities. Although there are various attempts to explain the phenomenon whereby members of the renewal experience the fullness of the Spirit, the most helpful is probably that which explains this event as a reaffirmation and renewal of a person's baptismal identity. Members of such communities claim that they have experienced a kind of "second baptism" in which the gift of the Spirit of Jesus was made manifest in their lives in a new and transforming way. These "baptisms in the Spirit" are oftentimes marked by the reception of one or other of the charisms (1 Corinthians 12 and 14). A person who wishes to be baptized in the Spirit asks others to pray that this extraordinary gift may be bestowed. The experience usually occurs after intercessory prayer and the laying on of hands by members of the prayer community who have previously been baptized in the Spirit. For members of the renewal, therefore, "baptism in the Spirit" is more often thought of as an experience of the presence and power of the Spirit, than an event marking the initial reception of the Spirit. It is a gift of awareness and empowerment rather than the definitive sign of salvation. A person who has been baptized in the Spirit tends to be undeniably convinced that God's love has been poured out upon him or her (Rom 5:5).

These various interpretations of "baptism in the Spirit" raise deeper issues about the manner in which God is experienced. How is God both other than yet intimately one with me? How can I believe in one who lies utterly beyond the realm of my being? How are God's call, my response, and God's gift of Self related?

Pentecostals, for example, understand salvation in Christ as a three-part process which begins with repentance (in response to the hearing of the gospel) and is followed first by baptism in the name of Jesus and finally by the gift of the Spirit. For Pentecostalism faith and water baptism are preparatory—faith as our movement away from sin toward God and the ritual of water baptism as the church's ratification of our conversion. But it is the experience of being baptized in the Spirit that is God's definitive act of claiming us as his son or daughter. The latter may (and usually does) occur sometime after a person's incorporation into the church through the ritual of baptism.

Such an understanding separates faith and the act of Christ in and through his church from the gift of the Spirit. For Catholic theology, however, this separation is impossible. There is no incorporation into the body of Christ that is not effected by the presence and power of the Spirit. Furthermore, there is no act of faith that is not empowered by the prior (although admittedly usually implicitly experienced) presence of the Spirit. "No one can say 'Jesus is Lord' except in the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 12:3). There is a distinction between the rite of baptism and the experience of the Spirit, but that distinction is never a separation. Whether or not one interprets the water rite as the sacramental cause of the experience of being filled with the Spirit of Jesus is another question.
